CHRONICLE

New York's First Cathedral.—More than local interest is attached to the very notable celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the laying of the corner stone of old St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, which will begin on April 23. While the sacred associations of what is to Americans a venerable antiquity cluster about old St. Peter's, in Barclay street, which was built nearly a quarter of a century earlier, the glory of a sacred pre-eminence, long possessed, will for generations of Catholics to come hover over the hallowed precincts of old St. Patrick's. Were historical records wanting, the choice one hundred years ago of Ireland's Apostle as the patron of the cathedral church would point unmistakably to the nationality as well as to the active faith of the early worshippers on Manhattan Island. In 1808, Father Anthony Kohlmann, with the aid of his fellow priest, Father Benedict Fenwick, the future Bishop of Boston, opened a school in Mulberry street in a house opposite St. Patrick's, and in June of the following year these pioneer priests began the erection of the church which was to serve for so many years as the cathedral of the new diocese. Kohlmann the Austrian and Fenwick the Marylander appropriately selected as patron of the new church the apostle of the land whose children formed the bulk of the growing Catholic population. Besides the other distinguished bishops who have been associated with the sacred edifice, it was here that Bishop Hughes and his successor, the first American Cardinal, John McCloskey, were consecrated, and from this place they accelerated the marvelous development of the great see over which they presided with so much credit to themselves and so much edification to the Catholics of their own diocese and of the country at large.

France.—A special cablegram from Paris to AMERICA, under date of April 14, 1909, announces that many bishops have invited their people to decorate and illuminate their house-fronts next Sunday in honor of the beatification of Jeanne d'Arc. Contrary to the newspaper reports circulated in the United States, there is no truth in the rumor that Archbishops Mignot and Fuzet are to be disciplined. No meeting of the French hierarchy will be held in Rome; and it is absolutely false that Austria has communicated to the Vatican a protest against the holding of such a meeting.

Sixty-five French bishops and four thousand French visitors have arrived in Rome for the ceremonies of the beatification of Jeanne d'Arc. No consistory is fore-shadowed for the nomination of cardinals.

Cardinal Andrieu, Archbishop of Bordeaux, suppressing the diocesan association, substitutes therefor centralization at the Archbishop's house with penny subscription for the maintenance of public worship.

The Archbishop of Sens publishes a letter protesting against the confiscation of his Grand Seminary, which the government wants to transform into a house of detention for fallen women.

The Socialist Congress thinks it should leave to members the free expression of their religious opinions, and refuses to enter into alliance with the radicals.—DENAIS.

Reform of Finances in Germany.—With the disappearance of the war clouds from the horizon of European politics, the attention of the nation is more undividedly directed to the reform of the financial system of the Empire. The necessity of such a reform is generally granted. The people are also resigned to the fact that the reform will include a considerable increase of the taxes. Rates are urged on tobacco and wine, gas and electricity, and also on advertisements. It seems probable that the tax already levied on beer will be increased and the inheritance tax extended to wives and children. The matter is rendered more difficult by the provision in the constitution of the Empire that all direct taxes must be reserved to the states, the central government being allowed to impose indirect taxes only.

Chancellor von Bülow is resolved to carry the reform by the votes of the so-called Bloc parties, and without any dependence upon the votes of the Centre. The newspapers of this party complain that all amendments proceeding from it are infallibly rejected, and this is conceded by the opposite parties. The "Bloc," on the other hand, is itself in no very smooth working condition. It comprises too many heterogeneous elements. The leaders of the so-called "Little Block" are trying to bring about a compromise which will re-unite the "Bloc-Brothers" and make them submissive to the Chancellor's wish.

As a result of the slow progress of the reform, rumors were frequent that Chancellor von Bülow was going to resign and the Reichstag to be dissolved. As either event would ensure a veritable upheaval in German politics, the persistency of the reports shows how deep is the excitement among the people.

New President of the Centre Party.—Catholic papers report that the Centre Party of the Reichstag has chosen Baron George von Hertling to succeed Count Hompesch as President of the Party. Besides having a record of nearly thirty years' service in the Reichstag, Baron Hertling is favorably known as a university professor and author of several important works. He began his career in 1867 as "Privatdozent," i. e., unsalaried lecturer in the University of Bonn. A strong opposition to the Vatican Council and later on "Kulturkampf" tendencies swayed the then teaching body of the University. While other "Privatdozenten" were soon promoted to the rank of professors, young Hertling, who was known as a staunch Catholic, had to wait thirteen years before this well-merited honor was granted to him. His talents and ability were better appreciated in Bavaria. In 1882 he accepted the position of "ordinary" professor of philosophy in the University of Munich. In 1891 he was made life member of the Bavarian House of Lords. And then the Berlin authorities who had so long slighted him began to recognize his excellent qualities. From 1898 to 1902 Baron Hertling represented the German Government in the transactions with the Holy See for the establishment of a faculty of Catholic Theology in the University of Strassburg. His meritorious services in this commission won for him a high Prussian Order, and the Pope distinguished him by the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Gregory. Von Hertling is also one of the founders and most active members of the Görres-Society, the purpose of which is to encourage, direct and materially subsidize enterprises of Catholic scholarship.

His prominence in the Centre Party is evidenced by his unanimous election to the presidency, the members of the party voting for him by acclamation. There is, according to the Germania, a general conviction "that under Hertling's leadership the party will continue the great traditions of its great past."

The British Budget.—The by-elections and the clamor for a larger navy are not the sole sources of worriment to the Cabinet. The calculation of the British national revenue for the fiscal year 1908-09, which official returns issued on March 31 made possible, enables one to grasp the difficulty facing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his preparation of the budget. According to the official returns, the national revenue is nearly $25,000,000 lower than the revenue of the preceding year, and $7,500,000 lower than the estimate made by the Chancellor. Two elements will add to the burden of the current financial year—old age pensions, estimated to require $43,750,000, and an increase of $13,750,000 in the cost of the navy. The total expenditure of this year will be about $62,500,000 higher than that of the year just closed, and with last year's actual deficit to reckon, Mr. Lloyd-George has prepared in his budget a statement for an estimated deficit of $65,000,000.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer may choose to draw upon the sinking-fund, but it is inevitable that proposals for new taxation will be advanced. In this event increased license duties will undoubtedly be levied, and an income tax taking a large proportion from big incomes may be looked for. There is talk, too, of a new land tax. But while the budget proposed by Mr. Lloyd-George may make much financial history in England during the current year, budget secrets are invariably well kept in the land across the sea, and until the Chancellor himself shall have spoken, his plans can only be matter of conjecture.

Italy's Political Program and Cabinet.—La Tribuna, a ministerial, though not a monarchical paper, is of the opinion that the recent elections have shown that the Italians as a people are unfitted for the use of the ballot. Italy is neither France nor England—it has no parliamentary traditions. The ballot may be very good as a law; but laws are of no avail unless they go hand in hand with costumi; "Libero il voto" is good in theory, but when ballot-boxes are overturned and broken open how are the votes to be counted? Moreover, personalities and local interests weigh more in elections than the interests of the State. Nevertheless, the issue before the electors was the increase of the army and Italy's position among foreign powers. The answer of the country was that the army and navy must be strengthened, and present alliances maintained. The recent Servian affair has shown that the Triplice is the strongest factor in European affairs to-day. Italy must prepare, not for offense but for defense. Activity in the arsenals and ship-yards of the country must be increased, yet in such a way as not to give any power reason to resent such activity.

And thus the load of militarism on Italy's back is once more added to. Things have altered very little since an Italian Deputy, nearly twenty years ago, said to René Bazin: "Our security, perhaps, and certainly our pride, require us to go on imitating our neighbors."

Signor Giolitti has been through so many cabinet crises that one more will not matter. His reputation for stubbornness may, however, keep his unpopular cabinet together for a long time. All his ministers are unpopular with one or other section of his supporters: Tittoni, because of his Balkan policy; Casana, because he shows vacillation in the War office; Mirabello, because of weakness in the navy; Rava, because he speaks too much and does too little; Cocco-Ortu, because he coquettes with new plans and schemes, yet does nothing solid for agriculture; Schanzer, because he has not carried out promised postal reforms; Bertolini, because he is too autocratic; Orlando, though a good jurist is politically inconsistent; Lacana has failed to farm the revenues properly; Circano has shown he knows nothing of finance. Giolitti's answer to all criticism and all demands for the removal of this or that minister is, "I have chosen him. If he is unfit the fault is mine; if he goes I go also"—and seemingly there is no one to take Giolitti's place.

First Plenary Council of Canada.—More than five years ago the project of having a plenary council in Canada was communicated to the hierarchy by the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Sbarretti. Work was immediately begun in preparation for these great church assizes: theologians, chosen by the various archbishops, met in Ottawa in March, 1904, and drew up a rough draft of the decrees to be submitted to the proposed council. Now at length these arduous preparations have borne fruit. It is officially announced that the Holy Father has granted permission for the holding of a Plenary Council. Final instructions concerning its convocation have been sent by the Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation of the Council to His Excellency the Most Rev. Donatus Sbarretti. The Council will meet in the historic city of Quebec, the Mother See of Canada, in August of this year. The welcome news has been received with great gratification by all the Catholics of the Dominion.

No Canadian Dreadnought.—The Dreadnought agitation, begotten of the excitement produced by Mr. Asquith's discovery of Germany's naval activity, had spread to Canada, when Mr. Foster attempted to pour oil on the troubled waters of tempestuous patriotism by moving "that Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports." Mr. Foster's speech was fluent and persuasive, but very moderate. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in very good form. In lofty and patriotic language he declared his admiration for British institutions and his resolve to make every sacrifice to maintain them. While feeling, even more deeply than Mr. Foster, that the British Empire was a necessity to the onward march of modern civilization, he could not accept the exact wording of the resolution, and proposed an amendment which, without urging immediate action, yet affirmed Canada's willingness to take up its share of the Empire's burden. Mr. Borden, leader of the Opposition, followed in a temperate and conservative strain and practically endorsed the stand taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The House unanimously adopted Mr. Foster's motion as amended by the Prime Minister and Mr. Borden.

The Toronto Mail and Empire, the chief organ of the Conservatives, is not at all pleased with this decision. In its issue of the 5th inst., it says editorially:

The colorless, spiritless resolution passed by the House of Commons cannot be the end of the matter. A resolution addressed to this particular crisis ought to be prepared and passed without delay—a resolution, that is, declaring for the contribution by Canada of the cost of at least one Dreadnought. In his noble speech on his own resolution—introduced weeks before the present naval situation was made known, and having particular reference to the better protection of our own coast fisheries—Mr. Foster stated that the Opposition was prepared to support the Government in offering the price of a Dreadnought or any other contribution to the Imperial navy. Let the Government side go as far, and the House will declare itself in a manner worthy of the representative chamber of the chief of Britain's daughter States.

The Canadian House of Commons.—On April 2, in the Canadian House of Commons, ex-Judge C. J. Doherty moved a resolution calling for a sweeping investigation of all the spending departments. This motion was so carefully worded that it elicited from the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, high praise for the dignified parliamentary style in which it was couched, although he did not admit Mr. Doherty's premises, and still less did he approve his conclusions. The debate was proceeding very smoothly when Mr. Foster, one of the most prominent and influential members of the Opposition and a master of sarcasm, flouted the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, giped at the heads of other departments, accused Holiday, Drolet and McAvity of stealing money from the public treasury. Sir Wilfrid replied: "I have only this to say to Mr. Foster: that, having now spent a long life in the public service, I never had a man suggest that I profited by the people's money." Then pandemonium reigned for a time in the House. Finally, after a long and stormy period of recriminations from both sides, Mr. Foster proved that Sir Wilfrid had broken one of the rules of the House, which forbids any member to use offensive words against any other member, and obtained a formal retraction from Sir Wilfrid, coupled, however, with a warning to Mr. Foster that he should not browbeat his political opponents. At the end of that same stormy sitting Judge Doherty's motion was defeated 94 to 54, a government majority of forty.

Newfoundland's Cabinet Crisis.—A despatch from Sir Edward Morris to AMERICA explains the political situation in Newfoundland. The General Election last November returned eighteen Bondites and eighteen Morrisites. Sir Robert Bond, being in power when the election occurred, retained office till the Legislature convened. The day before the session opened Sir Robert Bond advised the Governor of Newfoundland to dissolve Parliament and hold a new election. The Governor, following a well established British precedent, declined to dissolve until all other expedients were exhausted. Sir Robert Bond thereupon resigned office without attempting to meet the Legislature. The Governor accepted his resignation and invited Sir Edward Morris, as leader of the Opposition, to form a ministry and to endeavor to conduct the legislative business. Sir Edward Morris agreed, chose his cabinet, took a month to study the details of his predecessors' work, and then met the Legislative Assembly which had prorogued when Sir Robert Bond resigned. Sir Edward Morris proposed one of his followers for Speaker, though this placed him in a minority on the floor of the House. Sir Robert Bond refused to allow the election of this candidate for the speakership. This intensified the deadlock. Sir Edward Morris then advised dissolution. The Governor tried to secure a coalition cabinet. Failing in this he granted Morris dissolution and retained him in power while facing the country, on the ground that Bond enjoyed that advantage in November, and Morris, having equalled him despite this drawback, had now a better prospect of giving to the colony a strong, stable government through a substantial majority.

The latest news from Newfoundland is that there will be another General Election on May 8, and that Sir Edward will have the advantage of going to the country with the reins of power in his hands.

Russia.—In the Historical Review of St. Petersburg there lately appeared an article by P. Korenevsky descriptive of the scenes in Chelm, Russia, when the ukase of religious toleration went into effect. The district was one in which the Greek Catholic bishopric was suppressed in 1875 and the Greek Catholics forced to become Orthodox.

According to the writer, it appears that in all the district of Chelm there were, according to the government reports, about 120,000 who went over from Orthodoxy to Catholicism, but these figures were far below the actuality. Twenty Orthodox parishes have been already abolished, for in them there remains not a single parishioner. The sudden return from Orthodoxy to Catholicism is thus described by the author: As soon as the manifest of April 17, 1906, appeared, the eagerness of the people to become Catholics began. In one place they shouted on seeing the placards: "To the church at once; down with the popes (Russian priests)! Away with the schismatic belief!" Then they rushed en masse into the Catholic church, crying, shouting and praying, and announced anew their Catholic belief. The Polish bishop was sent for. When he came in a few days, the people drew his carriage, went in procession to the Catholic church, which was decorated from the ground to the cupola; the streets were decorated, and streamers, garlands and bouquets were seen everywhere, and as the bishop passed people fell on their knees and stretched forth their hands asking his blessing. The bishop gratefully received them into the church, professing the faith from which they had been driven some thirty years ago. The author concludes that the Orthodox clergy, having lost their flocks, will have to work more energetically, but, as he observes, their good work will come all too late to be of much effect.

Woman Suffrage.—Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt of New York, president of the International Suffrage Alliance, was warmly welcomed in Berlin last week. Her address before the German suffrage societies drew immense audiences and resulted in giving the woman suffrage movement in the Fatherland the liveliest impetus it has ever known. Unfortunately for her cause the facts do not appear to bear out her claims that signs are most promising for the movement's success in the United States. Whilst the spectacular methods of certain radical sisters in England and in America give the cause a certain manner of advertisement, it yet remains true that there is little of real success following their efforts. Here in the States there is an organization known as the Association Opposed to the Further Extension of Suffrage to Women, which, though not so much in the public eye as the Suffragettes, is working hard in the opposite direction. A distinguished English woman, recently in this country, declared that the woman suffrage movement in this country was in process of defeat. The statement was, of course, at once challenged by the suffragists, but despite the challenge the assertion seems to be true. A test of the popularity of the movement and of the strength of its growth has been had in state after state, and nowhere do we find any evidence to substantiate the claims of the suffragists. It is but a few weeks since a bill carefully prepared for presentation to the New York Assembly, and urged with many of the spectacular methods that have come to play a part in the movement, was denied a favorable report in committee, although its advocates were granted every courtesy when they applied for a hearing.

EDITORIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The object, scope and character of this review are sufficiently indicated in its name, and they are further exhibited in the contents of this first number.

AMERICA will take the place of the monthly periodical, The Messenger, and continue its mission. It is in reality an adaptation of its precursor to meet the needs of the time. Among these needs are a review and conscientious criticism of the life and literature of the day, a discussion of actual questions and a study of vital problems from the Christian standpoint, a record of religious progress, a defense of sound doctrine, an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, a removal of traditional prejudice, a refutation of erroneous news, and a correction of misstatements about beliefs and practices which millions hold dearer than life. These needs, moreover, are too numerous, too frequent and too urgent to be satisfied by a monthly periodical, no matter how vigilant or comprehensive it may be. The march of events is too rapid, and every week has its paramount interests which are lost or forgotten, unless dealt with as soon as they arise.

In the opinion of many, a daily organ would be required to treat these interests adequately. Until such time as a daily may be possible, if really desirable, the weekly review we propose to publish is an imperative need. The newspapers which appear every week under Catholic auspices in the United States, Canada and Mexico do not attempt to chronicle events of secular interest or to discuss questions of the day in the light of Christian principles. They are for the most part diocesan or local journals, many of them excellent in their way, but limited in the range of subjects, and circumscribed in territory. There are hundreds of these local Catholic weekly newspapers, but not one general Catholic weekly review; or, to express it in terms which will appeal to many of our readers, we have no organ in America similar to The Tablet in England, and such an organ is quite as much needed here as it is indispensable there. Even the most unfriendly critic of this leading English Catholic weekly will admit that to it the Church in the British Isles owes much of its standing and influence. A periodical of equal merit in America will be of incalculable benefit to religion.

There is still more need of a first-class Catholic weekly periodical in this Western Hemisphere, and a wider field of utility for the same than in England, because with us, non-Catholics as a rule are not only more ready to hear our views, but they are also more eager to have us exert our proper influence in the national and social life. When counselling Father Coleridge, at the time he was planning The Month, Cardinal Newman advocated a periodical which would induce Catholics to take an intelligent interest in public affairs and not live as a class apart from their fellows of other beliefs. His counsel applies to Catholics in America even more than it applied in England in his day. We are of a people who respect belief but who value action more. We are going through a period when the most salutary influences of religion are needed to safeguard the very life and liberty and equal rights of the individual, to maintain the home, to foster honesty and sobriety, and to inculcate reverence for authority, and for the most sacred institutions, civil as well as ecclesiastical. We are more responsible than our non-Catholic fellow citizens for the welfare of thousands of immigrants of our own religion who come to us weekly, and for their amalgamation into the national life. We are responsible also for much of the ignorance of religious truth and for the prejudices which still prevail to a great extent, because, satisfied as we are of the security of our own position, we do not take the pains to explain it to others or to dispel their erroneous views.

The object, therefore, of this Review is to meet the needs here described and to supply in one central publication a record of Catholic achievement and a defense of Catholic doctrine, built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe. It will discuss questions of the day affecting religion, morality, science and literature; give information and suggest principles that may help to the solution of the vital problems constantly thrust upon our people. These discussions will not be speculative nor academic, but practical and actual, with the invariable purpose of meeting some immediate need of truth, of creating interest in some social work or movement, of developing sound sentiment, and of exercising proper influence on public opinion. The Review will not only chronicle events of the day and the progress of the Church; it will also stimulate effort and originate movements for the betterment of the masses.

The name AMERICA embraces both North and South America, in fact, all this Western Hemisphere; the Review will, however, present to its readers all that interests Catholics in any part of the world, especially in Europe. It will preserve and expand the popular features of The Messenger, namely, the editorial, chronicle, reader or book reviews, notes on science, literature, education and sociology. Special short articles or leaders on current topics of interest, biographical sketches of prominent persons, comments on passing events, and correspondence from international centres, will be among the additional features which the editors hope to make equally popular with the readers of the new Review. Owing to the wide scope of its contents, and its strict avoidance of proselytism and of all unnecessary controversy, it is hoped that the Review will prove attractive, not only to Catholics, but to the large number of non-Catholics who desire information about Catholic affairs.

True to its name and to its character as a Catholic review, AMERICA will be cosmopolitan not only in contents but also in spirit. It will aim at becoming a representative exponent of Catholic thought and activity without bias or plea for special persons or parties. Promptness in meeting difficulties will be one of its chief merits, actuality will be another. Its news and correspondence will be fresh, full and accurate. Courtesy will preside over its relations with the press and other expounders of public sentiment. Far from interfering with any of the excellent Catholic newspapers already in existence, AMERICA will strive to broaden the scope of Catholic journalism and enable it to exert a wholesome influence on public opinion, and thus become a bond of union among Catholics and a factor in civic and social life.

The task of editing this Review has been undertaken at the earnest solicitation of members of the Hierarchy and of prominent priests and laymen. Indeed, not a few non-Catholics have frequently expressed a desire to have such an organ of Catholic thought and influence, and surprise that nothing of the kind has hitherto existed. The Archbishop of New York, in whose jurisdiction the Review will be published, has cordially approved the project. It goes without saying that loyalty to the Holy See, and profound respect for the wishes and views of the Catholic Hierarchy, will be the animating principle of this Review. The board of editors consists of men representing various sections of North America. They will be assisted by eminent collaborators and contributors drawn from all ranks of the clergy and from the laity in every part of the world, some of whose names we publish in this number.

Bureaus of information established in the leading cities of Europe, Mexico, Central and South America will supply prompt and correct information concerning Catholic interests. Telegraph and cable will be used when needed, and neither labor nor expense will be spared to make AMERICA worthy of its name.

The mayor of Orleans has given a gentle rebuff to the masonic lodges in that city. They had petitioned him to grant them a place in the procession in honor of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc on May 8th. French Freemasons honoring Blessed Jeanne d'Arc would be too much; and the mayor tells them very gently that their fellow townsmen would prefer their abstention. Two years ago a purely civil and military celebration was attempted, but, as the mayor naively admits, "in spite of a regiment of cavalry, and the military bands supplied by the Government, the whole affair fell very flat. It brought no joy to the hearts of the people." This year the religious authorities and societies are to be invited. In conclusion he assures the Freemasons that their fellow citizens will be grateful for their absence.

A special despatch received 14 April from our Roman correspondent states that the alleged misuse by the Red Cross Society of funds collected for the Messina sufferers is not established. It was reported that some of the officers had applied part of the money to the support of orphanages under sectarian influences.

Blessed Jeanne D'Arc

The action of the Church in beatifying the Maid of France finds perhaps a wider and warmer sanction than was ever accorded a similar event. Writers of all schools have been prodigal of praise, notably Mark Twain in our own country and Andrew Lang abroad. Even such critics of the Maid as Anatole France who would eliminate the supernatural, concede that she was pure, brave, disinterested and supremely good. The tribute of the London Times, representative of English Protestant opinion, deserves citation.

"Even those who deride or deny the claims of Rome to pronounce on such matters will allow that few more noble figures have ever been held up to the veneration of their fellows. In the whole history of the Middle Ages there is no story more simple or more splendid, no tragedy more mournful than that of the 'poor little shepherdess' who, by her passionate faith, raised her country from the depths of degradation and dejection, to die the cruelest and most shameful of all deaths at the hands of her enemies. The elevation and the moral beauty of Joan's character have won the hearts of all men."

To eliminate the supernatural from her career is impossible. Dunois and other veteran leaders declared on oath that the Maid knew intuitively the right movements in war and statecraft better than general or statesman. She had recognized the King, read his heart, divined victories, surrenders, her own capture, the final triumph, and many other contingent events near and remote. Where did this unlettered shepherdess acquire such knowledge? All admit her truth, good sense and healthy alertness, yet she repeatedly affirmed: "I know not A from B, but I do know that God has sent me to save Orleans and crown the Dauphin," adding that in all her predictions her Voices had instructed her. Even if for a moment she denied them—and one recantation is more than doubtful, the other a proved forgery—she died for this declaration. What theory can replace it?

Jeanne d'Arc insisted from first to last that she was "sent of God"; the captains and men-at-arms who followed her in camp and field declared on oath that they regarded her as "The messenger of God," the sole Deliverer of France; and to soldier and civilian, maid and matron, "she seemed, in all that she said and did, a thing divine." To-morrow in St. Peter's Basilica, Pius X, who has already proclaimed that "she was called by God to defend her country and accomplished a feat that was deemed impossible," will solemnly ratify the sentiment of her contemporaries, and make her veneration co-extensive with the world.

Five centuries have almost run their course since her friends hailed her as a Heaven-sent Deliverer and her enemies condemned her as a sorceress. Meanwhile the passions of men have ebbed and flowed, now bearing the Maid to the altar's height, now sweeping away what memorials her friends had raised or her enemies had left. The English and their partisans had cast her ashes into the Seine, and even her heart which their fires could not violate, while their chroniclers assailed her reputation. French Huguenots and atheistic republicans tore her statues from their pedestals, as their literary heirs are trying even now to tear her image from her country's heart; but all those years the mothers and maids and true men of France have kept her memory warm. Pope Calixtus III, reversing at her mother's prayer the judgment of her enemies, vindicated her character and honor. For the rest the Church waited calmly, unmoved by partisan or national bias, till the perspective of time and change grew large enough to determine the "heroicity" of her virtues. It is only true heroes and heroines that the Church consents to crown. The practice of faith and hope, charity and chastity, justice, fortitude and other Christian virtues in an heroic degree, is an essential requisite for Beatification. The story of her life is ample proof that Jeanne d'Arc possessed this requisite.

A Soldier-Maid, a Virgin-Saint; burned on the pyre, incensed at the altar; at seventeen Deliverer of a Nation, at nineteen a Martyr—hers is a story unparalleled in history. The perfidious trial and inhuman cruelty at Rouen had one fortunate result: it drew out her heroic character and qualities and handed them down to us under oath. Every detail of her life is sworn testimony.

In 1429 three-fourths of the French people acknowledged Henry VI of England as their king, and Orleans, the only city of importance that resisted, had already proffered conditional surrender. The uncrowned and despairing Dauphin was contemplating flight, when an unlettered shepherdess of seventeen appeared before him, announced herself as "Jeanne the Maid sent of God for the deliverance of France," recognized him disguised among his courtiers and revealed the secrets of his heart. Of war she knew nothing; only in obedience to her Voices, St. Michael, St. Catherine and St. Margaret who had tutored her for years, had she "come into France"; they had told her she was "chosen by God" to free Orleans and crown the king. It mattered not that wide territories lay in the way, bristling with hostile fortresses and cities, that Rheims, the traditional sacring-place of his ancestors, was then in the hands of his enemies; God had sent her to do these things and they would be accomplished.

The Maid overruled all objections, overcame all obstacles and entered Orleans in triumph. The garrison was a demoralized rabble—"a thousand French would flee from a few hundred English"—but in a few days the Maid imposed her law on this unruly mob. Confession, Communion, Holy Mass, good conduct and reverence was her discipline; then conditions were reversed. She waved aloft her snow-white banner displaying "Jesus-Maria" and Christ blessing the lily of France, and all followed where she led. In a few days Orleans was free; in a few weeks the rout at Patay had destroyed the legend of English prowess, cities and forts surrendered, Rheims opened its gates, and the Dauphin was anointed Charles VII, King of France. As she stood by his side, holding aloft her triumphant banner, Jeanne was the idol of her people; she had not yet been tested by adversity and the sheen of her glory might have hidden deficiency of virtue. The test was at hand.

She sought no honors or recompense; she would go back to her mother and her village; but the mission of her Voices ended with the coronation, and in their silence she obeyed her King. So far she had imposed her will on King and Council; now she yields obedience without question. Though the Voices had foretold her capture "in a year and little more," she went boldly into danger. Hampered by ingratitude and treachery she harbored no resentment; and when she fell into her enemies' hands and fire and torture threatened her, she was immovably loyal to the King and Council that abandoned her.

Her trial was the cruelest mockery since the days of Caiaphas. Cauchon, a bishop expelled from his see as an English partisan, was set up by Warwick and Winchester to legalize a sentence already determined. The merciless cruelty of judge and earl brought into stronger contrast the marvelous virtues of their victim. Allowed neither counsel nor confessor, her appeal to the Pope denied, tortured by crafty interrogators in court and dungeon, the answers of this friendless, illiterate girl of nineteen manifest a power, nobility and courage worthy of a heroine and saint.

She would not betray the King's secret or permit him blame: "As for my deeds I burden no man, neither my King nor any other; if fault there be it is my own." She would not recant her Voices and her mission:

"I had rather be torn to pieces by four horses than come into France without God's leave. . . . If I saw the fires lit, if I was in flames, I would say no other thing."

When she did see the fires lit and was in flames her joyous cry rang out: "My Voices have not deceived me!" and their names were the last on her lips except the name of Jesus. "Faithful even unto death," she has won the faith of men. Her heart was cast into the Seine, but it still beats in the pulse of Christendom.

The Rehabilitation process rounds out her story, but her enemies' investigation sufficiently attests her marvelous personality, her purity, piety, gentleness, her simple fearless loyalty to God and country and an unselfishness unique in history. On every record the heroic nature of her virtues stands in relief. In her life the natural and supernatural are inseparably blended. Her piety and modesty shone out "in armed and ironed maidenhood"; she was always Jeanne the Maid. Her hands never struck the foe, but often bound their wounds. The legend on her banner, "Jesus-Maria," was written in her heart.

The testimony of her Curé and her friends is her life's epitome: "There was no one like her." Whether we view her in war or peace, in Council, Court or dungeon, on the ramparts or the pyre, truly "there was no one like her." Her Voices did more than announce her mission. St. Michael the Warrior Angel, St. Margaret the Virgin, St. Catherine tried by an unjust judge and condemned to a cruel death, surely accompanied and inspired her, and filled her soul with their characteristic notes till all had blended into a type unique, the Warrior-Martyr-Maid.

Her Voices are not silent; she interprets them to-day to a larger audience. At their call a dying nation woke and sprang into glorious life; but the faith and virtues which the Voices typified and the Maid illustrated, seem dying now in the land she loved. France with all her faults has done much for God. Her warriors saved Christian civilization on many a field and her missionaries spread it through the earth. Resplendent with the new glory of to-morrow's ceremony, the blessed Maid of France seems to exhort her people to awake once more and be faithful to that which made them glorious; seems to exhort all men to be brave and true, speaking not only through the Church that crowns her, but through the Voices of pure womanhood in which man should ever find an inspiration.

She said to Cauchon: "I appeal from you to God," and again: "To the Pope and to God first, I appeal." Both have answered. In declaring Blessed this matchless Maid, Pius X is crowning the brow of Heroism and raising Patriotism to the Altars of the Church.

Catholics and Socialism

We are frequently asked: Can a man be a socialist without ceasing to be a Catholic? How far may a Catholic accept the teachings of Socialism? What should be the attitude of a Catholic towards Socialism? Why has Socialism been condemned by the Church? What is the real meaning of Socialism? All these practically resolve themselves into this one question: "How far is Socialism consistent with Catholicity?" I shall try to answer this question as briefly as possible.

It would be foolish to make light of the grievances of labor or to condemn unreservedly all that Socialism aims at. We need not close our eyes to facts. We have nothing to fear from truth and from clear ideas on this, as on every other subject. Every intelligent Catholic admits, as well as the socialist, the glaring injustices from which the proletariat suffer. Without being a socialist, the Catholic is a social reformer; in other words he stands for the amelioration of the condition of the laboring classes; but, unlike the socialist, he desires to gain that end by legitimate means.

It would be a mistake to suppose that when you have drawn a harrowing picture of the evils growing out of the unequal distribution of wealth and the heartlessness of organized capital and greed, you have established the right of Socialism to displace the existing social order.

Both social reformer and socialist admit the need of reform, but differ in the means for its accomplishment. Both start out with the same premise: that the conditions requiring remedy are deplorable. But, says the socialist, Socialism is the only remedy, because by collectivism or common ownership it removes the cause of the evil, which is the inequality of conditions resulting from the unequal distribution of wealth. No, says the social reformer, Socialism is neither the only remedy nor any remedy at all, because it rests on false principles, is untried, impracticable, impossible, unjust, whether considered as a scientific system, a plan of reform, an industrial revolution, a practical program, a revolutionary or evolutionary theory.

There are many measures advocated by socialists and called by them socialistic which are not so, unless they be regarded as steps to the socialistic ideal. For instance, state regulation of industry, wages and hours of labor, single tax, inheritance tax, taxation of incomes, municipal or national ownership or administration of railways, gas, post-office, water, electric light, traction lines and other public utilities, are not really socialistic nor even evidence of society drifting towards Socialism. No doubt these enterprises can be fitted into a socialistic scheme, but they are quite compatible with the existing social order and some of them exist under it. As long as the right of private property remains unchallenged, unimpaired and intact, as long as compensation is given for property taken, no Catholic goes beyond his political rights or violates his religious duty by advocating such measures. Socialism has no right to claim as its exclusive possession whatever aims at the improvement of social conditions.

Many who call themselves socialists are not so in the true sense of the word. They are far from being anarchists or atheists; on the contrary, they are God-fearing men, sincerely desirous to better the condition of the poor and unwilling to adopt any unlawful means; they reject the extravagant teachings of the irreligious leaders, as far as they advert to them at all as connected with socialistic aims. They are simply mistaken and misled in supposing that Socialism, as taught to-day, is merely an economic program that has nothing to do with morality or religion. Many do not see that there is a natural antagonism between Socialism and the Church, because they ignore the distinctive marks of that economic system. Now common usage makes Socialism signify a comprehensive remedy for social evils, which proposes to transform not only the industrial system but the entire moral order on which Christian society has hitherto rested. Balfour expresses the idea very tersely when he says: "Socialism means, and can mean, nothing else, than that the community or the state, is to take all the means of production into its own hands, that private enterprise and private property are to come to an end, and all that private enterprise and private property carry with them. That is Socialism, and nothing else is Socialism."

This was the one meaning of the word recognized by Pope Leo XIII when he examined and condemned the teachings of Socialism. Whoever holds the central doctrine of collective ownership and denies the right of private property is a socialist and cannot call himself a Catholic; whoever disowns these two doctrines may be a Catholic, for he is not a socialist.

The philosophy on which Socialism rests is materialistic; its theory of human life is unchristian. The leaders of this cult continually insist that man's universe is confined to this world, that he should think only of this life. They say in theory and in practice that this is the only world worth living for, that the next world is uncertain and unknowable. They believe that man's happiness and success are measured by the amount of good things he possesses here below. In other words, the view of man's origin, end and destiny is perverted or obliterated. The rank and file of socialists are fast becoming inoculated with these opinions. It is plain that men imbued with such notions are demoralizing associates, that such an atmosphere of thought and innuendo is unwholesome and dangerous for Catholics, utterly at variance with what they are bound to believe and practise. As a consequence those who become radical socialists do not need to be read out of the Church. Experience teaches that sooner or later, of their own free will and by the logic of events and of consistency, they cease to be Catholics.

It is unfortunately too true that nearly all the leaders of Socialism are pronounced enemies of any form of supernatural religion, with all the consequences which such a position implies. In this respect Shaw, Hyndman, Quelch, Bax, Pearson, Blatchford and Bebel, agree with Marx and La Salle in regarding Christianity as an absurd superstition or worse. Almost without exception the leaders are distinctly anti-religious. If not anti-Christian and anti-theistic they are very definitely non-Christian and non-theistic. They have grafted these errors irreparably on Socialism and made them an essential part of the system. Their ultimate aim is to sweep away, with the system which gave them birth, religious institutions, morality, the constitution of the family, individualism, and all our accepted social relations.

If well meaning men among the socialists hope to conciliate the Church, the true friend of labor, the traditional helper of the working classes, the historical and natural ally of the down-trodden and oppressed, they should compel their leaders to eliminate from their programs and platforms declarations that are as unnecessary for gaining social emancipation as they are ethically unsound and religiously offensive. They should confine themselves to political and industrial agitation, without dragging in religious issues. If the leaders of Socialism had the true interests of the toiler at heart, if they sought with singleness of purpose social reform capable of immediate and effective results, they would purge the organization of materialism, atheism and unbelief; they would adopt a program acceptable to every workingman no matter what his creed; they would establish a platform so broad that no man would be obliged to do violence to his conscience and convictions in order to stand upon it. At present they practically exclude Catholics by injecting into the system tenets which no Catholic can accept. Do they realize what powerful assistance they reject, what strong opposition they invoke by their narrow, prejudiced, and short-sighted policy, by forcing to the front their intolerant and untenable religious views? We can all stand together for social reform, if it is kept free from religious entanglements; but we can never win the day till all the forces of labor are united. To accomplish this unity, common morality must be recognized and respected. The fire-eater, the radical, the bigot and the blatant unbeliever must be relegated to the rear. The liberal, broad minded, tolerant, reasonable and sensible leaders who respect religion and do no violence to the convictions and conscience of the Christian workman, must be put on guard.

Social reform needs all the allies it can muster. It should not be throttled in the house of its professed friends before it can assemble its forces.

The New Premier of Newfoundland

Sir Edward Patrick Morris, K. C., late Minister of Justice, and afterwards leader of the Opposition, has been chosen Premier of Newfoundland. He is still comparatively a young man for so exalted a position, for he was born in May, 1859, and is therefore not yet fifty. He began his education at St. Bonaventure's College, St. John's, Newfoundland, and completed his college course in the Catholic University of Ottawa. He entered the Legislative Assembly of England's oldest colony in 1885, and was Attorney-General and Minister of Justice in the Bond Cabinet from 1903 to 1907, when he joined the Opposition. Political parties in the island are so evenly balanced that the general election last November gave to each party eighteen seats. Thereupon Premier Bond asked for a dissolution and was refused. Apparently it would not have been strictly according to the constitution to dissolve parliament until the other party had made an effort to conduct the government. So Sir Robert Bond resigned, and Sir Edward Morris, the leader of the Opposition, formed a cabinet which was to meet the House on the tenth of this month. The new Catholic premier, whose father emigrated from Waterford, and whose mother was from Tipperary, will need all the resources of his well-known tact and courage to maintain what in the present circumstances may truly be called the balance of power.

The appointment of Sir Edward Morris implies a great deal more than appointment to a Governorship which is in the gift of the Crown and therefore implies no choice by a majority of the people. That a Catholic should be appointed governor of a British colony supposes indeed special personal fitness for the post, recognized as such by the authorities in London, but it does not suppose a popular vote. Still less does it suppose any kindly feeling towards Catholics. There have been several Catholic governors of largely Protestant provinces, but their appointment was never taken as a sign that Protestant prejudice was diminishing there.

In one sense appointment to the premiership of a self-governing British colony means even more than the election to the presidency of a republic, in that the presidents of most republics—Mexico, which under Porfirio Diaz is a republic only in name, being the notable exception—are elected only for a fixed term of years, whereas a prime minister may remain in power so long as he retains his popularity. For instance, Sir Wilfred Laurier has been Prime Minister of Canada for nearly thirteen years, and Sir Oliver Mowat was Premier of Ontario for twenty-four years.

In a presidential election in this country, the President may be chosen first of all, and then, by consequence, the party he represents. Generally speaking, in the British system the contrary takes place. It is first the party which is victorious, then the most popular member thereof is chosen premier. When the General Election results in a tie, one of two things may happen: either a new election takes place or the Premier resigns with his cabinet and another member is called upon by the Governor to form a new cabinet. This latter alternative was adopted by the Governor of Newfoundland, who sent for an Opposition member to offer him the premiership. As Sir Edward Morris is the recognized chief of this party, the Governor naturally offered him the premiership. This offer is tantamount to king-making, for as soon as the premier accepts, the governor practically becomes his obedient humble servant, a mere signing machine. The governor may, indeed, in a moment of political crisis, dismiss one prime minister and choose another; this actually happened in Canada twice since Confederation and each time in the Province of Quebec, which has always been bolder in its interpretation of the constitution of Canada than any other of the federated provinces; but the governor must be very sure of popular approval before he dares to adopt so drastic a measure.

So long as the premier of a British province commands a good working majority of the Legislature, he is practically the ruler of his province. He may even introduce fundamental constitutional changes which would be impossible in the American system without a direct appeal to the vote of the people. If, for example, those intermittent bursts of agitation against the continuance of the Canadian Senate were to become chronic and widespread, the prime minister of Canada might bring about the abolition of that important parliamentary body which, at the time of the confederation, forty-two years ago, was considered a mighty bulwark of British traditions. In point of fact two at least of the Canadian provinces, Manitoba and New Brunswick, which started with an upper as well as a lower house of legislature, have abolished the former without a word of protest from the federal authorities at Ottawa.

To those who bear in mind that Newfoundland continued to persecute and ostracize Catholics long after such unwise conduct had gone out of fashion in other British colonies, the choice of Sir Edward Patrick Morris, a staunch Irish Catholic, as premier of the oldest of English colonies redounds both to his own credit and to that of the people of Newfoundland.

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

Emily Virginia Mason

On the 16th day of last February, Emily Virginia Mason died in the City of Washington. It was the end of a life which nearly reached the span of a century, for it began in 1815. Emily Mason was a woman of very exceptional gifts of nature, easily a leader, decided and ready in her judgments, clear visioned as to both persons and circumstances, and withal of wonderful refinement of character—anything but a mannish woman.

During just half of her long life she was non-Catholic. Brought up "a genuine Episcopalian," as she said, "I was confirmed at the age of fifteen, and prayed and attended Church just as any ordinary good girl would do." But she further explained that this was pretty much on the surface of her soul, being rather religiosity than religion. The events of her early life were of such interest as to quite absorb her, and distract her mind from things divine. Her family were the Masons of Gunstan Hall, her uncle being George Mason, the intimate friend of General Washington, with whom he bears company on the great monument in Capitol Square, Richmond. Her education was solid, and she improved it by serious reading up to the very end of her life. She accompanied her father to the Territory of Michigan in 1831, and was a bright ornament in the home of her brother, Stevens T. Mason, whilst he served his two terms as Governor of that State.

Returning to Virginia in the forties, she shared the various fortunes of her family, always admired and sought after, but never marrying. During the early fifties she lived in Alexandria, adjacent to the Episcopal Seminary, having intimate acquaintance with the late Bishop Johns to whom she was related by marriage, and with many notable clergymen, at that time professors or students at the Seminary, among them being the late Henry Potter, Bishop of New York. These associations were the primal causes of her entering the Catholic Church.

During their social intercourse in Miss Mason's parlors and dining room, she heard them discuss religion. They were, to her surprise and scandal, all at variance about the gravest Christian doctrines, made no scruple of showing it, and even joked about it. They have no rule of Christian faith, she thought, and she wondered and was distressed. Here were her first gleams of holy doubt. She had previously come across a volume of "Tracts for the Times," read it attentively, and imbibed High Church principles.

Her doubts were soon transformed into peremptory assaults of conscience. "It was trouble that started me afoot in search of true religion," she afterwards said, "financial difficulties, and the saddest visitations of death. My Episcopalianism gave me no strength to suffer. It was of some help in prosperity and totally broke down in adversity. I made up my mind to get to the bottom of the religious question, and I wrote to Bishop McGill. He sent me a kind letter and some books which I devoured greedily. One Sunday afternoon I stole away to the Catholic Church in Alexandria so as to see what Catholic worship felt like. I had often been to St. Ann's Church, Detroit, but my mind was then too girlish, and I was overflowing with the gaities of our life there, so the religion staid outside of me. As I went into the church in Alexandria Benediction was just being given. I stood at the back of the pews, looked towards the Altar, all ablaze with candles, and heard the little bell ringing. I went over to a man kneeling and almost prostrate, and said to him: 'What does that bell mean?' He quickly reached up his hand and pulled my sleeve, and said: 'That's God! kneel down!' And down I knelt." She experienced a sensation little less than miraculous on this occasion.

After the service she sought an interview with one of the Jesuit Fathers who served the parish at that time. Some months afterwards she was received into the Church by Bishop O'Reilly of Hartford, in which city she was visiting a Mrs. Barnard, a member of the Desnoyer family whom Miss Mason had known intimately in Detroit. Said her sister to her: "If it were my cook that became a Catholic, I shouldn't mind it; but my sister!—well, I suppose I must be resigned to the disgrace."

No sooner a Catholic than an apostle. It is not too much to say that Emily Mason, from the day of her conversion till extreme old age, joined in every Catholic work of charity or religion she could get into, and always took a masterful share. Nor was this mere outward activity. She was one of the most devout women her priestly friends ever knew; so all of them will testify. She was well acquainted with the entire range of ordinary ascetical literature, and even with not a few of the mystical writers. She was ever a frequent communicant, and a first rate convert-maker. Her aristocratic lineage, her delightful conversational powers, her widely extended acquaintance, her wit, her stately grace and even beauty of person, all were used wholly for God and His Church. Charity of various kinds was her favorite occupation. Her career was interrupted by the Civil War, which drove her North out of Washington and Baltimore, where she had principally resided. So powerful a figure did she present that the Secretary of War had her shadowed by detectives as far as New York City. She threw them off at last, and obtained letters to Archbishop Purcell, who in turn secured her passage up the Ohio and Kenawha to General Rosecrans' headquarters in the Gauley mountains, late in the autumn of 1861. She was sent by the General under flag of truce into the Confederate lines and immediately took charge of hospital work for wounded and sick soldiers. Her experiences from the beginning to the end of the war should have been given the advantage of detailed narrative. A slight glimpse of their absorbing interest is enjoyed in reading some articles she published in the Atlantic Monthly, as late as the autumn of 1902.

The war over, Miss Mason at once took charge of the orphan girls of Confederate soldiers. Some of these she still cared for up to her last illness. "Pretty old orphans by this time," she said smilingly. She fed and clad and schooled and married them, loving them like a mother. How did she get the money to do it? She gave all she could of her own little means—not much, to be sure—and she begged everywhere and with a resistless mendicancy. One of the sources of revenue was her pen, which was like the rod of Moses in the wilderness, bringing forth flowing streams of charitable contributions. A by-product of this is found in several beautiful and historically valuable pieces concerning the great war. Perhaps her best service to the literature of that epoch is a compilation of the songs of the Confederacy, exhibiting a singularly interesting collection of poetical attempts, a good number of them having decided lyrical merit, all of them bearing valuable witness to the tone and temper of the South during the awful struggle between the sections.

The close of her remarkable career was illustrated by the high honors given to her brother, Stevens T. Mason, by the State of Michigan. By the zealous exertions of a young friend of Miss Mason's, Mr. Hugo Gilmartin, of the Detroit Free Press, the legislature of the State made a generous appropriation for the removal of the Governor's remains to Detroit, and an artistic statue of bronze was erected on the site of the first State House. Last Decoration Day Miss Mason unveiled the statue amid splendid civil and military ceremonial, in the presence of the Governor and Mayor and very many other dignitaries, as well as a great assemblage of citizens. This home-coming of Michigan's first and greatest chief magistrate was to his long surviving sister an event of indescribable interest.

It was the forecast of her death, which was full of the most edifying incidents of piety. As she entered Holy Church under the auspices of the Jesuit Fathers, so did she profit by their ministrations when she entered her happy eternity, as her dwelling at the time of her death was in the Jesuit parish of Holy Trinity, Georgetown, D. C.

ROME, MARCH 28, 1909.

I cannot more usefully begin my collaboration with your paper than by giving your readers a short sketch of our political, economic and religious situation. It is a matter not always understood very clearly by outsiders, and the difficulty of grasping it must be vastly increased in a Democratic country such as America. It will be my endeavor to be brief though accurate.

As might have been expected, the result of the recent elections has not substantially altered the position of the government. The Liberal-Progressive Party, which had been in power, retains out of a chamber of 508 Deputies, its old majority of 300 votes, which assures its life, and, if we may believe, its program pledges it to action. True, the socialists have gained some seats; but on the other hand the radicals and certain groups of the right, opposed to the government more on personal than on political grounds, have lost correspondingly. The radical seats have been gained for the most part by what are known as the Catholic Deputies, i. e., men of religious belief who have accepted the revolution as a fait accompli, and stand for certain principles, but do not in any way form a Catholic party, no such party existing or being possible in the Chamber.

The speech from the Throne was more remarkable for what it did not say than for what it did. Under the circumstances this is something to be grateful for, and was hardly to be expected from the King, whose sympathies with the anti-clerical bloc becomes more and more pronounced. The "wise ones" think, and rightly, that he is playing with fire. In any case it is clear the Giolitti ministry is more than strong; political elections cannot trouble it; it will break up when it is ready and then will come chaos and confusion, and our home and foreign policy as well as our social economic situation must suffer.

At this moment there is no question of burning importance in domestic legislation before the Chamber. The immensity of the Sicilian disaster is now but a memory. Politics easily make us forget the nation's sorrows. The whole world flew to our assistance; it only remains to be seen how that assistance will be made use of. The contributions received by the Pope will most assuredly reach the proper quarters: the six million francs ($1,200,000) he received have been entrusted for distribution to faithful hands. The government has nominated a committee for the orphans, but its partisan methods are not approved of by open-minded men. The strikes which brought such misery in Emilia are over; capital has won another fight against labor, and at this writing it would seem that the Italian Socialist party, taught by its past failures, does not intend to employ strike methods again in a hurry.

Just now there is no serious danger of an anti-clerical movement in Italy. To be convinced of this it is only necessary to review the actual situation. Freemasonry, it is true, is actively allied with Socialism, but the Italian mind continues to be deeply Christian in spite of everything, and a little effort on the part of lovers of order and religion will yet save Italy from material and moral disaster. Moreover, neither the present Chamber nor the government itself will ever join hands with the faction which tried to stir up religious war such as that which France has gone through. The fact is that in the Chamber there is an absolute majority of men sent there by the direct aid of Catholics, who, with the permission of the Holy See, voted at the late elections. Again, the government, apart altogether from the fact that the ministry always respects the opinion of the Chamber, has everything to gain from keeping on good terms with the party of law and order, even though in so doing it does not always meet the hearty approval of the Quirinal, which would gladly see the government in the hands of the bloc.

The government's main object in keeping peace at home is to be in a position to assist in keeping peace away from home. Italy's position in the European concert is well known. For the past twenty-five years it has been bound in a solemn alliance which does not permit of independent action in matters of importance; and indeed unaided it is unequal to carry any such action through. Rome, Vienna and Berlin joined together, make up a moral force the like of which there is not in Europe, and it is to be hoped this triple alliance always uses its power in the cause of justice. Rome and Berlin are fast friends, and although, as the German Chancellor puts it, Italy takes an occasional waltz with the hated France, Berlin pretends not to see and condones these petty unfaithfulnesses of itsmorganatic partner. This imperial generosity is appreciated in Rome; and it is another cause of gratitude that Berlin does not object to Italy's fifty year old friendship with England, another antagonist of Germany. With Vienna things are not quite on the same footing; if the alliance with Berlin is more or less a marriage of love, that with Vienna is purely a matter of convenience. The terms of the triple alliance are kept fairly secret, but it is well known that the maintaining of United Italy is one of the conditions under which Italy joined the alliance. Rome and Vienna have common interests in the Adriatic, and trade interests between the two countries are extensive.

To complete my sketch of the situation in Italy, I must touch on the religious question. The relations between official Italy and the Vatican are those of an armistice in politics, and of peace in matters of administration. The government, by means of its administration, seeks to co-operate with the Church in every possible way. This will be dealt with in a future letter, and facts given in proof of it. Politically the Roman Question, which is never spoken of, is the stumbling-block, and time rather than the schemes of men must remove it. But the religious question has another side of more actual interest and ecclesiastical importance. I mean the struggle against Modernism, which periodically causes lamentable episodes. Modernism in Italy is rather a matter of discipline than intellect or advance of thought. It may be looked on as a result of the wild-cat Christian Democracy Agitation of unhappy memory, now dead and buried for some years. Out of its dishonored ashes arose a spirit of independence which led away some of the younger clergy, in certain parts of Italy, more eager for novelty than for depth and soundness of doctrine.

The leader of Christian Democracy was the Rev. R. Murri, a priest, a clever speaker, by no means an orator, conceited but shallow, who, by his words and his writings, has led many astray. Two years ago he was suspended a divinis, but not won back from his headlong course; in fact, suspension seems to have made him reckless in his utterances, and it is with regret it must be noted that he continued to receive secret encouragement from the malcontent element of the clergy. In the recent political elections he stood as candidate for one of the districts in the Marches, got the support of the Socialists and was elected deputy. The Holy See admonished him canonically, and then excommunicated him with the greater excommunication, which, under the present discipline of the Church, simply means exclusion a divinis. This is the latest event in the war against Modernism in Italy. Elsewhere, as I have said, Modernism may be an intellectual movement, but in Italy it is almost entirely a revolt against authority. You must know that after the publication of the Encyclical Pascendi, containing such a keen analysis of the heresy of the twentieth century, there were some who drew up an intricate classification of Modernism, and discovered a political and sociological Modernism in what was but an abortion of true Catholic teaching and papal instruction on such matters. So that from Modernism of thought, which is the real and genuine Modernism, the name Modernists was given to all those who happened to differ in any way from these writers; and the result of this superabundance of polemics has injured rather than aided the cause of truth, which has no worse enemy than a poor or over-zealous advocate. However, wisdom is making itself heard at last, language is becoming more moderate, and bitterness is dying out; for it has always been the wish of the Holy See, while hating error and sin, to be gentle and kind to the sinner.

I do not go into further particulars owing to exigencies of space. If need be, in a future letter I can return to the matter and endeavor to make it clear. The religious no less than the political situation of the Church in Italy is far from being in a bad way.

The Late Post Office Strike in Paris

PARIS, APRIL 3, 1909.

The post office strike that took place in Paris last month is an event of some importance, not so much on account of its immediate consequences as by reason of the light it throws on certain mental and moral conditions that are fraught with danger. For the first time the post office servants of a great nation, by proclaiming a strike, placed the Government of their country in a position of grave difficulty and caused financial and commercial losses, the extent of which is considerable.

Strangely enough, the crisis that so closely affected the safety and well being of thousands, did not, as might have been expected, excite the indignation of the public, and this is in itself a significant symptom, as it reveals, on the part of the conservative and orderly fraction of the nation, a latent and unexpected feeling of sympathy with the malcontents. Indeed, to all thoughtful minds the recent crisis assumes proportions far beyond those of a mere ordinary strike; it has a deeper meaning, it implies danger ahead, a danger that touches upon the whole system of government in France.

To the general public, to foreigners especially, the strike came as a surprise; not so, however, to those who, for years past, have noticed the growth of a spirit of discontent, not among the avowed revolutionists and socialists, but among the quiet, steady, peace-loving class of public servants, who hitherto seemed free from subversive tendencies.

The grievances which the post office strikers brought forward to justify their rebellion were founded on the arbitrary methods of M. Simyan, who fills the post of Postmaster-General. In a certain measure their grievances appear justified, and M. Simyan's antecedents are not calculated to inspire confidence. He was originally a second rate doctor in the département du Rhône, noted for his socialistic opinions, and he owes his present position rather to his radicalism than to his ability. He is accused, by his female subordinates especially, of roughness and rudeness in his manner, an accusation that would hardly justify so serious a measure as a strike if it were not backed up by graver charges. The rebels complained that M. Simyan, by changing the mode of promotion that previously existed in the post office, opened the door to favoritism and injustice. They asserted that their political and religious opinions were made the subject of harassing "espionage"; that, if these opinions happened to be contrary to those advocated by the government, they were exposed to unfair and tyrannical measures. Thus, a certain "directrice des postes" in Brittany was removed to an inferior post, not because she in any way failed to fulfill her duties, but simply because she was present at a religious procession and allowed her son to be enrolled among the choir boys of the parish church. Although all the discontented "employés des postes" are not by any means martyrs for the faith, instances of intolerance such as this one are of frequent occurrence among French officials, a fact that the citizens of a free country find it difficult to grasp.

In addition to the accusations of favoritism and injustice brought against M. Simyan and generally supported, it must be owned, by strong evidence, the Postmaster-General is considered as possessing neither the technical knowledge nor the moral influence that are necessary to one in command. His subordinates are aware that he was, in past years, one of the most fiery promoters of the unjustifiable strikes of Monceau les Mines, and that a newspaper, edited under his auspices, invariably encourages strikes throughout the country. He was, therefore, peculiarly disqualified to control the rebels of the post office. Moreover, he is known to be a tool in the hands of the advanced radical and anti-clerical party, and finally, as we have observed, he has modified the system of promotion in the post office in a manner that leaves him free to favor those whose political and religious opinions fall in with the views of his party.

The post office officials have, it must be owned, endeavored for many months past to state their grievances to and to obtain redress from their chiefs, but their efforts met with no response. Vague hopes and promises were held out to them, but, as a rule, their demands were put aside with a contemptuous indifference that exasperated the delegates who spoke in the name of the rest. When once the strike was proclaimed it was directed with an earnestness and energy that, if we consider the possible consequences of the movement, were strangely impressive. The strikers never asked for an increase of salary; they demanded certain alterations in M. Simyan's rules, and, above all, they clamored for his dismissal.

Their claims were, no doubt, partly justified, but, taken as a whole, the strike is a dangerous symptom. "Every feature of it," says an English paper, "points to the movement as an outline of the great political revolution which is being persistently and mathematically prepared by the leaders of the syndicates or unions." And, after making every allowance for the strikers' righteous indignation, the fact remains that they caused grave danger and discomfort to their country.

It is easy to imagine the heavy loss entailed by the strike in the world of finance and trade, but only those who were staying in France last March can realize the curious feeling of isolation that was experienced in Paris and in the provinces. The postal service was suddenly interrupted, the telegraph ceased to act, and, at one time, even the telephone could not be used. Business losses were estimated at £500,000 daily, and at one time it appeared as if Paris, the headquarters of the movement, was to be deprived of food as well as of letters. The tradesmen who sell provisions at the "Halles" were prevented either from corresponding with their purveyors in the provinces or from sending them money; consequently the latter ceased to buy or to send provisions of meat, vegetables and eggs to the Paris market. A few important firms formed an association and sent messengers to Belgium daily to post letters or telegrams to their correspondents on the Continent. In a town in the south of France, twelve hours from Paris, the presence of a Paris doctor was required for an urgent case, but as neither a letter nor a telegram could reach him a messenger was despatched by train to bring him back. The Mayor of Biarritz, with remarkable enterprise, organized a special courier service for English visitors and sent a messenger to Dover with letters and instructions to bring back the replies. Many English and American travelers, however, who were expecting remittances, found themselves in sore distress for a few days.

A curious and unexpected feature of the crisis was the equanimity with which the excitable and emotional French people bore the material loss and grievous anxiety that attended the strike. Even the conservative papers struck a note of extreme indulgence with regard to the rebels, betraying more sympathy with them than with a government whose unprincipled policy was the real cause of the movement.

The situation of the ministers was, during some days, one of extreme difficulty, and M. Barthou, the minister of "les Travaux publics," faced it with a certain energy. Not only were communications stopped between Paris and the provinces; worse still: at a moment when the possibility of war in the East caused general agitation, the French Government was cut off from its agents beyond the frontier.

At the outset the Government endeavored to frighten the rebels into submission, but soon the set purpose and quiet perseverance of the leaders of the strike impressed the Cabinet and negotiations were opened. The post office delegates were received by the Ministers and in the end all their demands were granted save one—M. Simyan, their hated chief, being allowed for the time being, to remain at his post. It has been argued that by entering into negotiations with the strikers the Government betrayed its weakness, but no other course was open to the Ministers, whose moral strength has been long since weakened by their concessions to the radical party. Certain features of the post office strike are distinctly alarming: for the first time a class of public servants, well known as steady, quiet, respectable men and women, suddenly rebelled against their chiefs; their grievances, however real they might appear, being out of all proportion with the grave evils entailed by the movement.

But the real secret of the crisis lies deeper than the discontent of the post office servants; it is part of a social system that is at the present moment thoroughly undermined. For years past, the Government has flattered the evil passions of the multitudes; it has urged the working classes to assert their rights and neglected to teach them their duties; it has deceived them by false promises of wealth, emancipation and happiness, and, by its crafty and relentless religious persecution, it has destroyed in the souls of the young the principles that alone make a nation morally strong.

The form of government matters little, but whether it be a monarchy or a republic, every Government that wishes to exercise a powerful influence must needs hold to the fundamental principles of justice, religion and morality that are the basis of public order and peace.

The power of syndicates, associations and unions among workers of all description is gaining ground in France as elsewhere; it would be folly to run counter to the movement, but, to direct it wisely and well, needs higher ideals and a stronger hand than those of the men who, at present, control the destinies of the country. "We can hardly call Government an association of politicians whose object is to use for their own ends the passions and vices of the democracy," writes M. Jules Delafosse, a leading French journalist; and M. Maurice Barrès, a member of the French Academy, touches the right note when he points out that Cabinet ministers who owe their official position to the encouragement they have given to strikes, are hardly qualified to preach order, discipline and respect to their discontented subordinates.

An English Outlook

LONDON, APRIL 3, 1909.

The Catholic episcopate in England has lost one of its veterans by the death of Dr. William Anthony Johnson, Titular Bishop of Arindela, March 27. Bishop Johnson was a Londoner, born as long ago as 1832. He studied at Douai and at the English College in Rome, where he was ordained in the Advent of 1857, and where, two years later, he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity. When he began his work as a priest in the newly established diocese of Westminster, Cardinal Wiseman was at its head. One Sunday in 1865 his successor, Archbishop Manning heard Dr. Johnson preach a sermon, and next day to his utter astonishment the young priest was summoned to the Archbishop's house and told that he was to live there as one of his secretaries.

This was the beginning of forty-four years of unbroken activity under three successive Archbishops. He became Archbishop Manning's chief secretary and in many ways his right hand man. Cardinal Vaughan kept him by his side in the same capacity. He had been made a canon of the Metropolitan Chapter and gradually became its senior, when he was appointed its provost. In 1904 he was named Vicar-General, and next year on his completion of forty years of work at the Archbishop's House the bishops of England unanimously requested the Archbishop to petition the Pope to recognize Dr. Johnson's service to the Church by raising him to the episcopate. Hence the Titular Bishopric of Arindela, an honor Dr. Johnson would have avoided if he could, for there never was a more unassuming wearer of the mitre.

London journalists, non-Catholic as well as Catholic, will long remember with gratitude his patient, helpful courtesy whenever they came to him for information. He made friends of all who had any dealings with him. To the poor he was a generous helper. Most of the purse his friends presented to him, when he was raised to the episcopate, was very quickly distributed in this way. There never was a harder, more persevering worker. In those forty-four years he never took any holidays but a single day of rest now and then. Once after many years he was persuaded to go away for a real rest and change of scene. The cab was at the door. His portmanteau was carried out. He had taken his seat and was telling the driver which station to go to, when a telegram was handed to him. "I must attend to this," he said, and went back into the house. He began writing at his desk, presently his luggage was brought back, and the cab went away. The holiday was deferred and then abandoned. He worked on without any real rest, and at last died in harness. His death was the result of a severe cold, of the influenza type, ending in bronchitis.

The bishops of England and Wales usually meet at Archbishop's House in Low Week. This year this annual conference has been deferred to a later date to enable the English episcopate to be represented at Rome at the beatification of Jeanne d'Arc on Sunday, April 18th. There will also be a strong contingent of English Catholic laymen. It is felt that there will be historic justice in this act of reparation on the part of England to the memory of "The Maid," and all must admit that it will also be a manifestation of sympathy for the Church in France.

Last year when the Archbishop of Cologne sent one of his canons to the London Congress to invite its members to the gathering on the Rhine in the coming autumn, he sent a very special invitation to the French, asking them to come in as large numbers as possible, and promising them a welcome that would show there was no question of frontiers and rival nationalities when it was a matter of uniting in doing honor together to the Holy Eucharist. Now that such persistent efforts are being made in certain quarters to create bad blood between England and Germany, there is the same reason for English Catholics being eager to give practical proof of their brotherly union with those of Germany. It is gratifying to note that in the navy debate in the Reichstag, last week, one of the Catholic leaders urged strongly that the Government should strive to come to an agreement in checking the ruinous competition in armaments that had begun between Germany and England.

This naval question has loomed large in politics here for a fortnight. There has been a good deal that is artificial about the scare in its latest developments. To tell the whole story of the crisis would be a long business. I can only touch on some points that must be noted if one is to realize what has actually been happening. Cabinet secrets are usually well kept, but for some weeks back, though ministers said nothing definite, the talk of their intimate associates was enough to reveal that there were two parties in the cabinet each bitterly aggrieved at the other's conduct. There is no doubt there was a sharp controversy in progress between the Asquith-Haldane group with its Imperialist leanings, and the Economists headed by Lloyd-George. In the end there was a compromise. Instead of building the eight big ships for which the Navy League and other advocates of a huge navy were clamoring, the Government announced that four ships would be built for certain, and that they would ask for powers to lay down four more if they thought it necessary. In announcing this decision Mr. Asquith made a decidedly alarmist speech in the House of Commons. The pith of it was that the Government had become aware that Germany was building big battleships at a much more rapid rate than the published naval program had indicated, and generally increasing her ship and gun building resources in a way that made a neck and neck shipbuilding race with England quite possible, and that we must keep the lead at all costs. The speech was apparently meant to silence any efforts of the Radical and economical wing of the Liberals to divide the party on the naval question. It is most curious that Mr. Asquith did not state that the information as to the laying down of extra ships in Germany had been communicated to our Admiralty by the German Government itself, with an explanation that it would not increase the final number built and was only a measure of temporary convenience to keep certain private yards employed.

The Opposition seized on Mr. Asquith's statement as a proof that the Admiralty had been caught napping. Whatever the newspapers may have said there was no real alarm in the country. It was, and is, an artificially worked up agitation, but it will rally a considerable amount of support because it appeals to the Jingo imperialist sentiment, that is not peculiar to England, but makes the crowd in most countries shout, now for a big army, now for a big navy, something bigger than any one else has if possible—most of the shouting being done precisely by those people who have not to deplete their own belongings very much in the way of taxes.

The Opposition—not over-wisely—moved a vote of censure in the House of Commons. It gave Sir Edward Grey the opportunity of assuring the House that British relations with Germany were excellent, but that at the same time it would not be easy to propose a mutual reduction of armaments for the present on account of our maritime position. England could only enter on an agreement that would still keep her well in front of Germany, and our neighbors could hardly be asked formally to agree to this inferiority. The proposed censure was rejected by a majority of over 200, but the agitation will go on.

All the by-elections point the same way. The Government has disappointed many of those who were its own supporters, by its exaggerated militarism on the one hand, with the piling up of heavy taxation, and on the other by its truckling now to aggressive labor, now to the intolerant wing of the Nonconformists. Times have been bad, unemployment rife and business slack. This has enabled the Protectionists, who have captured the Tory Party, to raise the cry of "Tariff Reform the Remedy"—"England for the English"—"Taxation of the Foreigner," and the rest. They are undoubtedly making many converts. We Catholics sink all other issues in that of the defence of our schools and this has ranged us against the Government. When the General Election comes there can be no practical doubt that the Opposition will come into power with a good working majority. The Irish party will be as strong as ever, and probably the balance of parties will place it in a better position to exact concessions from the new Government. (By the way, Parnell used always to say that Home Rule would be given by a Tory Government when the time was ripe, because only such a Government could control the House of Lords.) The signs of the times point to a diminution of the present Labor party of 32, and the party is embarrassed by the decision of the Courts that trades union funds must not be used for political purposes, such as paying election expenses and a living wage to Labor Members of Parliament. Socialism is for the time being in the minds of all thinking men a less danger to England than militarism and Jingoism.

The Guadalajara Trouble

Religion is taken seriously in Guadalajara, Mexico. The disturbances which occurred there lately, were occasioned by the circulation of a blasphemous publication which was scattered throughout the town. The blasphemy called for reparation, and, as our correspondent there telegraphed, solemn reparation services were held in the different churches. Some irreligious newspapers scoffed at these manifestations, adding further outrages. The Archbishop, Mgr. Ortiz, publicly censured these papers, and forbade the reading of one of them. Protests, signed by thousands of prominent Catholics, were issued against the outburst of anti-Catholic prejudice; a paper was published to resist this outbreak, a sharp controversy ensued, personal rancor was stirred, and the Governor privately intervened to quiet the agitation. There is now no disturbance, and the public blasphemy has been stopped.

The Facts in Prof. Schnitzer's Case

In the first number for April The Outlook resents the action of the Holy See in censuring Professor Schnitzer, of the University of Munich, and attempts to throw discredit on Rome for issuing against him what it terms an "automatic excommunication." Apparently, The Outlook did not take the trouble to ascertain the facts in this case. Professor Schnitzer could no more be tolerated by the authorities of the Church than could the venerable editor of The Outlook be retained in his position, were he to abandon his devotion to civic righteousness. In order to learn what precisely Professor Schnitzer had done, we cabled to the Central Bureau of the German Volksverein in München-Gladbach, Prussia, and obtained the following despatch:

The professor had written several articles in the Süd-deutsche Monatshefte on the study of legends, in which he declared that the miracles and resurrection of Christ are only legendary additions. Miracles, he says, cannot be recognized at all, and must therefore be ignored by the historical. In February, 1908, he published in the Internationale Wochenschrift a criticism full of hatred and abuse of the Pope's encyclical on Modernism. Thereupon, the suspensio a divinis was inflicted upon him, i. e., he was no longer allowed to perform the duties of the ministry. At the same time the students were forbidden to attend his lectures. The professor refused to submit. To postpone the issue, he made a journey to Japan, to continue, as he said, his studies on comparative theology. After his return he joined the philosophical faculty; but as he had not yet submitted to the ecclesiastical authorities, they did not allow him to teach that branch, and since he persisted in his error, he was excommunicated. The excommunication was at first private but will now become public, as he continues to write against the ecclesiastical authorities.

The next time The Outlook talks assertively about papal excommunications, we shall know how to discount its utterances.

Dr. Patton and the Pope

In the confusion of misunderstanding and of adverse criticism which even at this late day is prevalent among non-Catholic teachers and writers in their comments on the stand taken by the Church authorities in regard to Modernism, it is refreshing to find a vastly kinder tone ringing out of the utterance of one of their great leaders in this country. Dr. Francis L. Patton, president of the Princeton Theological Seminary, an institution which appears to have lost none of the strong orthodoxy of Dr. McCosh's day, recently lectured in Buffalo on the fundamentals of Christianity: "Is there a personal God, and has He spoken to us through Jesus Christ." During his stay in Buffalo he was interviewed by the Buffalo Express and was asked: "Do you think liberal theology is weakening our churches?" "Yes, I do," was his reply. "Are the liberalizing influences growing?" "Yes, and the situation is going to be worse before it grows better," Dr. Patton said with emphasis, "the churches are drifting away from the doctrine of the Incarnation." "Then you sympathize with Pope Pius and his stand on Modernism," the reporter further questioned. "Yes, in a way I do," replied the Princeton theologian. And after a moment of deep thought, he added: "Yes, I agree with the Pope in his protest against the extension of liberal theology and those in the Catholic Church who are advancing it."

The veteran Presbyterian leader is right. The situation threatens to grow decidedly worse before it grows better. The loose manner in which the vital doctrines of Christianity are handled among us to-day, the flippancy of the so-called arguments advanced in dealing with such fundamental questions as the existence of a personal God, the divinity of Christ, the immortality of the soul, the existence of hell with its eternal punishment cannot but create danger to the simple faith of the less cultured among us. Not fortified by the sturdy strength of devoted study to cast aside the difficulties suggested, they meet the poison of liberal theology in our cheap popular magazines, in our daily newspapers, in books which crowd the shelves of public libraries; our Christian dogmas are coming to be the subject of scoffing doubt, and of ridicule among the lowly in factories, in workshops, and even, if our Catholic workingmen are not shaken in their faith, they are frequently at a loss to answer the flippancy of modern thought that has filtered down among them. Does one wonder that the honest orthodoxy of the old Presbyterian churchman makes him agree with the Pope in his protest against the extension of liberal theology.

Strong But Not Extreme

Many of the Catholic papers of the land have been pleased to quote the statement of the well known Cardinal Mercier of Mechlin, made during a recent visit to Rome for the consecration of the new Church of Our Lady Immaculate and St. John Berchmans, a gift of the Catholics of Belgium. They have, however, emphasized but one thought of the great Churchman, that of the necessity of consecrating our forces to the development of the Catholic press. There is in his utterance still another note which, as it expresses a vital character of AMERICA, induces us to give in full the statement made by the Cardinal. . . . "Talking about newspapers, permit me to express the pain I feel every time I come to Rome and find that the immoral and anti-clerical press is every day gaining ground. This morning I went to celebrate Mass at the Church of St. Frances of Rome in the Forum. It was early, and near the church stood a news vendor. Everyone of the workingmen who passed by bought a paper and went on reading it attentively. They were all anti-clerical sheets. And then I thought: How is it that you do not succeed in giving greater development and circulation to the Catholic press in Rome? Take my word for it, the necessity of consecrating our forces to the development of the press is a necessity of capital importance at the present moment. I, bishop as I am, would delay the building of a church in order to help in the founding of a newspaper." . . . "These papers" (he is speaking of the Catholic newspapers spread among the people in Belgium) "are sincerely and entirely Catholic in spirit and intention, but they do not flaunt themselves unnecessarily as Catholic. We never fail to have in them articles and news that interest the different classes, and we give as little as possible of an explicitly sacred or religious tone. Thus our papers are made interesting to all kinds of readers, who become indoctrinated with sound views on moral and social questions."

Patriotism and Religion in France

There were some fine exhibitions of patriotism and religion in France lately, which even Clemenceau's arbitrary rule was obliged to respect. The first was the rebellion of the university students against Mr. Thalamas, because of his lectures against St. Joan of Arc. The hall became a pandemonium. The police were unable to protect him against the hoots and groans of his pupils, and he could not make his appearance in the lecture room. The Government had to remove him from the professorial chair; even the Minister of Public Instruction, Doumergue, a Protestant, was unable to sustain him. Many students were arrested, tried and convicted. Their parents assisted at the Assizes, and were proud that their sons should go to prison for such a cause.

Mr. Camille Bellaigue is the musical critic on the Revue des Deux Mondes. His two sons, aged fourteen and twelve, had been arrested by the police, but when brought before the Judge, they were acquitted, not because they had not taken part in the commotion, but because they were considered to have acted without discernment. Their father, who was present, seemed to be sorry for the acquittal of his sons. "But," he interposed, "if you don't condemn my sons, you ought to condemn me. I wish to declare, and it is my right to do so, that I claim for myself the responsibility of a father in all its civil, civic and above all penal bearing, if that is possible, for all that my sons have done. Young they may be, yet they fully realized what they were doing, and I deem it an honor that they acted as they did in behalf of the religion of their country. You cannot reproach me with not encouraging them, on the day of Mr. Thalamas's first lecture. I, myself, brought them to the Sorbonne, and together we had the common joy of being among those who hissed and hooted down the professor from the chair he was occupying unworthily. In the streets, that very day, I shouted, 'A bas, Thalamas! Long live Jeanne d'Arc.'" Other parents came and spoke in the same strain, proud of their sons and of the noble lesson of religion and patriotism they had given them. Mr. Lecomte spoke even more boldly to the judge when defending his son: "You are a Freemason," he said to the judge, "and Thalamas is a Freemason. This process itself is first and foremost a masonic affair, and therefore you are incompetent, ratione personæ, to pass a judgment." Such plain speaking is of happy augury for the country.

Less than thirty years ago General Hancock, then standard-bearer of the Democratic hosts, was made the butt of every petty paragrapher in the land, because he had said the tariff was only a local issue and should, therefore, not enter into national politics. Were he with us to-day how complete his vindication! The entanglements that make Speaker Cannon weary, and the vested interests that cry to Chairman Payne for considerate action show that either this tariff of ours is a purely local issue or it is selfishness run mad! Eastern interests, northern interests, the interests of the middle west, western interests, southern interests; protection for lumber, coal, iron, a duty of ten per cent. on hides, higher taxes on stockings, gloves and underwear—but who can enumerate the wearisome details?

LITERATURE

The Maid of Orleans

I

Amid Domremy's forest shade,
 Predestined unto deeds divine,
 She moved, a simple shepherd maid,
 Among her gentle sheep and kine.
 Unheeded tended she the hearth,
 The water drew, the cottage swept;
 But angels marked her from her birth,
 And round her footsteps vigil kept.

II

Unschool'd in worldly lore, nor wise
 In aught save purity and truth,
 Strange visions shone before her eyes,
 Strange voices filled with awe her youth.
 Beneath her blossomed orchard boughs,
 Where homeward hummed the hiving
 bees,
 Were irised wings and haloed brows,
 And chant of heavenly harmonies.

III

Amid the daisies of the field
 She knelt to nurse a weaning lamb;
 One flashed before with helm and shield,
 His hair a burning oriflamme.
 Prostrate she fell upon the sword
 And, trembling, took his dread command—
 'Twas Michael, Warrior of the Lord,
 Who bade her free her native land.

IV

Sing, Rouen, sing the glorious tale
 How fell the tyrant 'neath the sword!
 For hosts of mail could naught avail
 Against the legions of the Lord.
 Sing, leaguered Orleans, of the day
 She succored thee with heavenly aid,
 When triumphed in the bloody fray
 The snow-white banner of the Maid!

V

She bade her country's troubles cease;
 She crowned her king at Rheims; then fain
 Had found again her childhood's peace
 Among the meadows of Lorraine.
 From camp and court she fain had gone
 Back to the simple shepherd life,
 And 'mid her doves and lambs had won
 Oblivion of earthly strife.

VI

But Christ reserved an aureole
 For her, more bright than crown of King,
 And from the cleansing flame her soul
 Unto eternal peace took wing.
 From foul aspersion of her foes,
 From hatred's tongue, from slander's
 taint,
 Sublimed in martyr death she rose
 To deathless glory of the saint.

VII

To-day we hymn her praise with them,
 The laurelled and the glorified,

Who wear the martyr's anadem,
 For witness unto God who died.
 Sing, sing her fame, O grateful France!
 Enshrine her name in golden love,
 Who brought to thee deliverance
 And from thy shore the tyrant drove!

VIII

And unto Christ, our King eterne,
 Lord of the flaming seraphim,
 While censers smoke and tapers burn,
 Let rise the loud liturgic hymn!
 His hand from thrones of pow'r doth thrust
 The mighty and their pride cast down,
 The meek and humble from the dust
 Exalted to His heavenly crown.

The Maid of France. ANDREW LANG,
 New York: Harpers.

Jeanne d'Arc. ANATOLE FRANCE, Paris:
 Colmann-Levy.

We have selected this group from Jeanne d'Arc's numerous biographies as representative of non-Catholic opinion. Permeated as she was by Catholic faith and feeling, writers of her own church would naturally be better qualified to appreciate her motives; but two of the lives before us are proof that sympathy with the Maid and insight into her spiritual character are not confined to Catholic pens, while the third suggests that "some who came to mock have stayed," if not "to pray," at least to pay reluctant tribute at her shrine.

Mr. Clemens guarantees his story (the supposed memoirs of Jeanne d'Arc's page, Louis le Conte) as "faithful to her official history" though he will not vouch for "the added particulars." But these "particulars" have an historical as well as literary value; they give the atmosphere and color of the times and serve as a vehicle to stress probabilities and convey the personal viewpoint where conclusive evidence is lacking. His admiration of the Maid is absolute.

"She was the Genius of Patriotism embodied and made flesh . . . that noble child, that sublime personality, that spirit which has no peer in its purity from all alloy of self-seeking, self-interest, personal ambition. . . . A slender girl in her first young bloom with a martyr's crown upon her head and in her hand the sword that severed her country's bonds, she was the most noble life ever born into this world save only one."

From his desire to exalt his heroine springs the chief defect of his book; he is prone to strengthen his contrasts with forced antithesis and unduly depreciate her surroundings and her age. But thoroughly cognizant of his subject, he never allows his facts to get entangled in "the mass of added particular"; even his picture of the religious element in her character is adequate and warm.

Mr. Lang's work is professedly critical, yet his conclusions coincide with Mr. Clemens's on every moot point.

Having made a complete study of all the original documents and other records of value and applied the laws of historical evidence, he finds in favor of the Maid. Her common-sense, her physical and mental soundness and her simple, honest truth he declares unquestionable; hence when she affirms that her Voices told her so and so, one has to accept her word however marvelous the message. But when these messages were prophetic of the unlikely, the unknowable and the seemingly impossible, and the impossible happened as foretold, then Mr. Lang gives it up. He is unwilling to accept the supernatural, but he sees no alternative.

Anatole France is more daring. He belongs to the school that decries a personal God and also those who believe in Him. Hence an alternative for Divine interference must be found. What savors of the miraculous must go, even if his country's Deliverer and the purest character in its history has to go along with it. If facts support the miraculous, so much the worse for facts. As a result Mr. Lang is able to enliven his narrative with the frequent contradictions, absurd hypotheses, false interpretations and positive misstatements of M. France. He insists that Jeanne's Voices sprang from her own subconsciousness and again that she was indoctrinated by priests who were constantly around her, but he makes her despise priests and desire the exclusive society of soldiers when the necessities of his theory require this attitude. He describes her as an imbecile when, Divine support excluded, the deed he narrates would imply commanding genius. Dunois and d'Alençon swore to her marvelous military capacity and other qualities at variance with his theory, hence he knows that they lied. In fact, he relegates one hundred and twenty-three sworn witnesses to the "Ananias Club," when their evidence will not fit in with his hypothesis. That the documents cited in his notes, which are accurate and ample, frequently contradict his text or fail to prove it, matters little; few readers verify references.

A somewhat confused critic in the New York Times admits that "the Frenchman is forced to make the testimony correspond to his hypothesis" and then pronounces him "a scientific historian." He comes to M. France's aid with the helpful suggestion that "'automatisms' account for her knowledge of the King's secret, the buried sword of Fierbois, her arrow-wounds, etc."; but Quicherat, who though a rationalist is scientific, has this to say about such facts:

"They rest on bases of evidence so solid that we cannot reject them without rejecting the very foundation of history. Whether science can account for the facts or not the visions must be admitted and the strange spiritual perceptions that issued from the visions. These peculiarities in Jeanne's life seem to pass beyond the circle of human power."

"The Scots," says Mr. Lang, "stood for her always with pen as with sword," but he forgets that Glasdale, who fought her fiercely and insulted her grievously, was a Scot. His judgment seems at fault in the puzzled matter of "recantation." There were two documents, one of six lines, which was signed and afterwards destroyed; the other, a much longer one and admittedly spurious, was substituted adroitly for the first. Was the first a repudiation of Jeanne's Voices and her mission? Mr. Lang believes it was, because Jeanne protested next day that it was a "sin," that her Voices reproved her and that she did it "through fear of the fire." But if her denial was complete why should Cauchon substitute another? Would not the mere semblance of recantation merit reproof from the Voices of perfection and seem sinful to one so true and brave as Jeanne d'Arc? However this may be, such a momentary weakness does not influence Mr. Lang's final verdict:

"She was the consummation and ideal of two noble human efforts towards perfection. The peasant's daughter was the Flower of Chivalry, brave, gentle, merciful, courteous, kind and loyal. . . . Spenser could not create, Shakespeare could not imagine such a being. She was the most perfect daughter of her church; to her its sacraments were the very Bread of Life; her conscience, by frequent confession, was kept fair and pure as the lilies of Paradise. In a tragedy without parallel or precedent the Flower of Chivalry died for France and the Chivalry of France which had deserted her; she died by the Chivalry of England, which shamefully entreated and destroyed her; while the most faithful of Christians perished through the dull political hatred of priests who impudently called themselves 'the Church.'"

The perusal of these three biographies suggests the conclusion that no honest man can study the life of Jeanne d'Arc without becoming her admirer and defender, and that the writer who depreciates her character impugns his own.

The Catholic Who's Who and Year Book. F. C. BURNAND, London: Burns and Oates.

We welcome the second number of the biographical Year Book of British Catholics. In the preface to the former issue the editor congratulated the originators and compilers of the work, on the results of their painstaking labor. The volume for 1909, with its additional six hundred names, presents an opportunity for still further congratulations. It contains not only additions but also important corrections, as when Louis Duncombe Cameron in the 1908 edition appears as Ludovick Charles Richard Cameron in 1909 with other changes in the body of the sketch itself. These emendations, however, do not seem to be numerous, and are only practical applications of the laws of evolution and development as applied to the work of a painstaking compiler.

It is not clear why Americans should be given a place in this Roll Call of British Catholics. About fifty citizens of the great Republic are thus honored. All our Archbishops are there, except Archbishop Moeller of Cincinnati; of course Archbishop Pitaval's appointment to the See of Santa Fé took place after the publication of the work.

Aside from the selection of the Metropolitans it is interesting to note who are the prominent American Catholics, lay and cleric in the opinion of the discriminating English editor. There are sketches of Bishop Spalding and Bishop Conaty, of Father Searle, the head of the Paulists, Father Zahm, provincial of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, and Father Sherman, the Jesuit, who by the way is not, as stated, a member of the Maryland-New York, but of the Missouri Province. Editors and authors are represented by Father Lambert of the New York Freeman's Journal, Father Hudson, of the Ave Maria; Father Tabb, the poet; Humphrey Joseph Desmond, of newspaper-syndicate fame, and Charles Warren Stoddard, whose "South Sea Idylls," it is recorded, is spoken of with high appreciation by Robert Louis Stevenson and W. D. Howells. Major-General Coppinger is singled out presumably as the foremost Catholic in the Army, with Bellamy Storer and Maurice Francis Egan of the diplomatic corps; Charles J. Bonaparte of Mr. Roosevelt's cabinet, and William Bourke Cockran, Congressman, Statesman and Orator. But why omit Edward Douglass White and Joseph McKenna, both of the United States Supreme Court, the latter also a cabinet officer under President Cleveland?

The American Catholic layman is further represented by William J. Onahan, President of the Chicago Public Library; the late Francis Marion Crawford, the novelist; J. Godfrey Raupert, lecturer on Spiritism, and Thomas St. John Gaffney, the present Consul-General of the United States at Dresden. One of the delightful surprises of this new issue is the sketch of Richard Croker, "for a long time leader of Tammany Hall," and the winner of "the Derby with 'Orby,' 1907."

This valuable compilation introduces us to several American celebrities, chiefly women, who have drifted away from these shores and have become virtually, if not legally, subjects of His Majesty, King Edward VII.; Madam Albani, the prima donna, for instance; Alice Tobin, of California; Louise Imogen Guiney, of Boston, and "our Mary," Mrs. de Navarro. Of those who remain with us, Agnes Repplier, of Philadelphia, and Rose Hawthorne Lathrop appeared in the first issue, and to the new edition are now added Marion Ames Taggart, who is referred to as a descendant of a Bunker's (sic) Hill hero; Katharine Conway, of Boston, and Frances Tiernan, of Salisbury, New Carolina, wherever that is, this year's recipient of the Laetare Medal.

We noticed one inaccuracy in the treatment of the American sketches, and that is rather startling. Reginald Count Ward, a native of Boston, "the possessor of many foreign decorations," and "ex-Consul-General for Roumania in London," who in the issue of 1908 is referred to as a kinsman of Artemus Ward is evolved into "a great-great-grandson of the American humorist, Artemus Ward." As "Artemus Ward" is but the pen-name of Charles Farrar Browne whose popularity in England where he died in 1867 was even greater than in his own country, the error is not only surprising but amusing. Were the facts as recorded, it would be the first instance of the transmission of a pen-name to one's descendants. This little sketch reads like a paragraph from the pages of Punch, prepared by "Artemus Ward" himself for the delectation of English readers. It is a refreshing oasis in the desert of monotonous accuracy. Quandoque dormitat Homerus. The most painstaking biographer will occasionally nod. There is an Artemas Ward, who was a distinguished general of the American Revolution.

For those who are familiar with the names of episcopal sees it may be a matter of indifference, but we venture to suggest that it would be a decided improvement to catalogue the prelates under their patronymics, and not as is done in this volume, under the names of their dioceses. If the present arrangement is preserved, at least a cross reference would be helpful. Only the initiated will look for the Rt. Rev. Wm. Anthony Johnson, Provost of Westminster, under the title of Arindela, which is his titular see.

The usefulness and general accuracy of the "Catholic Who's Who for 1909" only whets our longing for the "American Catholic Who's Who," which Georgina Pell Curtis has in preparation and which we trust will be speedily forthcoming.

Catholic Footsteps in Old New York. WILLIAM HARPER BENNETT. $2.50. New York: Schwartz, Kerwin and Fauss.

Do New York Catholics know local history from their own special viewpoint? It is to be feared they do not. It is not taught in our schools, and there are no present text-books from which to teach it. In September next we are to have an elaborate ceremonial to commemorate the sailing up our great river of the sea-rover Henry Hudson in his Dutch Half-Moon. Yet few of those who will join in the celebration know that years before Hudson, the first European vessel to enter our bay was the French Caravel Dauphin commanded by the Catholic Giovanni Verrazano, and he called Sandy Hook, the Cape of St. Mary. This was about the last of April, 1524. The year following, another Catholic, the Spaniard, Estevan Gomez, was here and named our bay after St. Christobel and the river the San Antonio. Hudson came eighty-five years after Verrazano. Mr. Bennett begins his excellent compilation with Verrazano, and tells his story of old New York in a most entertaining manner, all through the centuries that follow down to 1808. To do this he says one "must wander far afield and gather cubes from many lands to construct the wondrous mosaic pictures of its rise, its progress and its present greatness."

The author shows himself a deft constructor for, although much of the material he uses can be found scattered about in many places, nowhere else can it be made so readily and practically available as in the shape in which he offers it. The volume makes one of the most serviceable and attractive contributions to our local historical records published in some time. Its title fully describes the contents which a copious and well-digested index puts instantly at the command of the student, who is further helped by the long list of authorities cited in the bibliography.

Supplementa Editioni decimae septimae Compendii Theologiae Moralis (Sabetti-Barrett) adjuncta a Timotheo-Barrett, S.J.

This work consists of two supplements. The first containing sixty-eight pages includes the text of the Ne Temere Decree on Matrimony, also the decisions of the S. Congregation of the Council interpreting this Decree, and a Commentary by Fr. Barrett, Professor of Moral Theology in Woodstock College. The second supplement in eight pages consists of recent decrees of the Roman Congregations on various subjects.

In reading Fr. Barrett's commentary on the "Ne Temere" one cannot fail to be convinced that he has made a very careful study of the Decree itself and of the many interpretations given by other writers. The result of his labors is a full, clear, and yet concise view of what we should hold upon the new matrimonial legislation. The writer is always ready with a solid reason or principle to sustain whatever opinion he adopts, and it would seem that any opinion which he defends may be safely followed.

In bestowing this well merited praise on the commentary before us, it is not intended to signify that in every particular, however minute, the writer holds the opinion which should be most commended. Thus, on page 64, treating the question—"Cuinam parochus emolumenta stolae remittenda sint"—he makes several hypotheses, giving a fitting answer in each: then he adds—"Si uterque habet domicilium in una parochia, menstruum vero commorationem in alia, regulariter, ut nobis videtur, sunt dividenda, uterque enim parochus poterat licite assistere, et emolumenta indubie pertinent, salvo meliore judicio, ad eum qui licite assistit." The meaning of the writer seems to be that the emolumenta stolae should be divided between the parochus domicilii and the parochus menstruae commorationis, because each of them could licitly assist at the marriage. Many, we think, will disagree with this view, holding that the parochus who has been asked to assist and who does actually assist as the authorized witness of the marriage may lawfully keep the emolumenta stolae without any division.

In concluding this brief notice of Fr. Barrett's commentary, it may be asserted without hesitation that the work will be eagerly read by the clergy of the United States and that they will find it a most useful aid to the proper understanding of the new marriage law.

The Christ, The Son of God. L'ABBÉ FOUARD, New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Price 25 cents.

This is Abbé Fouard's masterpiece in a form that brings it within the reach of all. Though two large volumes have been compressed into one, it is clearly printed, aptly illustrated and presents an attractive appearance. In the thirty years that have elapsed since its first issue, numerous lives of Christ have been given to the public, especially in recent years when the Saviour's words and deeds became the battling ground of various schools of thought. Yet Abbé Fouard's work not only maintained its ground but grew steadily in favor. It is an arsenal of Christian piety and love, appealing equally to head and heart. There is no other Life that more fully satisfies the yearnings of Faith; and there is no "modern" heresy or other sceptical lucubration unanswered in its pages.

Withal it is easy reading. The scholar will gather more; but the skill of style and touch of sympathy with the intrinsic interest of the narrative, will take hold of every reader. The author had digested the literature of the subject, traditional and critical, and studied the land and people on the spot, "following the Master step by step from Dan to Beersheba," he draws from contemporary history the thoughts and manners of the times. The Gospel writers constantly allude to customs and habits utterly divergent from ours, and, moreover, their aim was not to give a complete life of their Master, but "to show forth in Jesus the Christ whom they adored." Looking at facts and persons from the Eastern view-point, Abbé Fouard has been able to re-build for us the vanished world of Gospel days, and expand, collate, explain and complete the work of the Evangelists.

"This Life of Jesus," says the author, "is an act of Faith." It should awaken or strengthen Faith in every reader.

The Annales Religieuses d'Orléans thus describes the arms of Jeanne d'Arc:

"Two different armorial bearings are mentioned in connection with Jeanne d'Arc, those which she herself assumed at Poitiers, and those which Charles VII assigned when he ennobled her and her family. The latter are qualified as 'royal,' the former as 'personal'—the only ones she used, at least up to her stay in Tours. There in obedience to the Heavenly Voices she had a figure of Christ blessing the lily of France, the words 'Jhesus-Maria' and other emblems embroidered on a new banner. Did this banner retain the blue shield and white dove of Poitiers? It seems most probable. If so it was with these 'personal' armorial bearings attached to the Tours banner that La Pucelle assailed the English forts at Orleans. She never assumed the Royal armorial Bearings at any time, though her brothers adopted them, but she was greatly attached to those she received from heaven.

"After the Poitiers committee had reported in her favor, Charles appointed her Commander-in-chief and ordered that she be equipped with arms in accordance with her dignity. Along with the white armor befitting 'The Maid,' she was presented a banner in sign of authority. She added, as was customary, an emblem of her own choice, probably suggested by her saints. This emblem consisted of an azure shield with a white dove holding in its bill a banneret inscribed with the legend: De par le Roi du Ciel (from the King of Heaven).

"Louis XIII thus blazons the arms granted to Jeanne's family by Charles VII: 'Azure with silver sword pommeled in gold, bearing a golden crown, flanked with golden lilies.' Hence, at her festivals we are free to use either symbol or both. If one is to be chosen, we should select Jeanne's 'personal' arms, for these were designated conjointly by the Maid and by her Saints."

EDUCATIONAL

Mr. James A. J. McKenna, Assistant Indian Commissioner, Canada, in his evidence upon Indian Affairs before the Canadian Civil Service Commission, made the following weighty statement in respect to Indian Education and Indian Missions:

"In our Industrial and Boarding Schools, which are the chief and most effective agencies of Indian Education, the State stands loco parentis to the children in the fullest sense. The children are removed entirely from the care and guardianship of their parents and come directly and exclusively under State tutelage. For their ethical training it is essential that provision should be made. One way—and the only alternative way to that followed—would be for the State to create a sort of composite ethical system of its own. This, to say the least, would be a dangerous experiment. The other—the way approved by experience—is the employment of the means afforded for ethical training by the different churches which have done and are doing missionary work among the Indians. There are people who consider it an evidence of advanced thought to belittle the work of the missionaries; but those who have studied the Indian question seriously and at first hand find it difficult to adequately describe the civilizing influences of their devoted labors. I have seen the effects of these influences far in advance of the operation of our civil system, and can bear witness to their great benefit to the State."

Mr. McKenna, formerly a contributor to The Catholic World, has had long and varied personal experience of Indian schools in the Canadian West, which he has traversed in every direction as the chief practical representative of the Indian Department. Some years ago he accompanied the venerable Oblate missionary, Father Lacombe, in a conciliatory government visitation of remote Indian reserves.

The Fifth Annual Report of the Reverend Superintendents of Catholic Schools, Archdiocese of New York, issued by the New York Catholic School Board is a chronicle of Catholic School achievement edited by Fathers Thornton and Smith, the Reverend Superintendents of Catholic Schools. It purports to give a "complete directory and the statistics of all the Catholic Schools in the Archdiocese for the centennial year 1908." Even a cursory reading will show that the purpose of the editors has been fully attained. The Report opens with an address to Archbishop Farley in which the Right Reverend President of the School Board acknowledges the inspiration and encouragement given by the Most Reverend head of the Archdiocese, who has made it a supreme effort of his administration to bring the religious schools of New York to the high grade of excellence they enjoy to-day.

Then follow full statistics of schools and teachers and pupils, a useful recapitulation and a summary, a statement of the standing of the two Catholic High Schools, a classification of schools according to register and similar useful documents which will appeal to the student of school activities.

A brief historical review of the work accomplished for Catholic education in all its departments in the Archdiocese during the hundred years of its existence, two papers touching upon topics of special interest to school directors, and a copy of certain disciplinary regulations in force in the schools, have been incorporated into this report.

Certain details mentioned in the summary of recapitulations will prove of particular interest to all who desire to keep in touch with the great work done by Catholics in the cause of religious education. There are in the Archdiocese of New York, which is one of the chief centres of Catholic life in the world to-day, 139 schools; the total value of school property is $11,016,858.00, and the annual cost of maintenance for all the parish schools is $744,420.00; the total number of pupils on register was 70,002, of these 65,559 were on record as in actual attendance during the major portion of the school year; of the 1,547 teachers engaged in the work of the schools, 993 are religious, and 554 are lay teachers; the total number of classes is 1,325; the total number of candidates from the schools for New York Regents' Examinations during the year was 4,998, and the total number of examinations accepted from these by the Regents "for counts," was 15,006; finally the total number of pupils entered from the schools in Catholic High Schools and Colleges for 1908 was 519. A splendid showing certainly for the prosperous condition of Catholic Schools in New York, and a striking evidence of the sacrifice our people are willing to make "for principle's sake." Fathers Thornton and Smith are to be congratulated upon the thoroughness of the work done and upon the general excellence of their report

The third annual report of the president and treasurer of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching is a complete record of the work done by the officers of administration and trustees of Mr. Carnegie's notable foundation. It contains the minutes of the current business of the year; brief papers involving some financial questions in colleges admitted to the privileges of the fund; an explanation of the reasons inducing the trustees to concede these privileges to tax-supported institutions in opposition to the original purpose of the foundation; a summary review of general educational progress and problems; a condensed statement of the general purposes in education of denominational boards; a word "de mortuis;" the report of the treasurer, and finally a list of tables which will prove a benefit to the student of the economic questions involved in the distribution of the fund.

The necessary brevity of a notice will not forbid the expression of the regret that Mr. Carnegie, in the beneficent purpose of his foundation, could not see his way to an acknowledgment of the immense good done by private and denominational colleges throughout the land by allowing them to enjoy the favor of his benefaction. Contrary to a statement in one of the papers of the report—there are private colleges. And there is no reason drawn from the notion of educational work which denies the possibility of the fullest and happiest results in true educational training to the efforts of those who toil in private colleges. These will of course almost necessarily be denominational schools. Besides, there are men high in the councils of educational associations to-day who are not slow to proclaim the splendid achievements of these unselfish efforts despite the lack of rich endowment and equipment enjoyed by the institutions admitted to the Carnegie fund. It is to be regretted, we repeat, that professors in such schools may not be comforted in their honorable striving by the prospect of the relief which the fund allows its beneficiaries in the darkening of their life's evening. However, one may question whether the independence of scholarly freedom is not a better guarantee of fitness for the liberalizing ways of true culture than is the eagerness of some to do away with denominational restrictions in order to meet the requirements of Mr. Carnegie's fund.

The Status of Gaelic in the new university is the most widely discussed topic in Ireland. The county councils and other corporate bodies generally have passed resolutions in favor of making Gaelic essential for matriculation, while the Dublin corporation, by unanimous vote, would make Gaelic compulsory in the matriculation examinations of all Irish universities alike. An article by Canon O'Leary on the subject in the Dublin Leader has created comment. He claims that "Irish of the fair and market" is quite a different thing from "English of the fair and market"; that Gaelic has already proved an intellectual and moral stimulus in Ireland, and educational "experts" who are ignorant of Gaelic are not competent to pass on its value; that the historic language of a nation is essential to its national university, especially as the majority demands it, and the inconvenience of the few should not outweigh the advantage of the many.

The Catholic students of the German universities have always banded together in societies, "Vereine" or "Verbindungen," which although along somewhat different lines in non-essential matters, succeeded in keeping up a truly Catholic spirit and enabling their members to enjoy the benefit of Catholic surroundings as far as this is possible. But the purpose of these societies emphasized more the sociable side of life, though they have frequently been the starting point of literary enterprises, of works of piety and charity. These societies are the nurseries of the men that afterwards take the lead in the defense of "truth, right and freedom." The Germans believe in federation everywhere, and these student societies form national "leagues" called "Cartells," in all universities.

Without interfering in the least with these flourishing associations, student societies of another kind, have of late come into prominence, for scientific, literary and charitable purposes. Within a few years not less than thirty have been formed. The purpose of the eighteen "Academic Vincent-de-Paul Societies" is explained by their name. The "Görres Societies" "Leo" or "Pius Associations," commonly pursue a scientific or literary aim. To these must be added about forty "Academic Societies of St. Boniface" of older date, which raise funds for the support of Catholic Churches in Protestant districts. Here, too, the idea of federation has already struck root. Last year a good number of them formed the "Academic Alliance," and issued a periodical. Just now, in that great centre of Catholic social activity, München-Gladbach, another periodical has been started to assist the efforts of university students in this line, the "Sozialen Studenten-Blätter."

SCIENCE

Farthest South.—Lieutenant E. H. Shackleton, of the British Navy, has immortalized his name by reaching a Southern latitude of 88 degrees, 23 minutes, coming within 111 miles of the South Pole. This achievement entirely eclipses Nansen's famous uplift of the Northern record from 83 degrees 24 minutes, to 86 degrees 14 minutes, which, great as it was, was but a jump of not quite three degrees, while Lieut. Shackleton's advance beyond the previous Antarctic record (82 degrees 16 minutes) is more than six degrees. Although the British naval officer and his party suffered from the bitter cold in spite of the fact that they chose to travel in the Antarctic summer season, yet it is well to remember that when he uses the peculiarly English phrase, "seventy-two degrees of frost," he means exactly what he says, viz., seventy-two degrees below the freezing point, or forty degrees below zero, a temperature which is not at all uncommon in what is called the temperate zone. This point has been overlooked by most of the newspapers on this side of the Atlantic. They have taken the phrase to mean seventy-two below zero, which is rare even in the arctic winter. The lowest temperature, "89 degrees of frost," or 57 below zero, was recorded on August 12, which is, of course, midwinter in the southern hemisphere. On the whole, this expedition has been successful beyond the most sanguine expectations. The exploring party went as far South as their provisions and the loss of several ponies allowed; in fact, on their way back they were more than once without food for a day or more at a time. A special party, headed by Professor David, reached the southern magnetic pole in latitude 72 degrees 25 minutes, longitude 154 east. Another party accomplished, on March 10, 1908, the first ascent of Mount Erebus, the southernmost volcano in the world, 13,200 feet high. They found on the summit an active crater half a mile in diameter and 8,000 feet deep, ejecting vast volumes of steam and sulphurous gas to a height of 2,000 feet.

A Novel Form of Telescope

That astronomy, the oldest of sciences, is not letting her old age be a bar to the youthful vigor required in inventing and perfecting new kinds of apparatus, is now and then emphasized in a way that even the most unprofessional may understand. Sometimes also these inventions come almost as a shock even to experts, not to mention the rude handling they inflict upon the time-honored traditions and ideas. Such an innovation has lately been described in the Astrophysical Journal for March, and in the Scientific American of March 27. It is a new form of reflecting telescope, invented and constructed by Professor R. W. Wood, of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore.

This new instrument rests upon the principle of the so-called centrifugal force which is generated when a body is revolved in a curve, in consequence of which it shows a tendency to remain on the tangent line and to recede from the centre of motion. When a liquid is thus set in rotation, it is depressed in the middle and rises at the outer edges, and its surface then assumes the form of a true paraboloid, such as is generated by revolving a parabola about its axis. As this is the very same surface that must be given at such pains to the mirror of a reflecting telescope, the idea has probably occurred to many to construct such a telescope by rotating mercury in a shallow cylindrical dish. Any one, however, who has ever used mercury in connection with a telescope, and knows by painful experience its extreme sensitiveness to the least tremors and air currents, would unhesitatingly condemn such an idea as puerile and unworthy of a serious thought. Still, as the world owes some of its best inventions to the boldness with which similar absolutely certain judgments have been attacked and reversed, Professor Wood determined to ascertain if possible whether, after all, the difficulties were insurmountable. A small instrument, seven inches in diameter gave such promising results, that he ordered the construction of a 20-inch machine by one of the best instrument makers in the country. A small electric motor set the dish of mercury in rotation, but it did this in an indirect manner in order that the vibrations of the motor might not be communicated to the mirror. For this purpose a wooden pulley, which was driven directly, dragged the dish along by the tension of six rubber threads attached to brackets on its rim. Five minutes were generally required to set the mercury in complete and uniform rotation. With a speed of only 12 revolutions a minute, or one turn in 5 seconds, the mercury mirror had a focal length of 15 feet, and with 20 revolutions the focus shortened to about 3 feet. The focal length of this novel telescope is thus entirely under control.

In order to ensure greater stability, the rotating mirror was firmly mounted upon a concrete foundation at the bottom of a well 15 feet deep. All the sources that might cause ripples in the mercury were patiently traced and eliminated as much as possible, the most difficult one of all, which Prof. Wood had not yet completely eradicated, being variations in the absolutely uniform speed which is necessary to make a successful mirror.

The most formidable difficulties in the way of making this new form of telescope a practical competitor with the ordinary refractor and reflector, are chiefly two: absolute uniformity of rotation and ground tremors, these latter being so great that the approach of a horse and carriage could be detected at the distance of an eighth of a mile. Patience and genius may probably succeed in conquering them entirely.

It is evident that as the surface of the mercury must be horizontal, the telescope points permanently to the zenith and cannot be made to follow a star. This difficulty may be remedied by one or two plane mirrors placed above and driven by clockwork. The whole construction is, however, so enormously less expensive than an ordinary reflecting telescope, that this new form of instrument may perhaps be made of a large size and rapidly transported to places where important bodies, such as Mars at opposition, or the totally eclipsed sun, or new stars and the like, pass through the zenith, and thus enable astronomers to secure large-scaled photographs of the heavenly bodies at important times. It would be rash at present to predict the practical success or failure of this novel form of telescope.

ART

The Eighty-fourth Annual Exhibition of the Academy of Design.

Year after year one is not conscious of a marked difference in the paintings, but they are so uniformly good that it has become an impertinence to express hope for the future of American art. Potentially, the future is there already. We may be less spirited than Paris but our art is genuine, sincere, earnestly studious; one feels an underlying solid quality in it as of roots struck deep in fertile ground. To-morrow we shall see it, like certain trees of the southern springtime, bear its flower and its fruit at once.

For a type we place here immediately, Y. G. Brown's "American Farmer," resting in the midst of his work, with the peace of the wide land spread behind him. It is a splendid, soldier-like figure, of big build and great strength, the face under the brim of the cavalierish hat, shrewd, sunburnt and honest. He seems to be used as a symbol for the apotheosis of the soil; but Mr. Brown quotes from Burns, that of the rank being only the stamp of the guinea. "The man's the gold for a' that." Another palpably American type, not far from the Toiler, is Wm. J. Whittemore's delightful "Coquette." The piquancy of the title is in the archness and innocence of this little miss, scarce out of childhood, with her charming face, her azure eyes, and the concentrated mischief of her smile. We pass to Preraphaelitism in Charles Winter's decorative "Pandora." It is admirably designed and rather exceptional, as there is very little symbolic matter in the gallery. The frame is notable, as it is perfectly at one with the subject and its style. Gedney Bunce has a Turner-like and effective "Venezia." Mrs. Kenyon Cox's two children, "Belinda," and the sturdy "Little boy green" are very attractive.

The most delectable children on view, however, would seem to be Miss Lydia Emmet's "Playmates," a saucy boy in a sailor-suit and his small sister in a gray-blue smock. They cuddle together with a kitten between them and have no idea in the world of the admirable brush work done upon them. One is almost annoyed to find that the Sargent portrait of Miss Vanderbilt (Countess Laszlo Széchenyi), which is wholly superficial, is, nevertheless, the most haunting among the likenesses. This slim girl, with her dark-lashed, sapphire eyes, simple white dress and the blue sash that Sargent paints with his usual extraordinary dexterity as to textures, is less satisfying, in a way, than the Emmet group hard by of a "Lady and her children." There is a learned richness and depth, and a perfect harmony of warm intonations in the latter; and yet, it is the Sargent face that remains most memorable. A work that has required no little study is Charles Bittinger's "After the Ball," with its problem of double illumination. The sisters are removing their wraps, and the lamp-light falls on faces, posies and flounces. It is a pity that the bird-and-flower pattern on the old-fashioned wall should be so high in color where the glow searches it. It almost reaches the foreground. Colin Campbell Cooper makes a picture out of sky-scrapers, trains, and smoke. "Grand Central Station," of all places! He would deserve a vote of thanks were it not that he probably paints as he sees and has found poetry and picturesqueness where one expects them least. Paul Cornoyer has his visions of New York, too. A little greyness, a little mist, snow melting and a wet pavement, and "Madison Square" is loveliness. There is cleverness to the verge of impudence in Harry W. Watrous' tailor-made poster girls gossiping in black and white over their light refreshments: "Some little talk of me and thee there was" but it is clean of line and color and distinctly original. Large, serene and most tranquil is Chauncey Ryder's "Northern Coast of France," quiet green cliffs under a big sky of light grey and quiet water running in among the boulders. Emil Carlsen's "Surf," instead, throws the white spray up in cataracts. Admirable are Paul Dougherty's two marines, "Between the Cliffs," and, still more, his "Golden Moonrise," the broken light shining down into a gully, over the wide face of the waters, and the reeking rocks. The color is unusual for a marine, being a scheme of yellows and warm browns. F. J. Waugh's "Cove" is good, too; broad, picturesque, and chromatic. Birge Harrison's "Twilight on the Seine" is in deep blues, a great bridge spanning the tide and shadowy tugs plying beneath the arches. Another indigo picture is Miss Wigand's prize, "Woman in Blue," excellently drawn and painted. Of Bruce Crane's landscapes we preferred "The Dash of Winter," so sober and refined, so delicate and harmonious. Albert Groll's plains are always interesting and robust in treatment. Eaton's "Song of the Pines" has a poetic charm of its own in its very gloom. The Tunness medal goes to Ben Foster's "Early Moonrise," purplish haze over the hills, sheep wending homeward, and the great silence of the end of day.

The sculpture showing is not very extensive and not of unusual interest, there are one or two good busts and some clever animal subjects. Chester Beach's small but beautiful "The Awakening Marble," life emerging from the sculptor's block, was the only imaginative theme we could detect.

Der Tabernakel einst und jetzt. Rev. F. Raible. Herder. Fribourg. 1908. An interesting book on the history and art of the tabernacle. Liturgic and æsthetic questions are discussed fully. The most perfect tabernacle ever made is the exquisite Florentine of "Orcagua," but the author, considering the ideal not yet attained, offers the subject to the enthusiasm of young artists of our own day.

The Illuminated Roll of the "Exultet." M. Leopold Delisle, a Belgian scholar, calls attention to a Norman-Sicilian choir-book in the Royal Library at Madrid. It is probably of the eleventh or twelfth century and contains a beautiful miniatures rendering of the "Exultet jam angelica turba cœlorum," that rare blessing of the Paschal candle on Holy Saturday. In many places in Italy while the deacon sang the "Exultet" from the ambo, a large illuminated scroll was unfolded gradually before the eyes of the people that they might follow the lesson in the pictures and be attentive to the noted narrative.

Exit the Dolls. It will be an immense relief to many to learn that the dressed and wigged images used for devotional purposes are to be excluded in future from Italian churches. Those that are not "too ugly" may be retained a little longer. "This is the Holy Father's wisdom not to create a revolution." The introduction of new ones is rigorously forbidden. This order, with others of a like nature, emanate from the Cardinal Secretary of State.

The Society of American Art Collectors has been exerting itself for some time past to organize an exhibition of American art in Paris. It is believed now that the exhibition will take place next July, the arrangements to be entrusted to Senator Clarke.

The Venice International, always important and a favorite exhibition among the many lovers of Venezia la Bella, is to be inaugurated on the 17th of April, and will remain open until the autumn.

Sargent is pronounced at the Royal Scottish Academy with his portraits of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught.

At the International Society in London, J. Rodin wins new laurels with his "Jeunesse de Minerve," a beautiful and subtle female head of the most delicate workmanship. Rodin's marbles always mean a great deal more than they merely represent.

ECCLESIASTICAL NOTES

Bishop Conaty, of Los Angeles, Cal., is preparing for his ad limina visit.

Bishop Colton, of Buffalo, N. Y., has purchased a site for a new Cathedral, changes in the character of the neighborhood of the old church making a move desirable.

Brother Alexius Jansen, Superior of Twyford Abbey, London, has been appointed Provincial of the English province of his Congregation. He was formerly Master of Novices at Chicago.

Columbus Day, October 12, is now a legal holiday in the State of New York. Credit for this action by the legislature is largely due to the efforts of the Knights of Columbus.

An official paper has been started by Bishop Jones for the Diocese of Porto Rico. It is printed in Spanish and English and is called "Borinquen." Bishop Jones went from Philadelphia to his episcopal charge and knows the value of the press as a factor in modern church work.

Under the direction of the Rev. Wm. J. Finn, C.S.P., the Paulist Chorister Society of Chicago, will give the oratorio "The Seven Last Words," the composition of the Franciscan, Rev. Dr. P. Hartmann von Hochbrunn, at Carnegie Hall, New York, on Wednesday evening, May 5.

Sunday entertainments at which an admission fee is charged can no longer be held in the Diocese of Fall River, Mass., under Catholic auspices. Bishop Feehan has forbidden them, because, as he says in a circular to his priests, he is "desirous that the Church shall present a united front against this attack upon the sanctity of the Sabbath."

For the purpose of uniting two discordant elements in the organization of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in Ireland, Mathew Cummings, the National President of the Order in the United States, and the Rev. P. H. O'Donnell, representing Archbishop O'Connell, its National Chaplain, are now in Ireland. If they succeed in their mission the Order in Ireland, Great Britain, Australia, Canada and the United States will be affiliated under the same bonds of fraternity.

At the earnest solicitation of Bishop Dougherty, of Jaro, Philippine Islands, the Rev. James P. McCloskey of Philadelphia has returned to the Philippines, where he labored for several years as vice-rector of the seminary of the Immaculate Conception, Vigan. When the changes in the hierarchy and constitution of the Church in our insular possessions were made after the war, he was one of the American priests who volunteered to go there and help out the work of rehabilitation.

Members of the Alumni, resident in Pittsburgh, of St. Bonaventure's College and Seminary, Allegheny, N. Y., have formed a permanent association of which the Rev. F. F. O'Shea, of New Castle, Pa., was chosen president. In addition to the usual fraternal purpose of such bodies the members resolved to adopt as their immediate object, co-operation with the other former students of the institution in restoring the college building which was recently destroyed by fire, and active participation in the golden jubilee celebration of the college next June.

Bishop da Silva, auxiliary to the Patriarch of Lisbon, who has been visiting the various Portuguese colonies in the United States, was recently awarded the special honor of an official reception by the State Senate of California. He sat at the right of the presiding officer, Lieutenant-Governor Porter, and on the left was the Right Rev. Mgr. Thomas J. Capel, who in the absence of the chaplain, the Very Rev. Father Henry H. Wyman, C.S.P., said the opening prayer.

"Paradise Lost," an oratorio founded on Milton's epic, and written by Theodore Dubois, for many years director of the Conservatory of Music, Paris, will be heard for the first time in the United States, at the fifth annual concert of the Catholic Oratorio Society, at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 23. Eve, the soprano part, will be sung by Mme. Selma Kronold; Satan, by Albert Farrington, baritone of St. Ignatius' Church; Adam, by George Gilbert, Jr., tenor; St. Michael by George Cane, tenor, and Moloch by Francis Motley, basso. There will be a chorus of 150 picked voices, and an orchestra from the New York Philharmonic Society under the direction of Emil Reyl. The performance is given under the patronage of Archbishop Farley and a number of leading Catholics of New York.

Catholic education for deaf-mutes is being specially encouraged in Pittsburgh, Pa. The Sisters of Charity now have seventeen pupils in their classes at their school on Troy Hill, which Bishop Canevin recently established, and could care for three times as many were the financial requisites obtainable. On Easter Sunday six adult deaf-mutes made their first Communion as the result of the instruction they received at this school, which it is hoped, in the near future, will be the means of putting an end to the attendance of Catholic mutes at the State schools, an almost inevitable prelude to the loss of Faith.

An ex-priest in New Orleans, who signs himself C. V. Fradyssa, has been actively reforming the Catholic Church in the newspapers under the patronage of the Protestant Ministers' Association. He has also published a book which the ministers unanimously approved by resolution, and is acclaimed "one of Rome's profound scholars, who has written permission from the Pope to read all books, among them the Bible. Although as prosecutor in his Order he has arraigned thousands of wolves in sheep's clothing . . . his book keeps to a high-toned position." In the Times-Democrat of April 10, Archbishop Blenk exposes "Fradyssa," and incidentally the New Orleans Protestant Ministers' Association.

The man's real name is Juan Orts y Gonzalez. He was a Franciscan of the Spanish Province of Valencia (which contains less than two hundred of the "thousands of wolves"), left without dispensation from his vows, was deprived of his faculties and sailed, as Salvador Orts, to Mexico, where he was repeatedly refused faculties. He went to British Honduras whence he came to New Orleans, Feb. 4, 1908, as Guillermo Garten Mendoza.

His Grace adds: "He applied in vain for recognition here and faculties." Then assuming a new alias, "C. V. Fradyssa," this "weed from the Pope's garden," was welcomed as a choice vegetable at the table of the Protestant Ministers' Association!

Pennsylvania has a peculiar method of dealing with the institutions within its jurisdiction. The legislature makes appropriations for their benefit, and in the bills passed in the House at Harrisburg, April 1, were these for the following Catholic charities: Home of the Good Shepherd, Northside, $8,000; House of the Good Shepherd, East End, $8,000; St. Joseph's Protectory, $5,000; St. Joseph's Hospital, Pittsburgh, $70,000. This system has now been in use for years and no danger seems to have resulted to the liberties of either Pennsylvania or the country at large by this practical recognition by the State of the humanitarian work done by Catholic institutions for the general welfare.

For several years the Redemptorist Fathers have been engaged in building a very large church and mission house dedicated to Our Lady of Perpetual Help, at Fifth avenue and 59th street, Brooklyn, N. Y. This structure, when finished, will cost about a million dollars. At present only the rectory and basement of the church are completed, and the basement was used for the first time on Easter Sunday. On the previous night a fire unfortunately broke out in the library of the new rectory into which the fathers had moved a few days before and did $15,000 damage before it was extinguished. The sympathy which this section of Brooklyn has in the work of the fathers may be judged from the fact that $60,000 was realized by a fair for the benefit of the new church, held a month before the Easter opening of the edifice.

The estate at Taunton, Mass., of the Rev. W. J. Dawson, the Protestant evangelist, has been purchased by Bishop Feehan and will be turned into an infant asylum, under the direction of the Rev. T. P. Sweeney, diocesan supervisor of charities. At the dedication of the Church of the Holy Family, Taunton, on March 28, the sermon was preached in both English and Portuguese by Rev. M. C. Terra, pastor of St. Peter's Church, Provincetown. At the conclusion of the Mass Bishop Feehan spoke in French. The edifice is of Romanesque architecture with a tower surmounted by a Celtic cross.

At Hamilton, Ohio, the Catholics are at work on plans for the establishment of a high school in connection with the parochial system of education.

It has been customary for the past six years to have a military field Mass at the Brooklyn Navy Yard in connection with the public Memorial Day services. This year this Mass will be celebrated on Sunday, May 23. Father McDonald, U. S. N., chaplain of the Hancock, is already at work with the committees of the veterans and of the Knights of Columbus who have the matter in charge. In the campus where the temporary altar is erected there will be accommodation for 10,000 people.

Dr. Wm. A. Dunn, of Boston, has been made a knight commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, in recognition of his services to the church.

Columbus College, Hawthorne, N. Y., for the training of Italian students for the priesthood, will be dedicated on Sunday, May 16. The Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Falconio, will officiate and the Rev. Dr. Francis C. Kelly, of Chicago, head of the Church Extension Society, will preach, and bring from Rome the special blessing of the Holy Father on the institution, which is the gift of Mr. John J. McGrane, of New York, to the Salesian Fathers who have charge of it.

John Austin Woods, who, in 1860, with his uncle, James Sheehy, and Father Pendergast, of Avon, organized the first Catholic church in Youngstown, Ohio, died there on April 5, aged 81 years. He served in one of the Ohio regiments during the Civil War, and two of his maternal ancestors were in the Continental army under Washington. In the years before there was a church in Youngstown, Mass was said by the traveling missionary priests in his father's house. Two of his sisters are Sisters in the Convent of the Sisters of Charity, at St. Vincent's Orphanage, Cleveland.

Archbishop Farley has added his approval to that of Archbishop Ryan to the project of erecting a memorial statue to Father Corby, chaplain of the Irish Brigade, on the battlefield of Gettysburg.

Charles Young, a convert Chinaman, born in San Francisco, thirty years ago, spoke on the necessity of church extension work, at a St. Patrick's Day celebration in St. Paul, Minn. His remarks were so well received by an audience of 1,500 that he was forced to reappear before them and then he sang, with increased applause: "Killarney," and "Come Back to Erin," in Chinese.

Citizens of Hastings, Neb., have pledged $8,000 to enable the Dominican Sisters to open a girls' academy in the town.

Paull's Hotel, at Berwick, Me., one of the oldest hotels in Maine, has been purchased for a convent.

A Catholic matron has been placed at the Union Station, St. Louis, to look out for homeless women and girls who may be stranded there in search for employment. The expenses of the service will be paid by the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Daughters of Erin, and the women will be sent to the convent of the Sisters of Mercy until places can be found for them.

PLATFORM AND PULPIT.

The Rev. M. Sheedy, D.D., preaching at St. John's, Altoona, 21st of March, 1909, in the presence of many labor leaders, spoke as follows concerning Socialism: "The purpose of Socialism in a general sense is to better the conditions of the less fortunate classes of society. No one can find fault with it for this. It is the remedies proposed that are questioned . . . It is the duty of the State to protect the rights of its members not to confiscate them . . . In the United States an insidious effort is being made to inculcate the idea that Socialism is purely an economic question, and hence is not concerned with religion! That one may be a Christian or a Catholic and at the same time a Socialist! It hardly needs argument to show that no one can remain a Catholic and adopt Socialistic doctrine. . . . Besides being an economic and political movement Socialism is also a philosophic system essentially materialistic and therefore atheistic. . . Its founders were anti-Christian; its chief leaders are such in our own time. . . . In open debate during the Socialistic Convention in Chicago last summer, Morris Hillquit stated that 95 per cent. of the Socialists of America are against all religion. Herron and Hillquit know better what Socialism means than the honest-minded workingman who is told that 'Socialism has nothing to say about religion.' . . .

"Though the fundamental principles of Socialism cannot be accepted as true. . . there are bonds of sympathy between all right-thinking people and the Socialists. The desire to come to the relief of the oppressed and poor, to find some means to better their condition springs from a divine impulse. . . The Catholic Church will always be as she has been, with the masses in their legitimate efforts to improve their condition."

Bishop Dougherty of Neuvia Segovia (Manila) in his Lenten Pastoral makes an appeal for the establishment of Parochial Schools throughout the Diocese. He says: "If the necessity and obligation of teaching the truths of religion is the first duty of a pastor, that of providing Parochial Schools is hardly less important." He goes on to assure his flock that the U. S. Government, far from hindering, is only too glad to welcome the creation of such schools: and he quotes the words of the Governor-General on the occasion of his visit to the College of Vigan (18 Jan., 1907): "It is altogether untrue that the Government is opposed to private schools; on the contrary, it welcomes them. There are in the Philippines approximately, 1,200,000 children of school age; and of these the Government has means of instructing only 400,000; leaving 800,000 that it cannot reach, and would gladly see under the care of private schools."

PERSONAL

Before members of the Harvard Union recently, the Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, former Attorney-General of the United States, delivered a lecture on "Law as a Profession in America." It was the fifth of the six lectures on professions. He said, among other things, that a lawyer is trained to deal with the unscrupulous, so, of course, he himself must be above reproach and have a good reputation. "The capitalists," said Mr. Bonaparte,

"do not want men like themselves to take charge of their cases, but men whom they can trust, and they are willing to pay well for this sort of talent, hence a reason why a lawyer should have a good reputation. But then, I don't recommend the law for anyone who has an idea of dying a multi-millionaire."

It is reported that General J. F. Smith, when he sails from Manila on May 15th, will no longer be Governor-General of the Philippines, but will return to America as a private citizen. The President and General Smith were intimately associated in governmental affairs in the Islands, but it is understood that a slight disagreement arose between them several months ago and that a serious breach has since resulted. Governor Smith, at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, was a prominent lawyer of San Francisco. As Colonel of the National Guard of California, he served with distinction in the Philippines. At the close of the war he was appointed a commissioner and later a judge. He was appointed Governor-General as successor to Luke Wright.

Archbishop Blenk, of New Orleans, will sail from New York on April 22 to make his first ad limina visit to the Pope. He is accompanied by the Rev. J. B. Jeanmard, his secretary, and Canon Masardier. His Grace has dedicated or assisted at the foundation ceremonies of five churches and one college in his diocese within the last few weeks. A public reception was given him April 13 by leading citizens of all denominations.

OBITUARY

The Rev. Joseph H. Slinger, O.P., died suddenly on Easter Sunday while robing for Mass in the chapel of the Little Sisters of the Poor in East Seventieth street, New York. Father Slinger was born in 1839 at Zanesville, Ohio, of Swiss parents, and was ordained to the priesthood forty-five years ago. For more than a quarter of a century he was the pastor of the Church of St. Vincent Ferrer, New York City. At one time he was a professor in the Dominican House of Studies at Somerset, Ohio.

We regret to have to chronicle in our first issue the death of the editor of The Casket, of Antigonish, Nova Scotia. The Rev. D. V. Phelan died, on the 2d inst., at the residence of his father, Mr. Edward Phelan (or Phalen, as the name is often written), in North Sydney, N. S. David Vincent Phelan was born Nov. 22, 1866, and was educated at the University of Ottawa, where he was ordained priest on Aug. 15, 1892. Being appointed pastor of Canso, Nova Scotia, Aug. 27 of the same year, he zealously devoted himself to parochial duties for seven years. From 1899 to 1901 he was professor of English literature in St. Francis Xavier College, Antigonish, and editor of The Casket from 1900 till his death.

Father Phelan was a man of great literary ability and possessed a vast fund of accurate information as to books and persons. For a number of years he wrote book reviews of unusual freshness under the pen-name of David Creedon. His booklet, Talks with Parents has attained a very large circulation among parents, priests and Protestant ministers all over Canada and the United States. As editor of The Casket, he made the front page of that small-sized but most influential weekly, an arsenal of Catholic weapons wielded with consummate skill and telling humor against the prevailing errors of our time. No Catholic paper in America was ever more thought-provoking than The Casket under Father Phelan.

The Rev. D. S. Phelan, editor of the Western Watchman of St. Louis, hearing of the fatal illness of his gifted and saintly nephew, wrote as follows in a recent issue:

"No one reading that paper, The Casket, for the past eight or ten years, would suppose for a moment that it was edited all the time from an invalid chair. But such was the fact. Father Phelan has been not only a sick man, but a dying man, for ten years, and that he is alive is a marvel to all his friends. Father Phelan was only a few years ordained when that dread disease, consumption, that has no pity for bright eyes and brighter spirits, fastened itself upon him and he has fought its ravages in every most salubrious spot in both countries. He spent some years in Colorado and New Mexico, and made several lengthy visits to this city. But he got too weak to travel, and finally settled in his native town, North Sydney, to wait and prepare for death."

The death of Francis Marion Crawford, at his home near Sorrento, Italy, on Friday, April 9, is a distinct loss to literature which will be felt by countless readers of his works in this and other lands. Twenty-seven years have elapsed since he suddenly leaped into fame by his first, and in some respects, most characteristic novel, "Mr. Isaacs." Its success was a surprise to the intimate friends who had known Crawford from his youth and who saw in him only the easy-going lad whose education had been of a variegated type, a blend, so to speak, to which America and Germany, England and Italy had all contributed a share. Certainly his early training was not such as to indicate the versatile romanticist of the future; though in reality he was then laying the broad foundation of culture which he added to in later years by his travels to distant parts and his Ulysses-like familiarity with many men and many cities. In the majority of his earlier books there is little to suggest his Catholicity, though by degrees he seems to emerge from his chrysalis and to make no secret of his sympathy for the religion to which he owed allegiance. Those who have followed his literary career may have noticed a decided advance in this respect as well in the choice as in the treatment of his subjects. It is said that he felt deeply that Catholics should have viewed him with suspicion and have criticised with severity the delineation of his fellow Catholics to their disparagement in contrast with the generous laudation and heightened coloring bestowed on men and women not of his own Faith. We can believe that the novelist was sincere. In his latest trilogy, "The Prima Donna," "Fair Margaret" and "The Diva's Ruby," he avoids Scylla and Charybdis alike by eliminating religion altogether and giving us characters (persons) who are swayed by natural motives, and who, when they are lovable, cling to virtue as it were instinctively and without any apparent recourse to the supernatural. The press reports of his death tell how he received all the comforts of religion during his last days, and his choice of the neighboring Franciscan chapel for the ceremony of his requiem was characteristic of his ruling sentiment in life.

Some years ago Mr. Crawford in an article in the New York Herald criticised the Italian Government. An Italian journalist took exception to the criticism and denounced him as a foreigner. Crawford replied, giving a brief sketch of his life and an explicit declaration of his devotion to the Catholic Church. The concluding paragraph of his letter is worth quoting now:

"Were I Italian by blood," he says, "as I am by birth, I would cry: Viva il Re! (long live the King!), because I have the greatest admiration for courage and probity in the man as in the sovereign. I would also exclaim, Viva il Papa! because I am a good Catholic; but I would never say Viva il Governo! because I should be free to think just what good or bad I pleased of it. But as long as I live, stranger though I be, and American and Republican, I will say Viva Italia! the land of the arts, of civilization and culture, the fatherland of all courtesy."

It is refreshing to read the following note in that staunch Protestant review, the London Athenæum: "A good deal has been written during the last few weeks concerning the tardy 'reparation' made by the Church of Rome to the memory of the saint burned by her five centuries ago. The insinuation is incorrect in fact and theology: the Church was never at any time responsible for the burning of Joan of Arc."

CHRONICLE

Turkey.—It is difficult to reach the truth about last week's upheaval in Constantinople. Still our information from that quarter throws light on the situation which obtained before the uprising, though the actual condition is not yet clear. Apparently the Young Turks had made the mistake of not taking due account of the religious fanaticism of their countrymen. The palace party played a desperate game to discredit the Young Turks and to bring about the repeal of the constitution. The common soldier is neither politician nor yet theologian. Believing, because he was told, that the Mohammedan religion was in danger, the raid on Parliament was the result. Reports from Constantinople already affirm that the game has failed; suspicion is already taking root among the mutineers that they have been humbugged and they are expressing aversion at being induced to play a political rôle. The soldiers are said to be deserting the barracks, and resistance to the troops that are marching upon Constantinople to restore the Young Turk regime is not thought of. It grows daily more apparent that the Young Turk party is to control affairs at Constantinople; the country is with them, and because, having met a sudden and seemingly far-reaching crisis with ability, courage and restraint, they have proved that they are qualified to rule.

Meanwhile the Sultan, Abdul Hamid, has allowed racial and religious hatred to be stirred up in order to have a pretext for crushing revolution by massacre and civil war. The pitiful story of Adana, where, as information from the Armenian Patriarchate tells us, massacre and pillage have gone on uninterruptedly for three days, is the bitter outcome. Despatches from this district say that several thousand people have been killed, among them two American missionaries. French and English warships have been hurried to the rescue, and it is to be hoped that quiet will be soon restored. Civil war in Turkey, necessitating the interference of European powers, would be a signal for greater danger than the late Servian scare.

Adana.—The scene of massacres is a diocese of Armenian rite in Asia Minor (Asiatic Turkey). To-day the Armenians of Adana are divided into Gregorians, Catholics and Protestants. For the Gregorians, it is the centre of one of the fourteen or fifteen districts governed by the Catholicos of Sis; he is represented in Adana by a bishop. For the Catholics, there is an episcopal see at Adana. As regards Protestants, Adana is a mission station of the Central Turkey Mission of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (about 1,000 members). The Reformed Presbyterian Church (U. S. A.) holds it as a missionary station attended from Tarsus. There are, moreover, at Adana some Maronite and Syrian merchants and some Europeans employed in various capacities. The total population amounts to about 45,000 inhabitants during the two or three months when the decortication and the cleansing of cotton attract a great many workers. During the rest of the year the population does not exceed 30,000 inhabitants, viz: 14,000 Mussulmans, 12,575 Armenians, 3,425 Greeks, and a few others. There are in the town 18 mosques, 37 medresses, and 8 tekkes, 2 Armenian churches, 1 Latin church, 1 Greek church, and 1 Protestant church; 29 Turkish schools, of which 28 are elementary schools and one is secondary, 2 Greek schools, 1 Armenian school, 1 Protestant school, and 2 French educational establishments—one for boys, directed by Jesuit priests, the other for girls, under the Sisters of St. Joseph of Lyons. The latter includes a day-school and a boarding-school. This information is taken from the "Catholic Encyclopedia."

A private letter, from Father Jouve, who lives at Adana, says the province contains from five to six thousand schismatic Greeks, 1,500 Protestants, and as many Catholics of the different Oriental rites. As Adana is situated in a fertile plain, where cotton grows to perfection, some fifteen cotton carding factories, three spinning and two weaving factories have sprung up. The Catholic rites have in this large town four poor chapels which, if rolled into one, would not make a presentable church. The Jesuit chapel, in particular, is far too small for the faithful who attend: 144 square meters for four hundred boys, five hundred girls, and the grown up people of the Latin and Maronite rites. On Sundays there are several Masses, at each of which the chapel is always crowded to suffocation.

In the Italian Chamber.—The strength of the constitutional Opposition has decreased from 54 to 42; the Radicals increase from 34 to 44; the Socialists increase from 26 to 41; the Republicans from 20 to 23. The most notable feature of the elections has been the capture of all the large cities, Rome, Bologna, Florence, Genoa, Turin, and Venice by the bloc party, composed of Radicals, Socialists and Republicans. The burden of the bloc speeches at the opening of Parliament was to taunt the Government with having been elected by the Catholics. "You are prisoners of the Clericals," they shouted. As a matter of fact the ministry owes its majority to the support of the Clericals, and that majority is sincerely opposed to any anti-clerical legislation. President Giolitti confessed as much in the chamber when he said that not even the Socialists had dared make the question of divorce an issue in the elections. A discussion on lowering the import duties on wheat brought out the fact that while Italy produces less wheat than it consumes, it makes more wine than it can use or export. It was resolved that steps be taken to encourage the growing of wheat in regions where there is an over-cultivation of vines.

The Tariff.—During the week the tariff has engaged public attention to the practical exclusion of other domestic interests. The Payne bill as modified by the House was laid before the Senate on April 19, having been held ten days by the Finance Committee, to which it was referred after the vote in the House on April 9. The discussion of the bill thus far makes clear that party discipline is likely to be better conserved in the Senate than in the House. Senator Aldrich, opening for the Republicans, outlined the stand apparently to be taken by that party in the Senate. In a carefully prepared address which he read, the Chairman of the Finance Committee explained that the bill reported by the Committee, when taken in connection with the internal revenue taxes and other existing sources of revenue, will produce sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government without the imposition of additional taxes. In detail he affirmed that the Senate bill would give $345,000,000 from customs annually. Claiming that there was possible an additional revenue of $5,000,000 hitherto lost through undervaluation, he argued that if Congress would enforce a proper and necessary policy of retrenchment and economy a surplus over all expenditure could be assured by 1911, and all need would be removed for "onerous" income, inheritance, dividend, and other special taxes. The Democratic taste was satisfied by a more popular speech from Senator Daniel, who followed the lines of old-time Democratic doctrine, arraigning the general policy of Protection.

An Income Tax.—How to insure the sum of nearly $1,000,000,000 which the government must have every year, whilst at the same time keeping the promise made to the people in the platforms of last autumn to revise the taxes burdening them, is a question interwoven with the discussion of the new tariff bill. Senator Aldrich is openly opposed to the levying of new special taxes, and most of his party are with him in his stand against an income tax. Some of the western Republicans and the Democrats of the Senate appear to be of opinion that such a tax is needed; in fact, Senator Daniel has proposed an amendment to the tariff bill taxing the dividends of corporations; Senator Bailey, an amendment taxing the incomes of individuals, and Senator Cummins is conferring daily with his group of "progressive" western Republicans in the hope of agreeing upon an income tax amendment which will be supported by themselves and all Democrats.

The Patten Wheat Deal.—In the country at large the struggle over wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade has developed considerable feeling. Mr. Patten, the Evanston millionaire who is manipulating the deal, denies that there is a corner in wheat. He affirms that he has never had over 10,000,000 bushels of May wheat and that the present high prices are the natural result of scarcity of the staple in the world's markets. The traders opposing him declare that only a corner could make the present price of wheat $1.25. They add that Patten had at least 25,000,000 bushels of wheat and that he has made at least $5,000,000 on the deal thus far. Whatever be the truth in the matter, the phase of the struggle interesting the people is this: the price of flour has increased twenty-five per cent., the price of bread May 1 will increase twenty-five per cent., and the size of loaves already has decreased twenty-five per cent. The millers of the country are coming in for strong criticism for their action in raising the price of flour. There were, on April 1, 1,923,000 barrels of flour in the United States and Canada. That this flour was made out of wheat that cost less than a dollar a bushel is the charge made. Since the recent quick advance in price the millers are accused of raising the price of flour $1.30 a barrel over the legitimate profit based on the price at which they bought the wheat. It is held that the raise should not come until the millers buy the high-priced wheat. So far they have not bought it.

Local Government in Spain.—The most important bill now under discussion in the Spanish Chamber is that providing for Local Government. The measure tends to administrative decentralization and thus gives some satisfaction to the Catalans. From the first the members of the Liberal Party, under Moret, and the Democratic, under Canalejas and General Lopez Dominguez, have been declared enemies of the scheme. But the most signally displayed hostility has been that of certain Liberal periodicals. The truth is that the Liberals have good reason to fear genuine decentralization, since it involves serious danger to their political and administrative preponderance. The discussion of the first portion of the bill, which deals with municipal administration, is now proceeding slowly in the Senate.

Events in France.—The apologists of M. Briand will no doubt profit by the appearance of his book, "La Séparation," a collection of all his speeches on the Church question, to insist that the law is justified in its results, to point out that public worship continues undisturbed, and to claim that if the Church has suffered material losses the fault is all her own. But what they will beware of pointing out is that the Church has accepted material ruin as the price of all that is left to her, namely, freedom of worship, for the law framed by M. Briand and his colleagues was a law of slavery. The price of freedom has been an annual budget of 32,000,000 francs, 30,000 presbyteries, 250 episcopal residences and seminaries, and vested funds for pious uses to the amount of more than 400,000,000 francs, which have been confiscated by the government. During the separation crisis there was a falling off in the number of religious vocations, but once more the horizon is brighter, and the young men now presenting themselves are nearly all from the upper or middle classes, bringing with them the influences of wealth and position. The priest is no longer a mere government official; his field of action is wider and his freedom untrammelled. It has been remarked by M. Bertillon, Director of the Statistics Bureau of the City of Paris, that during the past two years the number of civil funerals has decreased; and the priests report an increase in the Baptisms and First Communion during the same period. That anti-clericalism is only on the surface in the provinces is evidenced by a comical incident at what was to have been a civil funeral of a Toulon socialist. It is customary there to have singing at funerals, and as the body, without priest or prayers, was carried through the streets, the cortege chanted the "Requiem æternam dona ei Domine." Twenty times over it has happened in Brittany that civil magistrates who have not dared allow the priest to assist at the funeral of one of their employees have been most careful to mumble an "Our Father" and sprinkle holy water over the grave.

A Notable Election.—Dr. Carl Lueger, the "uncrowned king of Austria," as he has been not inaptly called, has been elected burgomaster of Vienna for the seventh time. The term is six years. The burgomaster is elected by the City Council of 150 members. Of these 130 cast their ballots for Lueger; the other 20 turned in blank ballots. Lueger made an eloquent speech of acceptance, in the course of which he thanked the opposition for not opposing him, and said he felt that he could at least conclude from their action that his work as burgomaster for the last twelve years had not been to the detriment of the city.

The history of Lueger's seven elections to his present post is of unusual interest, for it is the history of one of the greatest victories over graft and corruption in the records of modern municipal politics. After a splendid fight for purity of government for more than fifteen years, he was elected burgomaster in May 1895, but resigned because he could not command an absolute majority in the Council. He was at once elected a second time, but again declined, whereupon a deadlock ensued; the Council was dissolved by the Emperor, and the city was governed by an Imperial Commissioner. In September of the same year his party was returned with a two-thirds majority and Lueger was again elected and he accepted. But he had powerful political enemies in higher places who induced the Emperor not to confirm the election. This action caused a political storm, with the result that fresh elections took place in 1896, with still greater success for Lueger and his party. Once more Lueger was elected burgomaster. This was for the fourth time. But his enemies were still powerful enough to induce the Emperor to ask Lueger to demonstrate his loyalty by resigning, which he did. One year later he was elected for the fifth time on April 8, 1897. He was elected a sixth time in 1903. During his administration the city has been transformed architecturally, administratively and morally, until from a city thirty years behind the times it has become one of the most beautiful capitals in Europe. It is now the "Kaiserstadt" in deed as well as in name. Dr. Lueger, as is well known, is a fervent Catholic, fearless in his profession and practice of the Faith.

Peace with Servia.—In his speech accepting the burgomastership of Vienna, Dr. Lueger expressed the pleasure of the Austrian people at the outcome of the trouble with Servia. The people desired peace and they rejoiced that peace had not been broken. One result of the negotiations had been to show Emperor Francis Joseph as a man of peace. A further result had been to emphasize the loyalty of Germany to Austria.

The formalities culminating in the announcement that Servia had withdrawn her claims began in Belgrade on March 30. On that date the ambassadors from England, Germany, Russia, Italy and France presented the collective note of the Powers to the Servian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Milovanovic, whose acceptance of it assured the continuance of peace. On the following day, March 31, the Servian minister in Vienna, Simic, presented Servia's declaration to Baron Aehrenthal, Austria's Foreign Minister, who received it with words of friendly satisfaction. Therein Servia declares that by the occurrences in Bosnia her rights have not been affected, and that accordingly she will agree to whatever the Powers shall determine with regard to Article 25 of the Berlin treaty, which was declared violated by Austria's action. Further, Servia withdraws her protest and opposition expressed last October, promises to change her political relations with Austria-Hungary and enter into friendly communication once more. As a pledge thereof she will reduce her army and its equipment to the proportions it had in the spring of 1908, will disarm volunteers and prevent all further mobilization.

The immediate effect in Servia was one of dissatisfaction. It is felt that Servia has been disgraced. In Austria there is a strong inclination to withhold judgment over Servia's sincerity until her attitude towards a commercial treaty with the monarchy becomes clear. Satisfaction is felt over the manifestation of a preponderatingly pro-Austrian sentiment in Montenegro. It is further considered certain that the Russian minister, Iswolski, who was thought to have been urging Servia against Austria, will be displaced.

Jubilee of Dr. Porsch.—The President of the Centre Party of the Prussian State Parliament has celebrated his silver jubilee as Representative. Dr. Felix Porsch has for twenty-five years represented the same electoral district. As a distinguished lawyer he holds a high position in the administration of the diocese of Breslau and is a papal Chamberlain. In parliament he has been for many years first vice-president.

In his speech at the jubilee banquet, he said among other things:

"When a young student, I was, in 1871-2, a member of both houses as lobbyist; I mean I was in the lobby when Bismarck launched his most violent personal attack on Windthorst and demanded of the Centre to exclude him. Windthorst, after the close of business, rose for "personal remarks." The president of the house had sent him word that he might speak as long as he liked, the house had tact enough not to interfere, and so Windthorst made the longest "personal remarks" on record in the whole history of the house. I was also present on the following day, when Mallinckrodt, in the name of his party, declared that the Centre would never give up 'the Pearl of Meppen, which had found in the Centre Party its right setting.'

"Those were times of open cruel warfare, but our own are in a way more difficult. In those days one course alone was the right one, in ours there are often many courses that may be considered right, and it is difficult to find the one that will justify the confidence placed in us by our constituents."

Champlain's Tercentenary.—The St. Vincent de Paul Society, of New York City, has chosen for the subject of its annual public lecture this year an ideal Catholic layman and one of our great historical figures, Samuel de Champlain. His character and achievements will be the theme of a lecture to be delivered by the Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., at Carnegie Hall, Sunday evening, May 2, in aid of the funds of our great confraternity of lay charitable effort. Father Campbell has devoted much study and research to his subject, and has brought to light many interesting facts in the life of Champlain hitherto unknown. The lecture will also have a special interest because of the celebration in July next of the tercentenary of Champlain's discovery of the beautiful lake which still bears his name, a celebration in which New York, Vermont and Canada will jointly take part, and which will be the feature of the coming season at the Catholic Summer School.

Educational Conference in Atlanta.—A three days' conference was held in Atlanta last week by representatives of the Southern secular universities and schools and several educators from the North. R. C. Ogden of New York presided. The trend of the speeches and resolutions was towards the increase of efficiency in schools of all grades, by securing the advice of educational experts, the co-operation of elementary schools, high schools, colleges and universities, and more generous financial assistance from the federal government. St. Clair McKelway assured the South that the North was willing to co-operate with and through Southern educational organizations, being quite satisfied that the Southern people were dealing wisely with the colored race, just as the North itself would do under like circumstances. Dr. C. L. Coon, of South Carolina, proved statistically that the negro contributed to the school taxes somewhat more than he got from them.

Dr. Hise, of Wisconsin University, said that education should solve the material as well as spiritual problems of life. This was the only indication through the whole conference that education had any direct concern with spiritual or moral issues.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Situation of Christians in Turkey

A communication to AMERICA from Auguste Davier, who has had several years experience as a missionary teacher in the Ottoman Empire, shows that the present troubles in Turkey have been foreseen for some time.

Turkey has enjoyed its Constitution seven months and has had four months and a half of parliamentary life. As was to be expected, this new order of things has served to rend the veil that hid the sores of the Empire, rather than to cure them. Hitherto foreign journalists and novelists who wrote about Turkey, visited especially the seaports, where, thanks to the presence of a great number of Europeans, the situation was relatively bearable, and particularly in Constantinople, where visitors, seeing a privileged city exempted by the Padishah himself from military service and from a part of the taxes, forgot the rest of the country and formed a too favorable estimate of the Turkish Government. But now the Ottoman press lays open all the grievances, failures and corruptions. The House cannot find the necessary time for hearing and discussing the complaints of its members. Greeks and Bulgarians of Macedonia attack each other. The Yemenites reveal the extortions of government officials. Then there is famine in Anatolia and disorder in Hauran. But the greatest of all grievances—one that dwarfs into insignificance the difficulties with Austria and Bulgaria—is the money deficit, an endemic disease in all Moslem countries, and incurable except by foreign financial help. The Ottoman House has officially recognized that the Christians have the same civil rights as the Mussulmans. This is nothing precisely new: for the old régime always employed some Christians, as, for instance, during recent years, a Maronite vizier; and Egypt, which has no Constitution, has a Copt at the head of its ministry. The parliament of 1908 adopted the Sunday rest, as the parliament of 1876 had done before it. Nevertheless, Greeks and Armenians complain that their electoral rights have been violated and that the elections have not given them their proportionate representation. In point of fact, the Mussulman majority is overwhelming, and this bodes ill for Christian interests.

In the provinces the ever smoldering hatred against Christians breaks out every now and then into deeds of violence. When lately in Constantinople an Old Turk plot was unearthed it was found that the conspirators counted on thousands of accomplices all over the Empire, especially the Mollahs, ready to preach the enslavement or even the massacre of Christians. At Beyrout a number of Mussulmans took forcible possession of the seats in a French company's railway train, and in spite of the protests of Nazim Pasha, who was present, and who is generally feared for his justice and intrepidity, they had their free ride: for they deem themselves the owners of everything in the country, railways included. At Yabroud, north of Damascus, the Christians, who are one-third of the seven thousand inhabitants, were attacked because they rang a school bell. Formerly the ringing of bells was forbidden throughout the Empire because they drown the voice of the muezzin and because it is a distinctly Christian custom. Now, however, the ban against bells has been raised. But there are Mussulmans at Yabroud who want to revive the old law. At the beginning of last January a Christian schoolmaster having replaced a small school bell by a larger one, capable of being heard at a greater distance, many notable Mussulmans took this as a provocation and organized an attack on the Christians in which a local constable was killed. It is only fair to the Turkish Government to add that in all these cases it honestly tried to restore order and mete out justice.

But things do not always end so happily, and it is impossible that they should, for that would suppose a government not only perfectly honest, but able to command obedience. The fact is that the Turkish Government does not establish order everywhere. This would be extremely difficult, for there is more disorder now than there was under the old despotic rule. The army is altogether unable to cope with local revolts and troubles in many directions. Troops are called for against the Kurds in Dersim and in Mesopotamia, on the frontier of Persia, against the Old Turks of Cæsarea, and in Macedonia. In Constantinople, Medina, Mossoul and elsewhere, they are needed to quell the revolts of the garrisons themselves.

The House does not work smoothly; the Old Turks have boasted that they will restore the old order of things. It is impossible to foresee the result of a violent rupture between the members of parliament, for example, a conspiracy of the Old Turks to abolish the Constitution, or a counterblast of the Young Turks to uphold it. Heretofore the periodical revolutions in Constantinople during the past three centuries, often accompanied by despotism or even murder of sultans and grand-viziers, and by massacre in the streets, have had hardly an echo in the interior of the Empire. But this would not be the case now that the Young Turk movement has awakened and stirred to their depths the Ottoman provinces. What then would become of the Christians whose position and civil rights constitute one of the burning questions that divide the Mussulmans? May we not see once more the terrible days of 1860 or 1896? Many fear so. On the other hand, in many places the Christians are arming, a thing they were formerly forbidden to do. Moreover, a part of the regular army, of the officers at least, would be ready to defend them.

Taking all in all, then, the future is uncertain and threatening. And yet we cannot deny that the Constitution has realized a certain progress in that Christians are now officially on a par with Mussulmans and need no longer truckle to the disciples of Mohammed, although this advantage is offset by the development of an infidel press and of freemasonry, which the Young Turks themselves abhor. Albeit there is little hope of converting them immediately to Christianity, still it is a great gain to note that a goodly number of the better educated Turks are beginning to lose their fanaticism and to reject principles which were an integral factor in their religion, and even go so far as to acknowledge that the Koran is an enemy to all progress. Doubtless it is better to be a sincere Mussulman than an atheist. But Islam is, as against the spread of Christianity, so formidable an obstacle, so immovable a block, that one cannot help rejoicing to see it, at long last, show signs of breaking up.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton's "Orthodoxy"

In Mr. Chesterton's recent writings we witness a phenomenon which a less than a prophet might have predicted had he taken the trouble to analyze the tangled skein of modern thought in the past decade. Speculation has run rife in many guises, and, though pursuing various channels, has found a common issue in the futile conclusion that man is a self-sufficient being—the gist of the creed which is called Humanitarianism. Against it the facts of life and the elemental needs of human nature beat in a violent reaction. Mr. Chesterton voices this reaction in a startling and original way. He himself came by the road of negation (out of the agnostic house of bondage) to a positive appreciation of the universe. This process he unfolds for us in his latest book, "Orthodoxy," his apologia for his conversion to Christianity. In a prior work, "Heretics," he broadly assaulted the Moderns in a series of criticisms none the less scathing for all their lightness of touch and their brilliant humor. In "Orthodoxy" he posits his own philosophy with a compelling power, and with an originality, which even if they do not convince his most stubborn opponents, cannot fail to startle them into a just admiration.

Mr. Chesterton's contention is that a right view of the meaning of the universe is the one essential thing, whereas this is the one thing that modern thought has thrust aside as of little consequence. "A man's opinion on tramcars matters: his opinion of Botticelli matters. Everything matters—except everything." Doctrines do not influence conduct is the modern dictum. But doctrines do; nay, they are the very roots of conduct, insists Mr. Chesterton. Men's creeds are the determinants of their civilizations. To deny the ethical validity of creeds is to saw the limb from the trunk with the sawyer at the outer end. Mr. Chesterton's basic thought in "Heretics" is that "the question is not whether the theory of the cosmos affects matters, but in the long run whether anything else affects them." In "Orthodoxy" he lays down as "the actual fact that the central Christian theology (sufficiently summarized in the Apostles' Creed) is the best root of energy and sound ethics." The theme of the book is to show how he arrived at the conclusion. He started out, he tells us, on a quest of truth, which should be all his own truth; and as he proceeded on his voyage he found that every truth he hit upon, was not only not his own truth, but somebody else's truth and a very old truth at that. He was like his own imaginary Englishman, who, starting out to discover a new island in the South Seas, discovered England. Mr. Chesterton discovered Christianity.

In the chapter which he entitles "The Ethics of Elfland," for even in his titles is Mr. Chesterton a paradoxer, he tells us that he found the full flood of the thought of the age set directly against some of the elemental emotions which he had brought with him from the nursery. These had taken deep root in his nature and had settled into convictions. He had felt from his childhood that the world does not explain itself. Modernity said it did, but the modern explanation which made it a machine did not adequately account for it. Behind the world there must be someone who runs it. It was a work of art, and, in spite of its defects, beautiful; therefore there was an artist. Life was a gift which man held on a condition, as happiness in the old fairy tales is held on a condition: "You may live happily with the King's daughter if you do not show her an onion." Lastly he felt "that in some way all good was a remnant to be stored and held sacred out of some primordial ruin. Man had saved his good, as Crusoe had saved his goods; he had saved them from a wreck." These, he tells us, were the soils for the seeds of doctrine.

When he analyzed the various assaults upon Christianity, he found them contradictory. It was as if a number of people had offered conflicting criticisms of a man; one said he was tall; another, short; one declared him black; another, white; one, lean; another, fat. A queer man, was Mr. Chesterton's conclusion. Further reflection led him to the thought that possibly the queerness was more in the critics than in the object under criticism. The critics were singularly unanimous against the man, but startlingly at variance about him. He forthwith scrutinized the man and his history, and found that it was the man who was normal and the critics odd; the man sane, the critics wildly fantastic. The more he read the critics, the more rapidly was he driven to the conclusion that the balance of truth lay with the Church. After reading the last atheistical essays of Robert Ingersoll he put down the book, he tells us, with the profound feeling: "Thou almost persuadest me to be a Christian." Pursuing his investigation to the end, Mr. Chesterton did become a Christian, and it was the perusal of agnostic literature that led him to the embrace of truth.

Mr. Chesterton is essentially a fighter. He likes things to come to a point, swords, for instance, he tells us. He handles his weapon glitteringly, with a smile and a jest, but none the less vigorously and fatally. His play of wit and humor is marvelous. It might be called a display—almost. But the manner is the man in his case particularly. His originality lies in his way of putting the truth in a startling paradox, whose explication becomes a brilliant array of moving pictures, graphic and striking. Withal when he comes to his point it is found to be simple common-sense, the obvious balance of truth. His vitality, his joie de vivre is his dominant quality. Serious though it may be, there is no reason to take life solemnly or morbidly. He finds the world a delightful place, and the vexed and insoluble problem which the Moderns have made of it, he will have none of. Their dreadful ghosts are to him simply bogies conjured out of an insane perplexity. Life is a gracious gift, for which he is grateful to the Giver. Its happiness hangs on a condition, for which he is sheerly thankful. As he puts it: "We have no right to look a winged horse in the mouth."

To say that "Orthodoxy" is a brilliant apology for Christianity is but half-praise. It is an original and even profound exposition of its subject; original in its method, profound in its insight. It gives us no new truths, but it does present the old truth in a new way. Its brilliancy and its novelty carry it where a sedate method would fall short. In it we have a paradox which may well confound the Modernists. While they have been endeavoring, in an overwrought anxiety, to square the Church with the vagaries of modern science, Mr. Chesterton has smashed his way out of the crazy labyrinth of its confusions into the wholesome refuge of Catholic sanity. While they have been ignominiously parleying with the enemy he has ridden triumphantly through their bewildered phalanxes with flashing battle-axe, and with the ancient war-cry on his shouting lips.

CONDÉ B. PALLEN.

The Census and the Churches

For many years the lack of accurate statistics of the Catholics of the United States has been a theme of constant complaint, and a serious drawback to the historical student desirous of recording the progress of the Church here and its bearing on the deductions of political economy to be drawn from the tables of the religious census. In 1907 an arrangement was entered into between the U. S. Bureau of the Census and Archbishop Glennon of St. Louis, acting for the hierarchy, by which he was to serve as the official enumerator of the government and supervise the collection of a Catholic census. There is present evidence that the figures which the Washington officials intend to publish in the early future, as the result of this enumeration, will not be an accurate presentation of the number of Catholics in the United States.

It will be remembered that when the annual Catholic Directory was ready for publication last January, the Wiltzius Company of Milwaukee, its compilers, sent out the figure of 14,235,451 as the total of the Catholics in the United States. This was printed as an item of current news in almost every paper in the country. It did not, however suit the peculiar views of the American correspondent of the London Times, who, in a letter to that paper, made charges of glaring unfairness and dishonesty against these figures. It happened His Grace Archbishop Ireland was then abroad, and he immediately wrote to the Times a letter, which was printed in the issue of February 13, controverting the statements of its correspondent, and this is what he said:

"The figures given out by the 'Directory,' it should be at once remarked, are not the 'Directory's' own finding. They are those furnished by the Most Rev. Archbishop of St. Louis to the National Bureau of the Census at Washington, under instructions received from the National Bureau itself. . . . It was agreed between Mr. S. A. North, director of the National Bureau, and the body of the Archbishops, that the Metropolitan of St. Louis should have the matter in hand, and by putting himself into communication with every Bishop and every parish priest, obtain for the Bureau an exact estimate of the Roman Catholic population, so far as possible, upon such basis and through such calculations as Mr. North himself should have previously approved."

The basis adopted was this:

"Those shall be reckoned as Catholics who, baptized in the Church, whether in their infancy or in their later years, still profess to be Catholics, not having since their baptism withdrawn from the Church, either by open act of apostasy or by conduct impliedly tantamount to a renunciation of the Catholic Faith—mere infrequency, however, in attendance at Mass or at the Sacraments not constituting such renunciation."

"In other words, those and those only were to be enumerated as Catholics who, baptized in the Church, continue to make profession of the Catholic Faith. These were the instructions formally and plainly written to the several bishops and parish priests; these are the instructions to which bishops and parish priests gave obedience in their enumerations of the Catholic population within their respective dioceses and parishes."

To this the Times has replied by a statement from its correspondent that the Bureau of the Census has informed him that it will reduce the figures of the Catholic Census by fifteen per cent. A representative of AMERICA, taking this last statement of the Times correspondent, has asked the Director of the Census if it were true, and on what grounds the accuracy of Archbishop Glennon's figures was questioned. His answer was:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,

WASHINGTON, APRIL 2, 1909.

DEAR SIR:—

I am in receipt of your letter of March 29th, making inquiry as to the basis of membership in the Roman Catholic Church. In response thereto, I take pleasure in furnishing you with the following statement concerning the basis agreed upon by the Committee of Archbishops appointed to co-operate with this office in the collection of the statistics for that denomination, and with Archbishop Glennon, who acted as the representative of this office in the conduct of the work:

In the collection of the statistics of religious bodies, the pastors and clerks of the individual church organizations were instructed generally to include in answer to the inquiry concerning communicants or members, "all who are entitled to participate in the ordinance of communion in those denominations which observe it, and all members in other denominations."

So far as the Roman Catholic Church is concerned, it was suggested in the first letters sent out (in the latter part of 1906) to the Archbishops and Bishops, that it might be necessary for the pastors, instead of reporting the "population," to give the number of communicants, as would be done in the case of other denominations, the language used being as follows: "In order that the statistics of all the denominations may be uniform it will be necessary to request the Roman Catholic Church to accept the census basis, and report the number of communicants, instead of reporting the 'population.' This was the method adopted and assented to by the Church in 1890. At that time, however, the number of communicants was estimated on the basis of population, the rule adopted by the prelates of the Church being to take eighty-five per cent. of the population. Inasmuch as, according to the present plan, the card containing the inquiries will be filled out by the pastor or clerk of the individual church, it is presumed that the actual number of communicants can be given." It was stated in the letter that any suggestions on this point, as well as on other points, would be welcome.

In a letter addressed to Cardinal Gibbons, October 27, 1906, his attention was called to the different methods adopted by the different dioceses and parishes in estimating their membership, and he was asked whether all could not be induced to have one and the same basis for their enumeration. The question was put to him whether the proper basis for census purposes would be the number of communicants, that is, of those who are entitled to commune [Catholics would say "to receive Communion." ED. AM.] (This letter was sent to Cardinal Gibbons at the suggestion of Archbishop Ireland.)

In a letter to Archbishop Ireland, under date of December 11, 1906, he was asked as to what decision had been arrived at in regard to the basis for reporting the membership of the Roman Catholic Church.

To these suggestions and inquiries no direct reply at that time was received, but at a meeting of the Archbishops, held in this city, April 11, 1907, in regard to co-operation with the Bureau of Census, the following, among other recommendations, were adopted:

"The Committee advises that in this letter (to be sent to the Bishops) determination should be made of those who are to be regarded as Catholic for the census enumeration, and suggests that they should be regarded as Catholic, who, baptized in that faith, have not formally, by word or act, renounced it.

"That the Catholic census as reported by the various dioceses include also the children and infants baptized, as has been customary. Advice may be made to the United States Census Bureau that, if it does not wish to include the children in this enumeration, fifteen per cent. deduction from the Catholic census may be made as representing children."

In view of these recommendations, it was suggested to Archbishop Glennon, in a letter sent to him May 1, 1907, that the pastors be instructed to uniformly report the total number of baptized persons (including children and infants), leaving it for the Census Bureau to make the deduction of fifteen per cent. as suggested. In reply to this, contained in his letter of June 17, 1907, Archbishop Glennon says: "The letter to the pastors in regard to enumeration of the numbers of the parishioners, including the children and infants, and then your purpose afterwards of deducting fifteen per cent. in order that the statistics of the Catholic Church may be consistent with those of other denominations, is altogether satisfactory."

In keeping with this plan, the circular letter, signed by Archbishop Glennon, and sent to each pastor in connection with the schedule and general instruction concerning the method of reporting the membership, says: "In answer to inquiry 13, communicants or members, please report the total number of baptized persons (males and females), including children and infants."

The returns for the individual church organizations in the several dioceses and archdioceses with respect to membership were made, therefore, in accordance with this special instruction, but a deduction of fifteen per cent. has been made in this office in accordance with the understanding as hereinbefore stated.

Trusting that this will give you the information desired, I am,

Very sincerely,

Enclosure. (Signed) S. A. NORTH, Director."

The "enclosure" is the official circular of the Department of Commerce and Labor, dated December 26, 1906, which states that this religious census is taken "in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Congress approved March 6, 1903," and that "a full and accurate census of religious bodies in the United States is desired." In the list of explanations and instructions that accompany this circular, "Inquiry 13" says:

"By 'communicants or members' is meant all who are entitled or privileged to participate in the ordinance of communion in denominations which observe it, and all members in other denominations, such as Unitarians, Jews and Friends."

Gervase Elwes and the Oratorio Society

Last year the Oratorio Society of New York made an effort to produce "The Passion according to St. Matthew," of Johann Sebastian Bach. In its thirty-five years of previous existence the society had done much for the highest forms of musical art, conquering many formidable difficulties; but it approached this greatest work of the most famous master of modern music in a spirit of high enterprise wisely tempered with caution. The outcome of the endeavor in 1908 justified the misgivings which had preceded it even more than the praiseworthy spirit of enterprise. That performance has been, retrospectively, described by a daily paper as a "highly unsuccessful struggle with Bach's music on the part of almost everybody concerned," and the very exactness of this characterization is just what constitutes a large part of the Oratorio Society's claim to grateful honor for its courage in renewing the attempt this year. The knowledge that the performance of Bach's greatest and most difficult Passion Music last Maundy Thursday came of a determination not to "yield to the evil fate, but rather go on the more boldly," makes it all the more pleasant to record that the performance of 1909 was very far indeed from being an "unsuccessful struggle with Bach's music."

Certainly Mr. Frank Damrosch and his society had left nothing undone to insure success in this year's struggle with the great master of the fugue. What hours of concentrated effort must have been devoted to the conquest of those intricate interweavings of solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, those who heard the performance can readily infer. At the same time a step had been taken which might have had the effect of redeeming a much less meritorious performance; the society had brought from England a singer whose qualifications for the arduous work of Evangelist, in Bach's Passion Music are altogether unique. Probably because neither Mr. Gervase Elwes nor Mr. Frank Damrosch shines in the art of "working the press," there seems to have been no little—though not unkindly—wonderment in musical circles as to why the tenor soloist for this great occasion should have been imported from the foggy isle of Britain. Nobody doubted that New York, in March, 1909, contained a fair proportion, perhaps a majority, of all the best tenors now extant, and the American public at large really knew little, if anything, of Mr. Gervase Elwes. It was not generally known here that Mr. Elwes was something which may be described as a specialist in the declamation of religious music, and above all, in that particular masterpiece which the Oratorio Society had resolved to add to the difficulties of its this year's task, "The Dream of Gerontius." These facts, with the little bit of personal history which attaches to them, though now somewhat late for advertising purposes, should be of special interest to the Catholic readers of this Review; for they link themselves naturally, through the distinguished and revered poet of "Gerontius," with the memory of that Apostle of Rome, Newman's saintly patron and exemplar, who was in fact the inventor of the oratorio.

Gervase Cary-Elwes, to give him the name by which he is known in private life, is the son of a Yorkshire squire. When the nowadays exponent of Gerontius was but four years old, his father, one of that long train of converts who followed John Henry Newman, was received into the Catholic Church, so that Gervase, if not born within the fold, has spent but little of his life outside the pale. Like so many other sons of English converts, young Cary-Elwes was educated at the Oratory School, Edgbaston, under the eye of Newman himself. The great arch-convert and Oratorian was, as everyone knows, both an enthusiastic and an accomplished musician. As St. Philip, whom he called "Father," had been wont to arrange those little Sunday concerts in his "piccolo oratorio" at Rome, three centuries before, so Father Newman, of the Birmingham Oratory, used to gather as many of the pupils of his school as wished to come for little informal concerts on Sunday afternoons. He himself, with his violin, made an excellent Kapellmeister until just before his elevation to the Roman Purple, when age robbed his arm of the strength demanded by his favorite Beethoven. But, for such a small school, Edgbaston was remarkably rich in musical ability; what with boys and masters, there were always enough competent amateurs to minister to Newman's most pronounced earthly appetite on Sunday afternoon during the school term. Among the boy violinists of the school just then was "G. Cary-Elwes," whose name appears among the signatures of the Oratory School address of congratulation when "the Father" became "the Cardinal." Cary-Elwes must have been a very fair performer at that time, or his services would not have been accepted and approved, as they were; for, with all its sweetness, the atmosphere of that school had light, which made it critical. Cary-Elwes left school in 1881 and entered the diplomatic service of Her late Britannic Majesty. It is not strange that, after a few years of diplomacy, having discovered the possession of a rare tenor voice, and with the splendid grounding in general music which he had acquired in early boyhood, he should have made up his mind to alter his course in life. His first serious study of vocalization was under Bouhy, in Paris; then he studied in Brussels, and finally became, in London, the pupil of Geigel. By that time Cary-Elwes had made the acquaintance of Brahms and, with this modern of the moderns for a friend and adviser, and under the tuition of Geigel, he began the cultivation of that special style of vocal music which made him, probably, the most fortunate possible choice for the rôles of Elgar's Gerontius and Bach's Evangelist.

To those who knew so much of his history there was a peculiar interest in the appearance of this—to America—new Gerontius at Carnegie Hall last month. The Director of the Oratorio Society would have shown commendable good taste, though bad advertising sense, perhaps, if he had intentionally refrained from calling public attention to Elwes' specially qualifying antecedents. As a matter of fact, Dr. Damrosch seems to have known little or nothing about those antecedents; when asked in what school this new tenor of his had been trained, he answered that he had never inquired—"I go by results." The results, in "Gerontius," and hardly, if at all, less in "The Passion," were a triumphant vindication of the director's choice. Perhaps the minor critics might have been more alert to select the peculiar finesse of enunciation, the exquisite phrasing, the subtle power of expressing shades of meaning without a suspicion of over-emphasis, if they had been warned that this tenor was not only Newman's pupil but a personal friend of Elgar. As it was, the daily papers, one and all, spoke at least respectfully of Elwes' performance, some enthusiastically; but only rare comments showed a distinct perception of the fact that the singer's aims were unconventional, or, as some might say, new-fangled.

Elwes' method as a singer may, for want of a better analogy, be compared to Charles Hawtrey's methods as an actor. He belongs to the "quiet" school—a school, as yet, not so well known in musical as in dramatic art. He also belongs to the school which emphasizes the difference between vocal music and instrumental, the essential fact that the human voice utters articulate sound, so that no mere vocalise can be adequate singing. Nor is this said in order to palliate any deficiency of tone quality; in the Gerontius the tenor successfully stood the test of comparison with two other solo voices whose quality is seldom surpassed on any concert platform. It was evident that the foreign larynx was not at its best so soon after the trying experience of an Atlantic voyage and a first acquaintance with the whims and oddities of the New York climate; but it was also evident that this was an organ of very unusual sweetness and power, with a strongly marked individuality. But the still more impressive fact in Elwes's singing of his part on that occasion was the luminosity of his interpretation. Possibly the consciousness that the tenor had known Newman, loved him and revered him, as a boy loves and reveres the great man who is his teacher, may have added a certain authority for at least one member of that audience; but that the majority of those who heard Elwes came away with a better understanding of Gerontius's spiritual experiences, it is impossible not to believe.

Catholics generally must of course be more interested in the work of Newman and Elgar than in that of Brockes and Bach. The former is Catholicism pure and simple, logically complete, uncurtailed, overwhelmingly driven home upon the human imagination by the art of a master of modern English allied with the art of a master of the most modern music; the latter has in it a something maimed—a hint, towards its conclusion, of a sadly lost sequence of ideas—ending not in the expectancy of the Resurrection, but in a mood of delicious repose after physical pain. In listening to the Bach masterpiece one can hardly help wishing that the latter, the Catholic composer, had been the equal of the older, the Protestant, since Bach was denied the insight of Elgar. Unfortunately, it is as certain that Bach was a pronounced Lutheran as that his is the greatest name—save, perhaps, one—in the history of music. What must console the Catholic musician is the consideration that if the composer of this particular "Passion" was a Protestant, the form which he employed originated with St. Gregory Nazianzen, and has been preserved in the "Cantus Passionis" of the Catholic Church to this day. Gervase Elwes was familiar with the severe grandeur of the Chronista part in the Roman Missal long before he could have dreamed of attempting Bach's complex arias. And the musical form, too, in which Elgar composed Newman's great poem, had its more immediate origin in the institution of Newman's own "Father Philip."

"The jewel of Polish Catholic American immigration," are the words used by a contemporary to sum up Madam Modjeska's life.

Isaac Austin Henderson

Isaac Henderson—or Isaac Austin Henderson, as he preferred to be called, having adopted the name of the great doctor of the church at his confirmation—died in Rome, on March 24.

Mr. Henderson was born in the city of New York, Feb. 13, 1850, of Scotch and Irish descent, though his family had lived in America for many generations. After making his early studies in private schools and under tutors in his native city, he entered Williams College, from which he received the degree of B.A., M.A., and D.C.L. His wish upon graduation was to start at once upon literature as a profession, but his father, who was a partner of William Cullen Bryant and John Bigelow in the ownership of the New York Evening Post, had other plans for him, to which the young man yielded rather unwillingly. In 1872 he became connected with the Post, of which he was made assistant publisher in 1875, and from 1876 publisher, stockholder and a member of the Board of Trustees. He often spoke gratefully in after life of his father's wise judgment in thus giving him a sound business training. In 1880 he sold out his interest in the Post, and the following year went abroad, living in Rome or London until his death.

Mr. Henderson's first novel, "The Prelate," was published in 1886, while still a Protestant. He was most conscientious while writing this book, taking pains to consult an Episcopalian clergyman, long resident in Italy, to verify his statements. Later, when a Catholic, he realized on how many points he had been misinformed. He published his second novel, "Agatha Page," two years later, and this was soon after dramatized under the title of "The Silent Battle," and produced by Sir Charles Wyndham at the Criterion Theatre in London. Later in the year, the same play, though called "Agatha," was acted at the Boston Museum. His second drama, "The Mummy and the Humming Bird," was presented at Wyndham's Theatre in London, in 1901, the principal male part being taken by Sir Charles Wyndham himself. The play was given the next year at the Empire Theatre, New York, and it has been acted almost continuously ever since in various provincial theatres.

Although Mr. Henderson had varied literary gifts, he never became a prolific writer. Without having had any training, either for or on the stage, his dramatic sense was such that in presenting his plays to the public, not only was the faultless text his own, but the situations and all the setting of the play, down to the most minute detail, were due to him.

While giving sufficient prominence to Mr. Henderson's business ability and literary talent, it is as a Catholic, first and foremost, that he should be remembered, and this would accord with his own wish. His wife, who before their marriage was Miss Marian Brown, of New York, a granddaughter of the famous Quaker philanthropist, Lucretia Mott, of Philadelphia, became a Catholic several years after their marriage, her conversion being followed soon after by that of her mother, who was received into the Church when she was more than seventy years of age. Mr. Henderson then went to work in his own earnest, conscientious way to study the evidences of Catholic truth, the outcome of which was that he was received into the Church in 1896.

From the moment that light came to him, the man was transformed. The Catholic Faith became most truly his life, and his brilliant talents were consecrated to the service of the Church with all the enthusiasm of an ardent soul. He was indeed "baptized with fire." Absolutely assured of the truth of faith in the Church as founded on a rock, he held that faith with a splendid loyalty, which kindled a glow in many a dull heart. His gratitude for his own conversion was such that he felt it his special duty and privilege never to lose a chance to help another into the same perfect security and peace of soul. He never thrust his faith upon anyone; indeed, he was naturally inclined to be rather chary about stating the why and wherefores of his own conversion; but once convinced that an inquirer was in earnest, there was no self-sacrifice that he was not only ready, but eager, to make to help that soul to see the truth. He never grew weary, or at least he never showed any impatience, no matter how slow the progress seemed; but with an exquisite insight into another's point of view, he was able to understand what obscured the other's vision, even if quite foreign to his own temperament. Patiently, unweariedly, he would elucidate point after point, for hour after hour, even if the work extended over weeks, months or even years, holding firmly through what would have discouraged a less dauntless spirit, until the glorious victory was achieved. His exposition of Catholic doctrine was masterly, for he had studied it diligently for years, and added to a clear theological mind, he had rare gifts of lucid expression. Yet no one realized better than Isaac Henderson that it is not by the intellect alone that one becomes a Catholic. He knew that faith is a gift from God. Although his faith was firmly grounded on reason—for he held that not to believe was the very negation of all reasonableness, as he could and did prove so ably—yet more eloquent was he when the spiritual side of religion, its very essence, was shown. The potency of the Sacraments, the need and efficacy of prayer all the time, devotion to Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament, the communion of Saints, love for Our Lady, all these held with the full warmth of his heart made him the most loyal of sons to his dear Mother, the Church. It was this faith and love which sustained him through grievous trials and bereavement.

Not only was Mr. Henderson the ardent champion of the Catholic Faith by word of mouth, and an inspiration to all who came within his influence, he was faithful in all the observances of a practising Catholic. He gave also freely and generously of time and money to the furthering of worthy causes. His special interest was among the poor boys of the Trastevere quarter in Rome, to which work he was introduced by his most intimate friend, Cardinal Merry del Val, many years before the latter was advanced to the episcopate. Mgr. Merry del Val and Mr. Henderson made it their practice for years to pass every Sunday afternoon with these lads. How many worthy men now well started in life can look back to the influence exerted by these two devoted men as the turning points in their lives. Several are now in domestic service at the Vatican. "Mr. Henderson died after a short illness, having received the Sacraments of the Church," said the Cardinal Secretary of State, in a recent letter, "We have lost a dear and valued friend."

On the afternoon of Christmas Day, 1903, a messenger from the Vatican brought to Mr. Henderson what his friends considered a well merited honor, that of appointment as a Private Chamberlain to the Holy Father. Mr. Henderson, however, comments on it thus in a letter to a friend: "It was an absolute surprise, and I was indeed taken aback."

While Mr. Henderson was invariably courteous to all and most agreeable in society, his intimate friendship he gave only to a few. He was the most charming of companions, with an exquisite individual humor which was often really brilliant, while at other times overflowing with a merriment as light hearted as a boy's. Yet this was the man who never failed in sympathy to his friends, making their sorrows and perplexities wholly his own, and giving of his best in his efforts to be of help. For them his loss is irreparable.

Under the title "The Bored Bishop," The Tablet of the 10th inst. has a gently sarcastic article on Canon Henson's tilt with the Anglican Bishop of Birmingham. Canon Hensley Henson had promised to preach in a sort of annex to a Nonconformist chapel in Birmingham. The vicar of St. Gabriel's parish, in which this annex is situated, hearing of the proposed intrusion, at once protested, both to the Bishop and to the invader of his parish. The Canon told the vicar to mind his own business. Then the Bishop said: "It is a great bore; but I feel I must vindicate the principle of the incumbent's rights." The Canon replied to the Bishop: "When you were Canon Gore, you addressed the Wesleyan ministers and I followed your example." But the Bishop pointed out rightly that his objection was not to the mere fact of preaching at a Nonconformist meeting but to the fact of preaching in another diocese and parish without the permission of the Bishop and the incumbent of that parish. As The Tablet puts it, "What the vicar really objects to is the appearance in his parish of a wandering star of the magnitude and uncertain doctrinal direction of Canon Henson." The Canon, disregarding the Bishop's prohibition, did preach in the Nonconformist annex, and now expects that he will be prosecuted in the Court of Arches.

Roads to Rome*

Rarely has there been brought together a collection of stories of such palpitating human interest as is found in these four dozen autobiographical sketches of an event that was epochal to each of the writers. It is often said that truth is stranger than fiction. In this case the saying is amply verified. Intense realism and an evident sincerity mark these pages and render them more keenly alive with interest than the best of fiction. They are heart stories, human documents of the highest value.

Miss Curtis, if we mistake not, a convert herself, has achieved a success in inducing so many prominent men and women momentarily to lift the veil of privacy of their own inner lives and reveal to the gaze of a probably unsympathetic world the process, in each case, of a soul struggling in the gloom of doubt and prejudice, of non-knowledge and false knowledge up and into the full light of the sunshine of truth. The celebrated Father Matthew Russell, S.J., of Dublin, once told the writer of this review, although he had done much editorial work, and had written a fair amount of poetry, he never dared to write prose fiction because he was afraid of revealing to the world too much of his own interior self. It was a remark that only a genius would make. Far from even remotely hinting that there is any admixture of fiction here, we find in every page the absolute stamp of truth; and while the pages, as a whole, do not display evidences of overwhelming genius, yet nearly all the writers have done, consciously or unconsciously, that which the editor of the Irish Monthly shrank from doing. They have revealed themselves. Often their innermost consciousness has become, literally, an open book. And herein lies the chief value of the work. Only one or two present an itemized and categorical account without an attempt at the development of the process that led to conversion. Nothing but the desire to be of assistance to others who have not yet availed themselves of the "kindly light," or who are groping their way outward and upward in an entanglement of uncertainties, would have induced these contributors to lay bare their inner souls. This is candidly admitted by some, and it is easily deduced from the humble, yet exultant style of others.

Being the product of so many differing minds the volume affords as great a variety of style as it does of individuality. Through all runs the note of gladness at having finally reached the secure haven, and in a fair portion of the sketches there is discovered the humble wonder that the subjects of them should have been chosen as the recipients of the gift of Faith, while thousands were passed by.

The book is unique in American Catholic literature. The subject matter of the volume is so much out of the ordinary that one cannot predict that it will become popular in the sense that it will figure among the best sellers.

It will, however, have a more useful career than mere ephemeral popularity. It will be found of service to two classes of people. To those who are still groping in the penumbra of faith, whose minds naturally upright and ingenuous, are lost in the mists of doubt, and in blind but inculpable prejudice, these sketches must be of untold assistance. To clergymen who have to deal with this class of people, "Roads to Rome in America," will be invaluable.

Others who will receive benefit from the perusal of these pages, throbbing with human interest, are those who are born Catholics, whose faith is simply a happy matter of course. To many of these it will be a revelation how the average intelligent convert values the gift of faith, and it will make them entertain a higher appreciation of that which others, through stress and storm and often keen mental torture, have finally obtained.

It is interesting to learn the motives of these converts leading up to the intellectual assent, which, as everyone knows, is the antecedent necessary condition to the act of faith. In most cases it was the arriving at the ultimate historic certainty of a Divine Authority, which reason announced was to be found only within the fold of the Catholic Church. In a few cases, Transubstantiation, as the logical complement of the Incarnation was the leading motive; while in others it was a careful study of the Scriptures, to discover from them which church corresponded in these days to that founded by our Divine Lord, and in these cases it is remarkable that from the Protestant Bible the enquirers found their way into the Catholic Church.

Prescinding from the fact that faith is a divine gift, and regarding merely the necessary endeavor of human reason in order to obtain it, these "reasons for the faith that is in us" form a remarkable collection, showing the multiplicity of ways in which the human mind works in quest of truth. It is quite within the bounds of probability to say that the experience here described of any one of the forty-eight converts would not appeal to any of the others.

Among the contributors to the volume are authors, editors, society women, nuns (one a former Salvation Army lassie, who writes a charming sketch), ministers, lawyers, physicians and others. The editor states that owing to a generous response for contributions from all parts of the country she had to reject much material.

In every, or nearly every case, the narrative ends at the road which has led to Rome. Would it be presumptuous to suggest a further relation of experiences within the fold by converts? To many a timid soul looking Rome-ward, it is not the end of the road that is so mysterious, but the supposed horrors and hardships and submissions that lie beyond after Rome has "got the victim in her clutches." The real reason why so very few, who once admitted into the fold ever wander out of it again, would probably be more helpful than even a detailed account of how they arrived there.

CORRESPONDENCE

Rivalries in South America

Last year it was rumored repeatedly that a war between Brazil and the Argentine was imminent. Though a real clash at the time was not feared, yet the fact that strained relations existed between the two powers could not be denied. This fact was only too natural and there were too many reasons for mutual jealousy. They are the two most powerful states of South America; giants in geographical extension, but opposed to each other on account of nationality and language. Brazil, with an area of 3,218,000 square miles, is nearly as large as Europe; while the Argentine is only one-third that size. The difference in population is even greater, the respective numbers being twenty-two millions, and five and one-half millions.

For the time being competition between the two powers cannot be carried on by force of arms; Brazil is too powerful both on land and on sea. When the present navy bill is carried out, her fleet will register 104,000 tons, while the Argentine can hardly mobilize more than 50,000.

To enter more into detail, Brazil has three Dreadnoughts, named Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro and Minas Geraes. The Argentine has not one ship of this type, not even on paper. Its naval force consists merely of four armed cruisers protected by six-inch armor plate. Brazil's second class warships cannot compete with these four, but the number of her submarine boats nearly equals those of the Argentine. Moreover, as Brazil owns several minor warships of a different type and five torpedo-destroyers, there cannot be any doubt that in case of conflict she would have the upper hand. This supposes that the three Dreadnoughts which are being built in England, will be ready in the case of a clash. It might, however, happen that England, as has been hinted at in the English Parliament, will incorporate these three ships with her own fleet.

A naval war could indeed not lead to any lasting results for or against supremacy in the South-American continent; much less could a war on land. The immense territorial extent of the two states make a complete invasion impossible. The existing armies could occupy only a very small portion of the enemy's territory, and the war would in any case be a long and profitless one, as neither the Argentine nor Brazil would be truly benefited by territorial aggrandizement. Each country already owns much more land than its sparse population is able to occupy and cultivate.

Since, therefore, supremacy cannot be decided by war, means of peace must be resorted to; and that country will come out victorious which best utilizes modern methods and improvements along economic and social lines.

In this regard, however, competition will probably end in the victory of Brazil. Nevertheless the natural resources of the Argentine are not inconsiderable; they are even such that Brazil cannot compete with them, consisting as they mainly do of flocks and herds, of which the number of horses is estimated at six millions, that of cattle at twenty millions, and that of sheep at eighty millions. Agriculture is flourishing, and, after North America, the Argentine is the first wheat country of the globe. It must also be mentioned that the Argentine is at present the goal of a continuous Italian immigration, which is not at all the case with Brazil. A third great advantage is the milder climate, which reigns in by far the greater part of Argentinian territory, and favors the exertion of mental and physical powers in a much higher degree than the enervating heat of the tropical and sub-tropical climate of Brazil. Moreover, industry is much more extensively and vigorously practiced in the Argentine.

However, these facts do not decide the question of supremacy. Brazil has other advantages and such as are, perhaps, more telling in the peaceful struggle of competition. There is, in the first place, her superiority in numbers, which will not be reached by the Argentine during the next two or three generations, even with a very strong immigration. But the most important resources of Brazil are the treasures of her soil, such as coffee, rubber, gold, and diamonds. The Argentine's meat and corn cannot rival these products.

It follows from these considerations that the struggle for supremacy will not interfere with the healthy development of the two nations in the immediate future. The territories are too large, the products too various, and efforts made for commerce and industry too strenuous. Hence we may conclude that their relative power will probably remain unchanged for the next decade, though their individual strength will increase.

CARL SCHLITZ, S.J.

Belgium

The Congo controversy is raging once more. The point in question now is the missionaries, against whom many accusations have often been made, and more recently repeated by the Socialist leader, M. Vandervelde. The question is a most important one, as grave issues are involved: the reputation of the missionaries, the future of Catholicism in the Congo, and of the State itself, and perhaps the future of Belgium itself at the hands of that bugbear of all Continental politics, England.

Recently Father Vermeersch, S.J., the distinguished advocate of reform and adversary of the Congo administration, set forth his views in the Bulletin de la société Belge d'études coloniales. M. Vandervelde thought he saw himself attacked, and replied in an open letter in his own paper, "The People." He is a clever and able man, a brilliant writer, anti-clerical of course, but usually frank, open and courteous. He was (contrary to his own party) for annexation, and joins Father Vermeersch in condemning the "Leopoldian regime." His principal points were these: He repudiates the accusation of insincerity and bias, but says he is sorry to see the missionaries provoke anti-clericalism in the Congo, by exerting moral pressure to keep the orphans under their care beyond a suitable age, and by using force, through the secular arm, to bring back fugitives, and to impose tithes for the support of the missions.

Father Vermeersch replied, first, that the accusation of unlawful restraint of children was made before it could be verified; that in so doing Mr. Vandervelde imposed on a gullible public, and made a statement that could only be refuted after some months; that the missionaries, though marrying the children at 14 and 16, have the lawful right to detain them as orphans up to the age of 21; that the tithe is only a temporarily necessary measure; that the missionaries have not opposed the free circulation of money—the natives themselves did not want it; that the secular arm is not the missionaries'; that force is sometimes necessary, and that by force is understood pressure, etc. He concludes by showing the bias and inaccuracy of Vandervelde's statements.

A second letter from Vandervelde followed. He says that the marriageable age is 9 and 12, and it is not right for the law to keep orphans in restraint up to 21 years; that the tithe is not temporary; that he was not guilty of insincerity by culpable silence on the good done by the sisters, because on his visit to the Congo he did not visit their schools and so could say nothing of them—a fatal admission. As for the guardianship of the orphans, he says now it is abused only in certain cases, and reserves his definite opinion on the subject. He disavows any interest in the quarrel of Protestant missionaries, but says that while they are actively and laudably engaged for fifteen years in exposing the Congo abuses, the Catholics kept silence. He ends by professing himself at one with Father Vermeersch in the movement for reform.

Father Vermeersch answered by denying Vandervelde's statement about the children, showing that he has retracted from his previous position; as to the tithe, that he confounds the tax enforced by the State with a temporary application of it to the orphans. He says, too, that it is better to keep the few they have who are not really orphans than to let them go to their families and starve, or fall back into savagery. Vandervelde's scheme of secular education is impracticable for want of teachers, and he himself must admit that the only available teachers are the missionaries. He then strongly rebukes the evident want of logic in Vandervelde's second letter, and appeals to him to give his frank assistance to the work of the Belgian missionaries.

A few days later a long article appeared in the "Patriote" in answer to one in the "Vingtième Siècle," an organ of a section of the Ministry. This latter defends the King, the Congo administration, and attacks the reform movement generally. The former stands with Father Vermeersch. The article in question gives some interesting facts. To the 10,000 orphans the Jesuits are rearing, the State gives practically nothing; while 30,000,000 francs ($6,000,000) are to be paid as an indemnity to the King. In the Congo masonic interests are supreme. One former official was forced to resign on account of damaging revelations made. The Congo is called a refuge for men for whom it is too hot in Belgium, while Mgr. Roulé, of the Congregation of Schent, is quoted as proving that whole families are forced, in Mangalla, to remain away in the forests, working the rubber, for ten, fifteen and twenty days at a time. The article ends by showing that the real enemies of the Congo are the officials themselves, and neither the Catholic missionaries in their work of catechizing and civilizing, nor the Protestant missionaries who have at least done good work by denouncing the abuses of the Government.

About the same time, the Vicar-Apostolic of the French Congo wrote to the "Bien Public," refuting other statements of M. Vandervelde, and saying that the latter passed about fifteen minutes in his schools and then went over to the State schools, whose scholars he said were so much better than the Catholics, at a time when no scholars were there.

The outcome of the conscription and volunteer agitation was a compromise. The main conclusion was that the volunteer scheme had been a failure, so it was proposed by the Government to appoint a commission of inquiry. It will be remembered that the measure, i. e., the enforcement of military service on all, is an unpopular one, and the Government that passes it will probably fall. Hence the whole thing is looked upon by many Catholics as a plot against the Catholic ministry.

During this month the Catholic journalists of Belgium will make the pilgrimage to Rome in a body, carrying with them 210,000 francs ($42,000) as a Jubilee offering, the result of a subscription. P.

The bill regulating the working hours of miners in Belgium was passed by the Chamber on April 1. The agreement finally arrived at was a maximum of nine hours from entry to exit from the shaft; while besides that, the King is authorized to use his discretion in reducing that figure in necessary cases, and a maximum of eight hours is also fixed for mines when the temperature is greater than 28 degrees centigrade. The vote was 123-8.

This event is not without its political significance for Belgium, and shows how ideas have changed in two years. At that time an amendment was introduced of far lesser pretensions regarding the miners' working hours, and after a bitter fight was passed 76 to 70—it caused the downfall of the Cabinet a few days later. But there is more than that. That amendment was fought by the Liberals, yet here we find the Liberals voting in a mass for what they formerly opposed. In fact, history is only repeating itself, for it is the same with many other measures opposed by them, e. g., the bill of 1889, limiting labor of women and children. The conclusion of it all is that the best thing for Belgium to-day is the maintenance in power of the Catholic party, for while the Socialists are naturally carried to extremes, and the Liberal policy is one of immobility, the Catholics stand midway, and are thus in a position at the same time to act with moderation and to avoid stagnation.

Since the passing of this bill, the question that has been occupying the attention of the Chamber is that of forced labor in the Congo. The debate began by some severe strictures made on the Government's policy by M. Vandervelde. The particular point now at issue is the labor employed by the Great Lakes Railway Company, which, it is alleged, amounts to slavery. D.

Ireland To-day

"A gigantic revolution" in Ireland. These are the words of the English minister governing Ireland in March, 1909, on his introduction of a new land bill. The revolution is in part accomplished. No country is changing more; in few countries does the near future seem less likely to resemble the present. Even those not long away from Ireland may misjudge. Returned exiles have been known to go back again to America, with eyes opened, and much wondering at what they saw—the chances for energy and industry, the security of a tenant in his holding, the non-existence of the Ireland of their own exiled youth.

And that was before the Act of 1903, which pushed forward land purchase; by which Act millions of acres have passed into the hands of tenants; half the land of Ireland, indeed. But this selling and buying has stopped. There is lack of money. Still, all English political parties are agreed that money must be raised, and not from the Irish rate-payers. Shall the sales now be compulsory? Yes, says the Liberals' present bill. No, say the Conservatives, who passed the bill of 1903 by a consensus of parties. Can a compromise in its favor be found with the House of Lords, which already rejected such a measure last autumn?

An Irish Nationalist mentioned the other day in a session of parliament three miracles of recent legislation: (1) the giving of local government to Ireland, in its popularly elected county councils; (2) the selling of the land; (3) the founding of universities which Irishmen are free to manage for themselves. And surely in bringing about the state of mind making such things possible, the politician may not unreasonably think that his agitation has counted for much. He does think so. The upholders of a policy of Sinn Fein, 'ourselves alone,' believe that such miracles would have come inevitably, sooner, perhaps, had Irishmen agitated at home and sent no members to parliament in England.

But be Sinn Fein a possible plan for carrying on public life under protest or no, its spirit is the spirit moving everywhere in Ireland to-day; among men of all parties, all creeds, all races. Trust ourselves, they say with Emerson, every heart responds to that iron string. "Burn everything that comes from England except the coals," which Swift did not say, but which he heard a Protestant Archbishop of Tuam mention as somebody's "pleasant observation"; what Danes and Belgians can do with less fertile land, Irishmen can do, under nearly the best climate in the world. All such thoughts are careering through our minds. Irish industries feel the new blood in their veins. Prosecution after prosecution in England have brought fraudulent or misled dealers to beware of calling poor shoddy stuff by the noble name of Irish lace and Irish cloth. The Cork Industrial Association was the pioneer; its manager, Mr. E. Riordan, the man made for the place, must be the terror of those who would palm off imitations under the Irish Trade Mark. Thanks largely to an Irish M. P., Mr. J. P. Boland, this distinctive patent and safeguard has been recognized, and is now accepted by crowds of Irish manufacturers. A good sign surely of a healthy non-political life, of which there is so much in Ireland, and will be more.

Swift said as long as two hundred years ago that "both sexes, but especially the women, despise and abhor to wear any of their own manufactures, even those which are better made than in other countries." His 1720 tract was "A Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures in Clothes and Furniture of Houses; Utterly Rejecting and Renouncing everything wearable that comes from England." The Dean would give his imprimatur to "A Modest Appeal to the Irish People," from the Industrial Development Association, telling of all that is made in Ireland, such furniture as is made by the Kilkenny Woodworkers, with their warehouse in Dublin, spreading every few months over new ground; the Belfast linen, finer in ground, as the Germans say, than anything their technical skill can make; the Jacob's biscuits from Dublin, with a sale now greater in England and abroad than at home. But such facts one notes everywhere. The Youghal beaten copper cares not to show its trays, its vases, candlesticks, mirrors, in Ireland; for in England, now, they can sell more than Youghal can make.

In such an Ireland, the thought of Mr. William O'Brien to unite Irishmen, even politically, was a noble thought. But, mayhap, he went not the right way about it. In nothing is an Irishman generally less like an Englishman than in violent hatred of compromise. He is not Hamlet's "three parts coward," anyway.

The Gaelic League is mixed up with a hot, if cooling, controversy, as to Irish in one of the new universities. But its idea was to unite, and not to divide. Its members tend indeed to be indifferent to parliamentary politics; and perhaps most of them are in the letter of Sinn Fein; certainly in its spirit. What will be the outcome? Will Irish be used as the popular language? Will it come back, like Czech? Will it be used even at home like Welsh? One thing has been done. An impetus has been given to the study of this country's past, its antiquities, its history. Irish chairs at universities are sure to be founded. The sense of a national life has been re-awakened and acknowledged. Thomas Davis' work has borne fruit; and his spirit lives.

Emigration has fallen this year lower than any year since 1851. The new life in this Ireland, where the great majority still live in the country, on the land, accounts for the staying at home. In part, no doubt. Also, that America has offered a less sure refuge. Both sides of life in America are more often laid bare to us now.

Russia

In spite of the reports of the Russian persecutions of the Jews we notice that one foremost publication for the year 1909 is the "Jewish Encyclopedia" in Russian. Two volumes have already appeared and it is promised in sixteen volumes, to be completed at the rate of about three volumes a year, and will cost, bound, one hundred rubles ($52), not including expenses of delivery. The work is published by Brockhaus-Ephron, St. Petersburg, and is announced to cover the whole field of Biblical criticism, history and archæology, from the Hebrew point of view, as well as Jewish theology, jurisprudence and history in general, including descriptions of the lives, rites and customs of the Jews in all lands, but with particular reference to their position and achievements in Russia.

The Russian church is meditating a new codification of the Canon Law applicable to it. Stirred no doubt by the new Corpus Juris Canonici now in process of completion at Rome, the Holy Synod is taking thought that something of the kind ought to be done for the established Orthodox church in Russia. When the general Code of Russian Laws was published, in 1837, the stray fragments of Canon Law relative to the state of the clergy and the administration of dioceses and parish life, were compiled into about 368 paragraphs, or sections, and placed on the statute book. It is now felt that this so-called Code is insufficient and that it has out-lived its usefulness. Accordingly there is a movement for revision and the production of something which will put the church on a better legal basis. As the matter has to receive the assent of the Government, in the shape of a ukase to the Holy Synod to prepare such a code, it is too early to say whether anything will be done.

Female suffrage is coming rapidly to the front in Italy. A bill has been introduced conferring municipal franchise on all women who have attained twenty-five years, provided they possess the qualifications necessary for male voters. Parliamentary franchise is not included. Signor Giolitti thinks that the granting of female parliamentary suffrage in the South would be a surrender of many seats to the Clericals.

Papal Elections

Early in March of this year appeared in Rome the third volume of the "Acts of Pius X," containing a document which was prepared early in 1904 to deny the right of "veto" in the Papal elections so often claimed by certain powers, particularly by Austria, France and Spain. Pius X denies that there ever was such a right, that the claim and attempts to use it were an invasion of the rights of the Holy See, and that his predecessors had frequently protested against its intrusion, notably Pius IV, Gregory XV, Clement XII, and Pius IX. He once more repeats their denunciations of the pretension of any civil government to influence in any manner whatsoever the election of a sovereign pontiff. Although the text of this document appears now for the first time, its existence has been no secret since the time it was prepared. Our leading Catholic journals, in Europe and in this country, announced its preparation and stated that it might not be published for some time, perhaps not until it might become necessary to elect a successor to Pius X. Indeed, but for the speech of Count Goluchowski, Foreign Minister of the dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary, to the Hungarian delegation for foreign affairs, December 17, 1903, it is likely that the Holy See would have postponed action on this question until the failing health of the present pontiff might make such action imperative. The Count felt it incumbent on him to plead that his government had justly attempted to exercise this veto in the Conclave in which Pius X had been elected, in order to meet the outcry of public opinion against the invasion of so sacred a tribunal. The most he claimed for this veto was that it had the force of custom, and that it was an effective means of conveying to the Cardinals a wish or warning from the civil government. He admitted that it had no sanction of definite law or treaty, or concordat of any kind. Because it had been claimed as a right, and asserted frequently and never contradicted by the College of Cardinals as such, his government was justified in its attempt to exercise it.

In Rome the Count's address was regarded as a challenge, and the Cardinals in Curia met immediately to frame their answer. This answer was published broadcast early in January, 1904. Briefly, they denounced the so-called right of veto or exclusion of a candidate as an act of usurpation; they declared that it could not have even the force of custom, because it had been repudiated frequently by the supreme ecclesiastical authority; they explained that if their predecessors had ever heeded the so-called national or imperial wish of the Powers, it was either because special amicable relations existed between the Holy See and these Powers, or because arbitrary or tyrannous influences had been brought to bear upon them. They concluded by petitioning the Holy Father to take such measures as would put an end to discussion of this matter. It was recognized as an accomplished fact at that time that the veto would never be again attempted. The publication of the "Constitution on Papal Elections" has occasioned no stir in civil or in ecclesiastical circles in Europe. It has not provoked discussion among the professors of jurisprudence nor among court attachés. It is taken as a matter of course. The Church merely asserts its position and no civil government has the slightest pretext for a rejoinder. No international lawyer would regard the "Constitution" as a matter for serious dispute. The Vatican is not dictating to the civil powers; the Holy See is not seeking "to maintain a medieval supremacy." It is simply protecting its own autonomy, and safeguarding the most sacred function that any human assembly can exercise from the intrusion of selfish, political and secular influences.

A "Christian" Candidate for the Ministry

Last week we took occasion to refer to a certain statement of Dr. Patton, of the Princeton Theological Seminary, in reference to the weakening of Christian influence in our churches through the liberalizing trend of modernistic theology. "The condition of affairs will grow worse," said Dr. Patton, "before it will grow better." An apt commentary on his words appears in the press reports of Tuesday of last week. A Princeton graduate, doubting the confession of Faith and practically denying the Divinity of Christ, appeared before the New York Presbytery to be examined for license to preach in the Presbyterian Church. Frankly he stated his position to the members of the examining board: that original sin had nothing to do with Adam or the Garden of Eden; that Christ was not an educated man; that He did not raise Lazarus from the dead, and that he did not believe Christ rose in the body from the grave. Of course the ministers on the board, men of the old-fashioned Christian faith, were amazed and shocked, and they promptly rejected the young free-thinker's petition for license to preach in a Christian church. We may be permitted to suggest a reflection that occurs to us.

Lately one of our prominent weeklies published a sharp criticism of an excommunication pronounced by Rome against a Munich University Professor who, after a warning, stubbornly persisted in his purpose to air doctrinal views at variance with the teachings of the Catholic Church. The writer evinced a curious lack of appreciation of the force and meaning of the ecclesiastical censure passed upon the professor, but it is not our present purpose to advert to this defect. We are moved to ask, however, shall we now have an editorial commentary on the presumption of the Presbyterian examiners, because they strive to bridle the liberty of thought of the candidate appealing to them for license to preach, and an animadversion on their ingenious method of closing to the candidate the avenue to the life-work he has chosen?

Every one will recognize the similarity of motive in each condemnation. Rome refuses to approve the teaching of the German Professor, who, in matters of vital import, in his public lectures proclaims himself at variance with her accepted doctrine, and, with the right that is hers by sanction of Bavarian law, she forbids the Professor to lecture in a University Faculty avowedly Catholic. The Presbyterian examiners deny to the applicant for license to preach in their district the necessary approval, because he frankly declares his lack of faith in what they deem fundamental truths of their Church's Confession of Faith. Shall we, then, have another Outlook comment on "an ingenious method" of silencing a prospective teacher, a graduate of their own Theological Seminary, put into effect by the Presbyterians?

That Rome proceeds further and excommunicates the Professor is but evidence that the Church has the vigor of life every organized body must possess to compass its proper activity. And with this vigor in her execution of the law she applies the sanction which makes her law effective; she tells him, who, while calling himself Catholic, yet stubbornly rejects her decrees, that he no longer has part with her, and that the privileges of her sacramental treasures are through his own unfilial disobedience denied to him.

Be one as "liberal" as he may in measuring up to his standards, in his individual grasp of truth and in his claims to "freedom of thought" in accepting or rejecting what the old-fashioned orthodoxy clings to as sacred, it is all his own affair, and he is free to follow his whims to their uttermost limit. He may be guilty of egregious folly, but so long as he keeps his folly to himself he has his own conscience alone to consider. But when he deals with others, when blind he seeks to lead others, when rejecting the very fundamentals of Christianity, he presumes to claim place as teacher in a Christian school or temple, is it not time to consider the rights of those who sit at his feet in the confidence that he will fulfil his trust honorably?

The Christian Church is an organized body, and they who deal with it must respect the obligation they voluntarily assume to abide by the living principles actuating that body. Lacking this respect, honesty and honor should impel them to withdraw from the Church and follow their notions apart. It is idle to talk about choking liberty of thought when the authorities of the Church refuse to acknowledge within its communion a teacher false to its fundamental doctrines, or when they cut off and brand as not of their body one who persists in flaunting before the faithful what they deem heresy. As well hold the President of the land up to ridicule were he to cashier a Professor of West Point for treasonable teaching.

Advice from the Vatican

In Spain some time ago a Catholic party was formed to oppose other Catholics who belonged to a group professing a liberal policy, and sent a deputation to Rome, in order to prevail on the Vatican to favor their views. They went with confidence but returned disillusioned, having been required to sign a formula of instructions denying their contention. Parts of these instructions are of interest to Catholics everywhere:

"No Catholic should accuse any person of being a lax Catholic for the sole reason that he belongs to a party that styles itself 'Liberal Catholic,' although this name is repugnant to many, and it would be better not to employ it. To combat systematically either an individual or a party, solely on account of the title 'Liberal,' will never be either just or opportune. Let acts and doctrines be attacked that are reprehensible, whenever they appear, and no matter to what party their authors belong. Whatever is good and honorable in the sayings or doings of the members of any party, especially of those in authority, can and ought to be supported and approved of by all who pride themselves on being good Catholics and good citizens. This applies not only in particular cases, but in legislative assemblies, in municipal actions, and in every phase of social life. If we love our religion and our country, a foregone resolve to oppose and to hold aloof from all who call themselves liberal Catholics, cannot be determined upon. We may not, in conscience, exact from any persons that they should affiliate themselves to one party rather than to another, nor claim that anyone is obliged to renounce a political opinion that is upright. In matters which are solely political, we are permitted to hold different opinions, not only as to the immediate origin of the civil power, but also as to its exercise under different forms. In that which concerns the defence of religion and its interests, and in all that pertains to submission to constituted authority and to our bishops, we desire in all respects to keep to the teachings of the Holy See, especially as promulgated by Pius IX, Leo XIII, and by Pius X."

La Semaine Religieuse, of Toulouse, to which we are indebted for this report, adds that Leo XIII had given similar instructions to the French, and it regrets that they are so frequently disregarded in the heat of political ardor by overzealous partisans.

Protestant Unity

The dream of unity holds a strange fascination for the Protestant mind. The fascination is the greater in proportion to the disintegration everywhere visible among those who at the time of the great revolt against the Church of Rome in the sixteenth century set up private judgment as the ultimate court of appeal in matters pertaining to faith and dogma. Last week at a meeting called by Presbyterians in New York City for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of their church's independence even of other Presbyterian churches, the speeches were practically all expressive of the hope that the time was not far distant when there would be a celebration of the inter-dependence, the unity, not only of all Presbyterian churches, but of the Protestant churches of the United States. One of the most eloquent in voicing this hope was a reverend Episcopal minister who had seceded from the Presbyterian Church ten years ago, no doubt conscientiously persuaded that there was no room for a man of his heterodox or orthodox views among the followers of Calvin. One would think that the reverend speaker would be ready further the movement he so earnestly prayed for by expressing regret for his conversion and begging to be re-admitted in the church he had abandoned. Clearly ten years have not witnessed any noted approach in doctrine between the two sects. "As we know a little more," said another reverend minister, "the better we understand, and the nearer we come to unity." Is that true in the light of facts? Between Episcopalians alone, with increase of knowledge—for we cannot in charity suppose that ignorance is becoming more dense—divisions are if anything increasing and the lines of separation more strictly drawn. In England the Anglican Bishop of Liverpool, in a recent charge to his clergy on the subject of "Eucharist" (sic) approves the policy of introducing a white vestment in the commemoration of the Lord's Supper. But The Churchman, the American organ of the Episcopalians, says that if white were adopted, "many High Churchmen would find it hard to sacrifice colored vestments, while many Evangelicals would have to abandon their opposition to any kind of Eucharistic vestments."

When such a trifle as the shade or color of a vestment is made a serious stumbling block and stands a solid barrier between great divisions of a single denomination, it is not easy for the most hopeful Christian to see how the Protestant adherents of a hundred sects can ever be brought together as Protestants in the unity of "one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism."

The Rector of Trinity Parish, New York City, has answered the charges made against the trustees of maladministration of its properties, and promised a policy of publicity in future.

Darwinism and Popular Science

The April number of The Popular Science Monthly contains a series of articles on Darwin and Darwinism, most of them addresses delivered on the hundredth anniversary of Darwin's birth, February 12th, 1909. The impression that will be derived by the ordinary non-scientific reader, or even by educated people who are not closely in touch with present day thought in biology, will be inevitably that Darwinism is still a great force in the scientific world, an almost universally accepted theory that now has risen almost to the higher plane of a scientific doctrine. Of course any such idea is utterly false. Darwinism is not evolution, but an attempt to explain evolution. Darwin was not the first to make such an attempt of explanation; but literally hundreds of thinkers before him made the effort and at least half a dozen of them came as near making a successful explanation as his has proved to be. In all of these addresses there is practically no hint that at the present moment the great leaders of biological thought in Europe, the professors of the biological sciences at the Universities of Berlin, Paris, Vienna, Strassburg, Tübingen, Erlangen, Amsterdam and Heidelberg have in the last ten years written books against Darwinism. English speaking scientists still continue, apparently from national motives, to cling to Darwinism, but even such distinguished American biologists as Cope, perhaps the greatest of American zoologists, Packard of Brown, and Thomas Hunt Morgan of Columbia, wrote against the Darwinian theory. The greatest investigating scientists of the nineteenth century were almost without exception anti-Darwinians. The "antis" include Von Baer, the greatest of embryologists, though from embryology Darwinism is supposed to derive its strongest confirmation; Wigand, the botanist, though botany is supposed to have furnished most evidence for the transmutation of species; Agassiz and Sir William Dawson, the greatest of paleontologists, though it was the study of fossils that was expected to furnish the missing links; and Von Kölliker Nägeli and Virchow, the great human and comparative anatomists, whose knowledge of anthropology should make their opinions of great weight. Prof. Driesch of Heidelberg, Haeckel's greatest disciple, declared last year in the Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh, that "Darwinism fails all along the line." Of all this growing protest against Darwinism there is almost no hint in this symposium on Darwin, published in The Popular Science Monthly, except a halting sentence or two from Prof. Morgan, who declares that "it is the spirit of Darwinism and not its formulæ that we proclaim as our best heritage." All this is typically popular science. Popular science is, as a rule, an abomination of desolation for the genuine scientist. Evidently this case is no exception. The centennial of Darwin has not made evolution more certain than he left it.

LITERATURE

When poetry is in question it is better to feel than to think; not that thought may be disregarded, but its expression must be glorified, for, as it has been happily said (in French, the language of happy sayings), poetry is the exquisite expression of exquisite impressions. Mr. T. Daly's Carmina (John Lane & Co.: price $1.00, net), is a reissue of verses that have appeared at various times, many of them too slight for criticism, but all having that gift of expression which belongs to true poetry.

The dedication, "To Herself," and the envoy, "To a Tenant," who has set up house in his heart—

You entered and the sun
Of God's air coming with you, swept away
All ugliness and squalor on that day
When first your life-long leasehold was begun—

tell us volumes about the man underlying the poet. His themes are various, but his note is always cheerful and true. What he has to say he says with unbroken sweetness: he has never visited the town of Stupidity, nor dallied with that deplorable young man named Dull. He has songs for all months of the year and drear November finds his heart as warm as golden May.

When boding night-winds snarl and moan

'Round gabled roof and frosted pane,
'Tis not our common hearth alone
That makes the winds' forebodings vain,
But these twin sparks of fire divine
It feeds from in thy heart and mine;

For here my dear,
Thy need of me, my need of thee,
The measure of our love must be.

Naturally he understands his own people best, and the Gael's longing for the misty hills of the homeland strikes the deepest chord in his soul. In the Song of the Thrush "it is May-time and the birds of free America were singing in the trees," and . . .

"I strove to imitate them and I whistled like a lad.

Oh, my heart was warm to love them

For the very newness of them—
For the ould songs that they helped me to forget—an' I was glad.

Till a new note sounded, stillin'
All the rest. A thrush was trillin'
Ah! the thrush I left behind me in the fields about Athlone!

Here again his notes were ringin'
But I'd lost the heart for singin'—
Ah, the song I could not answer was the one I knew the best."

"The one I knew the best."—Mr. Daly had never heard a thrush on Shannon's banks but has only dreamed a "dream from Jove." He sings his country's songs in a strange land, but the "good people" must have come over whisperin' the lilt of them.

The humor of his race bursts out everywhere and accompanies him in his sympathetic songs about that much-misunderstood and harshly criticized citizen, the Italian immigrant. His success is due to the truth and insight of the sketch he gives us, rather than to the dialect he employs.

W'at for you call me "Dago-man,"
An' mak' so bada face?
Ees no room for Eetalian
Een dessa bigga place?

But, pleassa, meester 'Merican,
I ask you wait and see.
How long you leeve een dessa land?
Eh? Thirta-seven year?

Ees onla seexa mont', my frand,
Seence I am comin' here.
I weesh you geeve me time for try
An' see w'at I can do,
So mebbe I gon'be, bimeby,
So gooda man like you.

The lesson is neatly taught, and we can almost see the twinkle in the Italian's eye as he sees the shot go home. In thirty-seven years the Italian will need no apology. The pathos of Leetla Joe and the sly match-making of Padre Augelo, and the lonely man's gratitude to the strange dog that came and licked his hand in Da Besta Frand, all claim, quotation, but quotation spoils them.

The book is handsomely got up, and both paper and printing are excellent.

J. C. G.

Araminta. By J. C. SNAITH. New York. Moffat, Yard & Co. 1909. $1.50.

Mr. Snaith, an Englishman, has come to the front recently as a versatile novelist. His latest work before this was "William Jordan, Junior," the weird story of a poet unappreciated by his generation. There Mr. Snaith betrayed his abject submission to all the unproved theories of evolution. The result was a lamentable failure to reconstruct the scheme of things. "William Jordan, Junior" is a miserable and tiresome effort to throw dust in people's eyes by means of a labored heaping together of unconvincing generalities. One could hardly have expected that so apparently hopeless a visionary could write so charming a novel as "Araminta." It is a delightful piece of high comedy, brim full of humor. The old countess, with a temper "acidulated to the verge of the morose," is thus described by her bosom friend.

Lord Cheriton: "In my opinion, Caroline Crewkerne is a rather embarrassing phenomenon. She has the education of a Whig, and the instincts of a Jesuit." Evidently the noble lord knew more about Whigs than Jesuits. Perhaps Caroline herself was too severe on the clergymen of the established church when, after reading a certain letter from Araminta's father, the Rector of Slocum Magna, "she declared it was so like a parson to say a great deal more than he need in order to express a great deal less than he ought."

A Legacy of Lectures and Verses.
Published by the author, Rev. HUGH L. MAGEVNEY.

Always apt in his graceful diction, the author of this collection is singularly happy in the naming of this child of his, begotten as his evening came and the Master called. A legacy indeed it is to those who knew Father Magevney in his day of power as a preacher, and who were drawn to him by his genial and big-hearted ways no less than by the charm of his oratory.

Upon the close of the Rebellion in 1865, straight from "the vision of only bright swords and bristling bayonets," Father Magevney carried the ardor of a young Southern cavalryman into the quiet and peace of the seminary to devote his life to the service of the great Captain. A man of very attractive presence, with a poet's love of the beautiful, and an orator's fire and enthusiasm, with notable charm of diction and with elocutionary powers that could not fail to delight his hearers, Father Magevney speedily came to have the reputation of a gifted pulpit speaker. In the cities of the Middle West, in Cincinnati and St. Louis, and later on in Washington and New York, he was for many years a successful preacher, whilst his charm and attractiveness as a popular lecturer caused him to be much in demand as a speaker on notable occasions. How powerful his personal influence was only they who have been affected by it can tell.

Kindly in word and work, gentle as a woman, yet full of the strength of the Christian chivalry he himself so eloquently pictured, Father Magevney had a wonderful faculty to win and to hold and shape unto good. For years he was urged to give his lectures a permanent form, but more important work forbade the rearrangement of old manuscript or the assortment of old ideas. But opportunity was to be given him. In his own words in his preface, "the long affliction with which God has been pleased to bless me has offered an opportunity and created a stimulus." In his hour of pain and helplessness he turned to the old manuscripts and rearranged them as a legacy for those he loved.

Not quite a year before his death his labor of love was ended. A few of his popular lectures, and pulpit sermons, scattered bits of verse—this was all that his ebbing strength permitted him to recast and revise. They for whom the work was done will cherish it and find in it a memory of the old inspiration which Father Magevney's eloquent voice was ever wont to arouse in their hearts.

Some Great Catholics of Church and State. BERNARD W. KELLY, New York: Benziger Brothers.

This handsome booklet, containing within a hundred pages the lives of twenty distinguished Catholics, will be a welcome addition to our Catholic school books. Considering the page limit, not much objection can be taken to the author's choice, though there are a few who scarcely measure up to their distinguished company. Only one American is given place, Orestes Brownson, and he "loved his country with the passionate—some might say, intemperate zeal—so often found in Transatlantic breasts." The life and character of Frederick von Schlegel is so admirably presented in six pages, as to excite the desire of a more extended life of this distinguished convert. The twenty chosen ones suggest the names of ten times that number equally worthy of admission to the Catholic hall of fame, and we trust that the author or other competent writers will introduce them to our Catholic youth.

This is a booklet of sixty-eight pages, which contains notes from the pen of Dr. Leitner, Professor of Canon Law in the Seminary of Passau. The subject matter as indicated by the title here given is the Roman Curia reorganized under the Pontifical Constitution, "Sapienti consilio" (29th June, 1908). The text of this constitution is reproduced; likewise the Lex propria for the Roman Rota and the Apostolic Segnatura, as also the Normae communes, or General Rules to be observed in the Congregations, Tribunals and Offices of the Curia. Immediately after the text of the Constitution, Dr. Leitner presents a brief commentary on each of the Congregations and Tribunals (pages 10-26): and this is done neatly and clearly. To some readers it may seem curious that the writer enumerates twelve Congregations while the list set down in the Constitution itself contains only eleven and it is even stated therein that these eleven Congregations along with the Tribunals and Offices constitute the Roman Curia. However the Constitution afterwards makes mention of another Congregation, "reverendae fabricae S. Petri," for which reason the writer has placed it in the list with the others, although many would prefer to follow the method of enumeration observed in the Constitution. Instead of giving the text of the Normae peculiares, or Special Rules published (29th Sept., 1908), three months after the appearance of the "Sapienti consilio," he lays before his readers a synopsis regarding the manner of transacting business in the various Congregations. This portion of the work will be found especially useful for those who may not have leisure to study these rules in detail: even those who have studied them will find the more important points here set forth distinctly.

Altogether we think that Dr. Leitner has done good work in publishing his Notes in as much as they will supply ecclesiastics, —priests and seminarists—with valuable information concerning the Roman Curia as now constituted. Although the volume was chiefly intended for those students who make use of Santi's "Praelationes Juris Canonici," of which Dr. Leitner is the editor, it will prove beneficial to others who have little or no acquaintance with the writings of that Canonist.

Ordo Baptismi. New York and Cincinnati: PUSTET & Co.

This is a neat re-print. The translation in English, German, French, Italian and Polish, of the portions to be recited in the vernacular, are on the same page with the Latin text.

Die Heilige Schrift des Alten und Neuen Testaments, von AUGUSTIN ARNDT, S.J. Ratisbon, Rome, New York, Cincinnati: Pustet & Co.

This reprint of Father Arndt's German translation of the Vulgate comes to us with the approbation of thirty bishops and archbishops of Germany, Austria, Switzerland and Holland. Besides the imprimatur of the episcopal chapter of Ratisbon, the translation is recommended by a special decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Index, signed by the late Cardinal Steinhuber, and is honored by a personal letter of the prince-bishop, Cardinal Kopp. Lastly, the Holy Father, Pius X, writes a letter of warmest approval to Father Arndt. "Your undertaking is of a truth timely, and gives proof of your learning and scholarship as well as of your piety. It has been made known to Us that eminent Biblical scholars have paid you this tribute of praise, that you have so renovated the work of Allioli as to have left nothing to desiderate in the matter either of the findings of modern science or of a stimulating understanding of the divine Word." The Holy Father is especially pleased at the cheap pocket edition of the New Testament, which Father Arndt has edited for popular use.

In the translation of the New Testament, Father Arndt has followed Allioli, except where the latter's translation seemed to be wanting in either accuracy or clearness. The foot-notes of Fr. Arndt are clear explanations of the text. We regret that more use has not been made of the Greek text. Brief references to the original would be of very great service to the right understanding of the Vulgate. The special introduction to each book of the New Testament is remarkably good. In very few words Father Arndt sums up the results of scientific study in regard to the author, time, place, language and purpose of each book. The paper, composition and presswork of the book are attractive. The clear and tasteful language of this translation, its brief and thoughtful notes make us wish we had such a revision of Challoner's Douai version. We shall later speak of Father Arndt's translation of the Old Testament.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Anatole France has issued a new edition of "Jeanne d'Arc," claiming that all the errors of the first have been corrected. But Andrew Lang is again on his trail. Mr. Lang asserts that the most glaring blunders, which a school boy could correct, are still in evidence, and that if all his mistakes and misstatements were eliminated there would be little left of the book, and the originality would be altogether lost.

Scribners' have issued in book form Francis Thompson's famous essay on Shelley. It was originally written at the suggestion of Cardinal Vaughan and published after the poet's death in the Dublin Review, by Wilfrid Meynell, his literary executor. His Catholicity and poetic genius are both as evident in his prose as in his verse. His appeal in behalf of "poesy divine" is addressed to Catholics:

"You are taking from its walls the panoply of Aquinas; take also from its walls the psalter of Alighieri. Unroll the precedents of the Church's past; recall to your mind that Francis of Assisi was among the precursors of Dante; that sworn to Poverty he fore-swore not Beauty, but discovered through the lamp Beauty the Light God; that he was even more a poet in his miracles than in his melody; that poetry clung round the cowls of his order."

Of Shelley's pantheistic "immortality," he says:

"What deepest depth of agony is it that finds consolation in this immortality; an immortality that thrusts you into death, the maw of Nature, that your dissolved elements may circulate through her veins?"

Reviews and Magazines.

In the Contemporary Review, Mr. Harold Spender reviews the "Budget Question in England," and arrives at the conclusion that the chancellor of the exchequer will have to raise £14,000,000 by new taxes in the next Budget. Mr. Spender theorizes on the matter and finally suggests a further graduation of the income tax on unearned incomes, a higher liquor license, a saving on the sinking fund, and a new land tax. He does not think an increased income tax will drive money out of the country—it will be difficult to find a country where it will fare better.

Under the pen-name "Michel," a German writer frankly admits that Germany is building against England and has never attempted to deny it. John Bull is a pirate and the son of a pirate: and in spite of all protestations international morality has no fixed standard: between nations as between individuals, homicide is sometimes justifiable. A strong fleet or no fleet was Germany's motto. A weak fleet would be a toothsome morsel for John Bull's breakfast, should England become aggressive.

The article on "Milton's God and Milton's Satan," by the Rev. Dr. Forsythe, argues that Satan is Milton's great hero, and that his God is an article of Genevan manufacture. In a general way the rationale of the article agrees with Dr. Palen's contrast of Milton and Dante in one of the last numbers of the Messenger.

"Romanus" takes the opportunity in writing on "The Foreign Policy of Italy" to indulge in one of his periodic outbursts against the Vatican. But for Vatican influences Italy and Austria might be fast friends. In the recent political events in the East, Germany and Austria acted as bullies at the expense of their junior in the Triplice: but when the present alliance expires Italy will be free to renew or not to renew the compact. Meanwhile she must increase her military and naval power so as to be in a position to defend her choice by force of arms. The general tone of the article is a bid for an alliance with England.

The Cosmopolitan for May contains an article, "Blasting at the Rock of Ages," which is even more striking than its title. The writer, Mr. Bolce, has made "an itinerary of classrooms" in all the leading universities from New York to California, Catholic institutions excepted. He has attended lectures, studied records and interviewed the faculties in regard to their moral and religious teaching, and the result is astonishing. "I have heard all the multiplex issues of morality and political economy—marriage, divorce, the home, religion, democracy—put through merciless processes of examination as if these things were fossils, equations or chimeras. There is scholarly repudiation of all solemn authority. The decalogue is no more sacred than a syllabus." Hundreds of professors in universities of "light and leading" are represented as teaching some 200,000 students that there are no absolute evils, that morality is merely a convention, that a change of religion is like a change of hats, and notions of right and wrong are no more sacred than fashions in dress; that the Declaration of Independence is spectacular rhetoric, Marriage and Democracy are both failures.

The indictment is not vague. Place, person and pronouncement are carefully set down. "Formerly," says Prof. Patten, of Pennsylvania University, "the best citizen was the good Samaritan; now it is the man who paves, lights and polices the road to Jericho." Prof. Earp, of Syracuse University, a religious and co-educational institution, said in reference to the tablets of the law that "it is absurd to suppose that God turned stone-mason and chiseled commandments on a rock." Most astonishing doctrines are assigned to leading professors of Yale, Harvard, Cornell, Princeton, Chicago, etc. Prof. Arner has prepared a monograph for Columbia University to the effect that marriage between the nearest blood relations is not only not injurious but "a factor in fertility" and "the horror of incest is a myth."

Mr. Bolce does not charge the faculties of these universities with holding the views promulgated by individual professors; but the faculty cannot or will not interfere. Anyhow, they do not interfere until the outer world protests. "Students may absorb ad libitum what conventional society condemns as tainted ethics, unless the professor, seeking publicity or inexpert in dodging it, arouses the wrath of the community." And such professors are usually "men of force and genius, often magnetic, and have a following. Their classrooms are so crowded that seating-room is at a premium."

This article should be read by the Catholic parents, unfortunately too numerous, who subject their children to such influences.

In The Nineteenth Century, for April, the place of honor is given to an article on the naval situation in England, by Sir W. H. White, Director of Naval Construction at the time of the Naval Defense Act, 1889. The article is wonderfully sane and moderate in tone when contrasted with the violent language of the Spectator and the press in general. The writer blames Cabinet dissensions for the recent "scare." Germany is building at a rapid rate, but there was no secrecy about the matter. Its program had been framed, and will be carried through. Germany is strictly within her rights in creating a powerful navy. But naval supremacy is essential to the existence of the British Empire.

After contrasting the building powers of Germany and England, and making allowances for delays in Germany owing to her limited power of producing armour-plate and gun-mountings as well as to the strength of the national labor party in obstructing government plans by strikes, etc., the writer goes on to deprecate the heroic method of laying down a great number of ships in order to convince Germany that competition is useless. Germany will not be deterred from carrying her program through: yet the duty of England's government is to see that her naval power remains undisputed. Present suspicion of Germany is unfortunate and unfounded. The countries may be rivals without being positively hostile. Moreover, apart altogether from dreadnoughts, it must be remembered that England has 40 pre-dreadnought battle-ships to Germany's 20; and 35 armored cruisers to Germany's 8.

In an article entitled "The Unionist Party and its Fiscal Sore," Lord Hugh Cecil makes a plea for toleration among Unionist Free Traders, and Fiscal Reformers. He fears the continuance of the feud will cost the Unionist party more than a few seats, and his main object is to secure the overthrow of the present Liberal regime. It is true that Mr. Balfour declares "Fiscal reform is, and must remain, the first constructive work of the Unionist Party," but Lord H. Cecil points out that the word "constructive" limits the meaning of the word "first," and that many defensive works take precedence over reform; among them he mentions the maintenance of the Union, of the House of Lords, of the Established Church, perhaps even of Religious Denominational Education as being of foremost importance in Mr. Balfour's program; and on these questions all Unionists, whether Free Traders or Fiscal Reformers are in accord. The article is, on the whole, a plea for his own continuance in parliamentary life.

In a graphic account of the "Great Earthquake," the Duke of Bronte tells how news of Messina's ruin came to a little hill-town twenty miles away (Messina non è piu, it was whispered in doubt and perplexity) and of what he saw when he visited Messina. He laments that political capital has been made out of the event. Although united Italy is an accomplished fact, there is no real union of hearts. Sicilians distrust Italian institutions, and those desiring the overthrow of the present government have fostered this feeling. It is everywhere whispered that the vast sums of money contributed by foreign nations will not go to relieve the suffering.

EDUCATION

The Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium, will celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary this year. The days fixed for the program are the 9th, 10th and 11th of September. The celebration will open with a big procession and a grand concert in which the Durand choir and the Ysaye orchestra will play Cæsar Frank's "Beatitudes" and Turck's "Katherina." The committee for organizing the National Congress of Catholic Works has issued the following declaration: As its name indicates, the congress will preoccupy itself with nothing but the future of Belgian Catholic works and their progress. Its object is to draw up an inventory of the works, to put in common the fruit of the experience of all those who had a part in them, and thanks to the lesson this inquiry will make us learn, to give Catholic vitality a new impulse. The congress will exclude from its program all political discussions. It will treat of legislative questions only as they affect Catholic action or bear on the development of good works. Its studies will be occupied with the following sections: (1) Religious, moral and charitable works; (2) Economical and social works; (3) Works of school and after school; (4) Editing and distributing printed matter; (5) Scientific and artistic works; (6) Catholic works in the colony.

Archbishop Blenk, of New Orleans, blessed the cornerstone of a new college building at Grand Coteau, La., on April 12. Situated in the country made famous by "Evangeline," and in the midst of a Catholic population largely descendants of Acadian exiles, St. Charles' College has been a civilizing influence in Louisiana for seventy years. Many of her chief citizens, including the present Governor Sanders, are graduates of this college, which was burnt down and discontinued for some years. Rev. Henry Mahring, S.J., has planned a new building on a larger scale, capable of accommodating five hundred boarders, which will be ready for occupation in September. The preacher on the occasion, Very Rev. J. F. O'Connor, Provincial of the Jesuit province of New Orleans, said among other things of Christian education:

"The Christian is convinced that in this triple training of body, mind and heart a supernatural element must enter. God and Christ and the truths of Christ's revelation must inform and direct and permeate the whole work of education from the showing of the alphabet to the giving of the Doctor's cap. Otherwise the most wisely devised system can produce but defective, partial, even prejudicial results.

"Quarry the granite rock, and moor the vessel with a silken thread, then you may hope with such keen instruments as human knowledge and human reason to contend against those giants, the passions and the pride of man." St. Paul tells us to put on the armor of God, that we may successfully combat the rulers of darkness, who war against Christ. Some who would take in hand the work of education cry out in protest against such quotations from Paul of Tarsus. None of this for the schoolhouse and the college! Philosophy and science, art and morality are independent of faith, must not be hampered by creed and need no other guide than reason! But take away Christian faith from philosophy, Christian worship from art, Christian morality from the institutions of the civil state, and what remains? Nothing but revolting paganism. You will have teachers to promulgate the most abominable doctrines which, put in practice, would destroy all civilization. . . . But the interests of true science not less than those of the Church demand that the Christian idea should animate and quicken all teaching. No man can be the client of true science, who does not love justice and truth; but there is no justice and truth without the light of the knowledge of God."

At the closing session of the Pennsylvania legislature the Educational School Code Bill was passed, placing the public schools of the State directly in politics. Every district hereafter will elect the board of education and school directors except Philadelphia, where the board of education is to be appointed by the governor instead of by the judges. The latter city is also authorized to levy the same tax that is now by law imposed for school purposes, and to issue bonds, subject to popular approval, to the limit of 2 per cent. upon the assessed valuation of property. This will in effect extend the borrowing capacity of the city from 7 to 9 per cent, the board of education taking over the charge of the outstanding indebtedness incurred for the acquisition of school property. The Philadelphia Public Ledger admits that "the absence of anything like due consideration in either branch of the Legislature has discredited the final outcome." Turbulence and uproar attended the bill in its several legislative stages.

Does co-education promote matrimonial alliances? Separate schools for boys and girls have ever been the policy of the Catholic Church. Her proverbial foresight and knowledge of the needs of men is startling, when measured by recent statistics. The London Teacher has obtained information as to the marriage rate at the University of Manchester, England. Women to the number of 560 have obtained degrees, only 64 of these have married. In this university, youths and maidens sit side by side, and almost bordering on the wonderful is the statement that only twelve of the 560 girls have wedded male graduates.

The University of Buda-Pesth was founded by Cardinal Pázmány in the seventeenth century. Some eight years ago the crucifixes in the Lehrsäle were removed and damaged by a body of anti-Christian students; they were quickly restored by the Catholics; but out of deference to the Liberals and Jews, who jeer at the Catholic students as the "Knights of the Cross," the Rector of the University (a Catholic priest) allowed them to be again removed. In consequence he was recalled by his Bishop. Every year on the anniversary of the insult, the Catholic students present a petition for the restoration of the cross, and this year the Rev. Dr. S. Szekely, the rector, promised to assist them in every way. Unfortunately, the majority of the Senate is Liberal in tendency, and both Jews and Calvinists are numerous at the University.

"State School System" is the title of a pamphlet, covering 362 pages, with an admirable index, recently published by Edward C. Elliott, professor of education in the University of Wisconsin. The book, being Bulletin No. 7, 1908, of the United States Bureau of Education, is a sequel to an earlier number (Bulletin 3, 1907) of the same Bureau. The second part is a digest of the legislation and judicial decisions relating to public education, October 1, 1906 to October 1, 1908. The first volume, second revised edition, gives the legislation and judicial decisions from October 1, 1904 to October 1, 1906, in 156 pages, in 753 numbers of legislative enactments and court decisions. The vast increase of legislative activity for education during the two subsequent years is surprising.

In the second volume before us the legislative enactments of each State of the Union are recounted under classified heads. A glance at this classification reveals at once how vast a field is covered by modern educational legislation. All these heads, arranged under capital letters, are subdivided into detailed subjects, marked by small letters. Thus the laws on education present a veritable array of orders, provisions, restrictions, above all, appropriations of public taxes which only in such condensed form will make a deep and lasting impression on the attentive reader. We expect naturally that administrative control and supervision, finance and buildings, teachers, their certificates and salaries, child labor, school attendance, school discipline and hygiene are made the subject of legislation and that different types of schools, especially trade or industrial schools, are considered by our legislatures. But it is probably a surprise to the average reader to learn that so much legislation is concerned with compulsory attendance, the education of defectives, viz., deaf mutes, the blind, the crippled and deformed, the feeble-minded, the education of dependents and delinquents. Side by side with the enactments regarding the selection of subjects to be taught, we find many laws regarding free text books, free transportation of children, physical examination and medical inspection, fire drills, university extension and public lectures, the United States flag in schools. It is observed that the supervision on the part of the State of private and endowed institutions is being extended. The public school library has met with a great amount of favor in recent legislation. The attitude of the State towards higher educational institutions is clearly one of increased liberality (p. 260).

In the enormous list of 1,617 numbers which represent legislative enactments and court decisions, hardly any subject of educational interest has been overlooked. Moral and religious training, however, is not mentioned except as a judicial case, viz., the reading in the public schools of King James' Bible, which is not considered to be a sectarian book (Kentucky, 1905 and 1908; Decisions 1174 and 1175).

Of special interest are the educational laws approved in the State of New York for Elmira, Schenectady, Albany, Watervliet and the educational provisions in the new constitutions of Michigan and Oklahoma. The attempt made in Ohio to regulate the power of conferring degrees appears to be very crude and open to much criticism and arbitrary interpretation.

The famous case of wearing a religious garb (Lima, New York) is fully given in the appendix, as also the reasonable enactments against high school fraternities.

In the bibliography of recent educational legislation (pages 16 to 19) the contributions of the Catholic Educational Association, especially educational legislation with reference to Catholic interests treated in the Milwaukee Meeting (1907) of the Association, are not forgotten. This may be taken as evidence that the vast educational work, done by the Catholic church, is making an impression on the American public and suggests the question whether the child is the ward of the state.

Mr. William Nottingham, Regent of the University of the State of New York, said last fall in an address to which we shall refer on some other occasion what may be matter for very serious consideration: "There are many indications that we are drifting toward the pernicious notion that the citizen is the ward of the state." (46th Annual Convention of the University of the State of New York, Education Department Bulletin No. 443. Albany, 1909, page 36.)

In our first number we reported the formation among the students in German Universities of societies for scientific, literary and charitable purposes. The members do not give up their efforts when leaving for their vacations. There are not less than fifty-six vacation societies for social work in connection with the Secretary for Social Student Work, who is appointed by the Catholic Volksverein. During their vacations these young men are trained for social activity by assisting in the teaching of workingmen's night schools, or by lectures to young tradesman, or by visiting social and charitable institutions.

SCIENCE

The Munich Academy of Sciences recently celebrated its one hundred and fiftieth anniversary. Prince Ludwig, the presumptive heir of the Crown was present. There is in Germany a widespread class of infidel university professors who advocate the isolation and gradual abolition of the theological faculties in the state universities. When answering to the toast of the president of the Academy, the Prince first stated that he was very little of a savant although he was an honorary member of the Academy. "The president spoke of liberty and truth"; he said, "surely, liberty is great, but liberty is to be understood in such a way that the views which others have of liberty are as much respected as one's own, and that the avenue to truth—and truth is always one, as there cannot be two kinds of truth—must be open to every one." The allusion contained in these words is obvious.

Professor Haeckel has assumed that sooner or later a connecting link between ape and man would undoubtedly be discovered, and Virchow held that the historical progenitor must be sought in the Malay Peninsula. Acting on these suppositions, Professor Dubois of Amsterdam visited the Dutch colonies in India in the year 1890 with the fixed determination of finding the pithecanthropus. Aided by a government subsidy, he began his investigations and in September found in the island of Java a skull, two teeth and a hip-bone. That the skull belongs to a member of the ape family is generally admitted; the teeth also appear to be those of an ape, while the hip-bone may be that of a man. Dubois regarded his task as finished; the "missing link" was discovered. Virchow's repeated assertions that there was no evidence to show that the bones belonged to the same animal were passed over unnoticed. With the assistance of the Royal Prussian Academy of Science in Berlin, Frau Selenka organized an expedition to proceed to India for the purpose of seeking additional remains of the pithecanthropus, and Professor Volz, of Breslau, who investigated the volcanoes of Sumatra in 1904-06, was asked to proceed to Java to determine the geological condition of the ground in which Dubois had found his fossils. What was the result? Both Professor Volz and the Selenka expedition have shown clearly that Dubois' assertion is a mere fable. Prof. Volz has come to the conclusion that man was coeval with the so-called pithecanthropus, that both existed side by side. Consequently, Dubois' much-bruited zoological proof of the animal descent of man carries no more weight than an assertion that man is descended from the ape, because men and apes are found side by side. What Professor Volz has shown by his zoological investigations has been fully confirmed by the paleontological results of the Selenka expedition. The fossilized mussels discovered were submitted to the highest living authority, Professor Martin of Leyden, for examination. He pronounced the mussels to be in no way different from those existing to-day, thus proving with absolute certainty that the stratum in which the fossils were discovered is post-tertiary, consequently, the pithecanthropus was coeval with the first man. These investigations are the death-knell of Dubois' rash hypothesis.

Rather odd, isn't it, to think of Winnipeg, the geographical centre of North America, as a seaport? And yet the thing looks as if it would soon be an accomplished fact. In order to understand its possibility we must stand away from the customary view of central Canada's capital. Chief Engineer Armstrong reports, as the result of a survey begun last October, that a few locks in the Red River between the City of Winnipeg and the lake of that name, and a few more along the rapids of Nelson River would enable vessels to steam from Liverpool or London or any European port into the docks of Manitoba's capital. There is, of course, the adverse fact that Hudson's Bay is open only four months in the year. Moreover, it used to be thought that even during those four months the navigation of Hudson's Straits was not quite safe owing to flocs, icebergs and fogs. But against this difficulty is the well-known fact that for nearly two hundred years the vessels of the Hudson's Bay Company threaded the maze of those dreaded straits without the help of steam and with very few wrecks. At any rate, the experiment is worth trying, for the Hudson's Bay route would shorten the distance from the northern half of North America to Great Britain by at least a thousand miles.

ART

The Ten American Painters.

This society has been exhibiting at the Montross Gallery twenty-two canvases of great merit. To glance at them briefly, there is Robert Reid's "Yellow Flower," which attracts immediate attention. It is very light in tone and so delicate, fragile and transparent in the making that it is aptly named. The blossom-like girl is the key in this iridescent scheme of white, pale gold and effaced green. It is to be regretted that the flower itself has been treated so slightly; the best-intentioned observer could not recognize it. One inclines to honey-suckle, but it is sheer guess-work. Same objection to the pot of green stuff by the piano in Childe Hassam's "Music Room." We admire Mr. Hassam and know his roses—but rarely his trees and shrubs. Rather pointilliste in manner, his four canvases are effective, as usual. "Neptune's Hall, Appledore," has a vibration of strong color; cliffs in glaring sunshine, rocks under the green heights, and a swimmer in the swirl of violet-green sea. Willard Metcalfe's single exhibit, "The White Veil," is a landscape seen through a snow storm, and wonderfully real. You can approach or draw back without loss, the subdued tones grow clearer or more indistinct, but the scene remains; so, too, does the sense of monotony and dreariness, the sad atmosphere of the winter's day. We must call attention to the frame with its long, oozy, decorative lines. A frame is only a frame, but it may enhance or ruin a picture. This one suggests the very idea of the painted subject. Frank W. Benson has three open air views with figures. We liked best the "Summer Afternoon," with its group of girls sitting in the grass, the sun shining hotly down upon them and the vivid blue sea in the distance. T. W. Dewing's "Yellow Tulips," is quiet and refined and very suggestive in color. Without looking at the catalogue, we had surmised that the figure in green and its accessories stood for daffodils. Edmund Tarbell's "Girl Reading" (unfinished), is in clean, cold tints, keyed to grey, with a saving warmth of note in the flesh-rendering and chestnut hair. Joseph de Camp's "The Blue Cup," is full of freshness, healthy, virile coloring and breadth. The young woman stands, life-size, against a grayish wall with suggestions of rose, a beautiful clear tone, from which the plastic form detaches itself, intensely alive and full of power. She is holding up a piece of china in her two hands against the light, and the light suffuses and kindles the roseate face. There is an overflow of vitality in the livingness and realism of this painting. Alden Weir exhibits a number of landscapes, mainly in blues and greens. "Spring" has a whitening of blossom that is very pretty. Two rather sketchy subjects, in big strokes and darkish tone, a boy's head and a still-life, are the contributions of William Chase.

The Hispanic Society in Retrospect. Sorolla and Zuloaga.

The Zuloaga exhibition is closing as we write. It has been very interesting and was in a way necessary to complete and contrast with the brilliant exhibition of Sorolla. Both painters are genuinely true to modern art and true at the same time to different aspects of Spanish tradition. Zuloaga elected to paint the shadow as Sorolla did the sun. Zuloaga found in the native art of his country the austerity, the gravity, the sobriety, one might almost say the stern gloom of his fancy. The student knows that they are there: especially among the earliest and greatest masters. But the further difference between these two modern painters is, to our mind, temperamental and hereditary. Zuloaga is a Basque, a northerner; they live in their mountains, apart, speaking an unintelligible tongue of their own, a sternly brave, fiercely proud people with an inclination to look backward upon the past history of Spain—an element of savagery in their aloofness. In Segovia, Zuloaga uses a deserted church for his studio. Sorolla lives and paints in the open air. He is a child of the vine-clad plain and the seashore. Among his people, fierceness and reserve are not unknown, but the sunshine is their habitual abode and cheerfulness and open courtesy prevail throughout their intercourse. One is constrained to say, without partiality for the happier art, that it is the healthiest and most helpful. Zuloaga has lived a good deal in Paris and knows certain aspects of the life which are not pleasant. Some of his women smile, but the smile combines with the crafty eyes to make a leer. In draughtsmanship he is very strong, and he sees with extraordinary force and vividness but also with something of the over-acute faculty of the caricaturist. This, too, he may have learned in the elder art of Spain. He is not the first to paint dwarfishness. But in his group of Gregorio the dwarf is not the only hideousness; the old peasant drawn so vigorously and the aged woman, lean and scrawny with the twisted wisps of hair, all are consistently and consummately ugly. In the "Village Bullfighters," one of the men is positively déhanché, but it is not error, it is over-accentuation of the line throwing out the hip. The "Pepillo" is exaggerated, too. One begins to think it intentional; and perhaps it is—for the whole manner is thoroughly artificial. In this he does not follow the great art of Spain. As to color, dead tones prevail. One of his best combinations is that of solid deep green background, with black and a pale green in the garments, and grey and silver for relief. In the "Paulette danseuse," faded salmon, mauve, purple and withered blossoms on the ground looking like last year's discarded millinery. And what of the drabs and fawns, browns and slates, all smoky and discolored, and the skies that always loom and where storms are ever brewing? Is it not a pictorial echo of Maeterlinck and Ibsen? Occasionally these studies in duns are attractive and one can spell out real beauties in the unfamiliar method, but taking them as a whole, they are not a little depressing. In the "Vintagers returning at Evening," Zuloaga is true to one of the grand traditions of Spanish painting. It is sober and rich, robust and powerfully handled. Why must his brush pass to the repulsiveness of the seven "Sorceresses of San Millán"? Again, in the "Lucienne Bréval as Carmen," he is full of sympathy. By exception he paints her face in light (even though it is but a reflection) and he paints her bravely in reds and blacks with a genuine smile that has come from the heart. Sometimes Ignacio Zuloaga is a great artist. One cannot know without admiration for the man the immense difficulties he has overcome, the battle his following of art has been to him. Perhaps this has made the touch of bitterness and defiance, the undertone of cynicism in his work. But in last analysis, we may not permit ourselves to remember them. Before the great art of the world we must be able to forget there was an artist and the work alone shall speak. If it can stand this test, it is art indeed and will endure.

GABRIEL FRANCIS POWERS.

In 1890 the plan was conceived to erect on Dante's tomb in Ravenna a magnificent monument, and subscription lists were opened to raise the necessary funds. The most generous contributor, and among the first, was Pope Leo XIII, who gave 10,000 lire ($2,000). But his example was not imitated. Money came in very slowly. A Dante Library was proposed instead of a monument. The organizers this time were polite enough to obtain the Pope's consent to this change. It was different when the library was solemnly dedicated on the anniversary of Dante's death. The Pope, the most liberal donor, was not even mentioned. A band of Irredentists assembled, and Nathan, the mayor of Rome, in a speech, ridiculed all that was sacred to the great poet's heart. (Stimmen a. M. L.)

SOCIOLOGY

A New Movement Among German-American Catholics.—Socialism is one of the gravest present dangers of the country. It speaks well, then, for the clear-sightedness of our German fellow-Catholics, that in the last meeting of their "Central Verein" in Cleveland they resolved to make the combating of Socialism the chief aim of their activity.

A sum of nearly $2,000 was raised on the spot for this purpose. Their society organ, the Central-Blatt was changed into a monthly with the view to keep the members of the association informed on Socialistic tendencies as well as on means to better the condition of the masses. Only the first half of the paper is destined for "the old guard," i. e., written in German; the second half in English is for the young people "who are either unable or at least unwilling to read and speak German." Evidently the leading spirits in the new movement do not mean to allow the pettiness of racial narrowness to interfere with the project.

As a further step in the fight against Socialism a successful attempt has been made to establish Catholic workingmen's societies. The Amerika of St. Louis published an invitation signed by Monsignor Goller as spiritual director and a committee of eight laymen. A result of this invitation was the foundation of a workingmen's society under the title "Arbeiterwohl," which was soon followed by others. However, St. Louis is not the first city in which the mustard seed was planted. By the active co-operation of the Buffalo Volksfreund a similar society was founded several years ago in that city, and is to-day in a very flourishing condition.

A ceremony has just taken place in Brussels that cannot fail to have its interest for American Catholics, and particularly for those caring for the social uplifting of the poorer classes. It was the award of prizes in the contest in order and cleanliness, a work organized by a committee composed of loyal and generous Catholic workers, and carried on with the help of many others. H. R. H. Princess Albert, wife of the heir-apparent to the throne of Belgium, presided over the assembly, at which were distributed eight prix d'honneur, 30 first prizes, 48 seconds, and 67 thirds.

The report published for the year 1908 shows the extent of the work of these devoted Catholics; the commission working in Brussels alone visited during the year 2,868 homes, inspected 11,237 rooms, and consulted 25,000 persons. The effects of this will be at once seen,—a general betterment in the conditions of housing effected by the poor themselves, a great amelioration of health, and, indirectly, the strengthening of the ties of family life among the poorer classes. The next meeting for a similar award will be in 1910, in Brussels during the World's Fair.

Closely related to this work is another, more general and widespread. It is the Association for the Betterment of Workmen's Dwellings. A merely superficial inspection of the alleys and impasses of any of the cities of Belgium will reveal the fact that there is still much misery prevailing. Hence, the origin of this association, which has for aim the reform of this state of affairs, and the affording of relief to the sufferers, particularly in regard to better hygienic conditions than now exist. It likewise has recently held its annual general assembly and published a report of what has been accomplished, and it is with satisfaction and pride that the Catholic reads that thousands of miseries have been succored. This particular society has a novel constitution. Though a work of charity, it is a regularly organized stock company. This was done to put it on a firm basis and to induce people to contribute, for already, in spite of a large sinking fund, and other special funds set aside for charity, it has declared a dividend of 4 per cent. Hence it is both a profitable investment and a work of mercy to the poor.

H. DEMAIRE, S.J.

"In all the churches of this and other dioceses, there are large bodies of men and women, mentally, morally and physically strong and energetic, who are seeking to do good. This is particularly noticeable in the beneficent work of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. Suppose that these men and women in the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, and other members of the congregations, not especially identified with St. Vincent de Paul's Society, should place themselves at the disposal of the pastors of the respective parishes with a view to organizing the men and women of the tenement districts into co-operative organizations for the purification of their respective blocks; for the protection of their children from the scoundrels who corrupt their daughters and mislead their sons into dishonest ways; to protect the individual woman from the drunken, brutal or lazy husband; to protect the families from the extortions of the landlords and their disinclination to comply with the laws for the sanitation of the tenements; to control the corner liquor-seller who gets so large a proportion of the husband's earnings and make him more amenable to moral suasion and local public opinion; to act as volunteer nurses where poverty, sickness or distress demand such help, etc., new conditions would arise almost immediately. In many of the congested districts, the blocks are so large that it will be perhaps difficult to get the tenants all together in one organization, but the object which the Church seeks to attain would be even more effectively accomplished, if the residents were organized in their respective tenements. Their interests are immediately under their eyes; they could supervise the character of the tenants that come in and guard against the other evils which are so destructive to the mental, moral and physical welfare of young and thoughtless boys and girls.

"Of course, this work would have to be delegated to the sympathetic men and women of superior intelligence in the respective parishes and in the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. The functions of these workers would be to supply the directing force, the initiative, the suggestion, the method of procedure and the moral 'bracing-up' of all these independent 'Block and House Organizations' when they would seem to weaken from any cause. Practically, these workers would be the lieutenants, adjutants or executives of the rector of each parish to whom they would report. As fast as a 'block' is organized the intelligent tenement men and women could be selected from that block to help organize other blocks on the endless chain principle." (Communicated.)

Mr. Eugene A. Philbin, former District Attorney of New York, has written the following letter to the Rev. William S. Hubbell, secretary of the Sabbath Society, in regard to the latter's recently expressed position on the subject of opening saloons on Sunday:

APRIL 9, 1909.

REVEREND WILLIAM S. HUBBELL,
31 Bible House, City.

MY DEAR DR. HUBBELL:

In relation to the proposed legislation allowing the saloons to be kept open during a part of the day on Sundays, I beg to say that I am opposed to such action, as from every point of view it would be a detriment and not a benefit. My understanding of the motives for such a change in the laws would cause them to be described briefly as follows:

First. To prevent grafting or blackmail on the part of the police by their levying a tax upon saloonkeepers for the privilege of violating the law. Second. To allow workingmen the opportunity to visit the saloons on Sunday. Third. To prevent violation of the law: (a) unlawful sales of liquor on Sunday; (b) the immoralities that are practised in so-called "Raines' Law" hotels.

As to the first, I do not believe that the assertions that were recently made, that the police are hopelessly addicted to the habit of grafting, are well founded; but, on the contrary, my experience with the force justifies me in believing that it would be hard to find such a large body of men so practically honest as the police of this city; even if they were not so, the proposed law would not remedy the alleged evil, as everyone who is familiar with such things knows that the most profitable period during which the law is violated is from midnight on Saturday until say five o'clock on Sunday morning.

If this is true, it would be absurd to believe that the saloonkeepers would accept the proposed privilege with the promise that they would keep closed at all other hours. This is all on the assumption that the saloonkeepers insist that the law must be adapted to their business, regardless of consideration for the community, and to that end if they are deprived of the profits they now unlawfully obtain, they must be given some equivalent. It would be rather a discouraging thought to think that such an attitude was taken by any substantial proportion of our citizens, irrespective of what their avocation might be.

As to the second ground, I have never yet during all the various agitations that have been made regarding the opening of the saloon on Sunday been able to find any evidence that the workingmen desired to have the saloons open. The great labor organizations have never expressed themselves in favor of such a change in the laws, and in fact I think that such organizations are more conservative and have a greater regard for the preservation of the laws as they now stand than other classes among whom we frequently have theorists who are so blinded by their fads as to lose all idea of the practical effect of a realization of the same.

A different question would be presented if it involved simply the question of the workingman and his family enjoying the privileges of a real holiday on Sunday. No one would have any objection to anything that would tend to that, but it is unfair to assume that the self-respecting workingman finds that the right to spend his time on Sunday away from his family in a saloon is indispensable to his enjoyment of the day.

The third ground—the prevention of violation of the law—is already partly answered by what has been said above in relation to the opening of saloons on Sunday for only part of the day. So far as the Raines' Law hotels are concerned, it seems to be rather curiously overlooked that if these places are the source of profit, the greater part of the latter must be derived through the week, and if that is so it cannot be expected that the deprivation of the sale of liquor on Sundays, which the hotels enjoy, as now constructed, would be sufficient inducement to cause them to abandon the profit made otherwise. There is another well defined principle which such contemplated legislation seriously violates and that is the proposal to change existing laws so as to prevent violations of the law. The absurdity of such a theory must be apparent even to the projectors of the innovation, if they will only give a moment's serious consideration to it. Our criminal courts now are crowded with business to an extraordinary extent, and in fact are unable to cope with the volume of business they are called upon to attend to. Adopting the same theory held by those who would reform the liquor law, would it not be better to amend the Penal Code so as to abolish some of the grounds for criminal charges, or modify the same, and thus avoid a large proportion of the violations of the law that now exist? In fact, if we were to abolish the Penal Code we should have a law-abiding community. If the same energy and efforts were directed toward a fair and reasonable enforcement of the existing laws, the evils complained of would soon disappear. The trouble, however, is that it is very much easier to procure new legislation than to enforce the existing laws.

What is needed is realization of duty and fearlessness and fairness in its performance.

Yours faithfully,

EUGENE A. PHILBIN.

Miss Georgina Pell Curtis, editor of "Some Roads to Rome," recently published by Herder of St. Louis, and the "American Catholic Who's Who," now in course of preparation, is a native of New York, though for the past ten years a resident of Chicago. Miss Curtis attended the Episcopal School of St. Mary, New York City, and after her graduation studied for five years in the Art Schools of the metropolis. In 1899 at the suggestion of the Rev. John J. Wynne, editor of AMERICA and associate editor of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," she began writing for the Catholic magazines, to which she has ever since been a contributor. Miss Curtis is a convert and a distant relative of George William Curtis, editor, so many years of the Harper Bros' publications. Material for "The American Catholic Who's Who," has been received from Americans living in England, France, Italy and the Austrian Tyrol, with whom she was in correspondence while engaged in editing "Some Roads to Rome in America." Miss Curtis has also in preparation an historical novel.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—Eight of the official family of the Archbishop of Boston have been elevated by the Holy Father to the rank of prelates of the Household. Very Rev. George J. Paterson, V.G., and Very Rev. Joseph G. Anderson, V.G., are appointed prothonotaries apostolic. The Revs. Denis J. O'Farrell, William P. McQuaid, John O'Brien, Jeremiah E. Millerick and Edward J. Moriarty are made domestic prelates, and the Rev. Michael J. Splaine, D.D., chancellor of the archdiocese, a private chamberlain. Mgr. Moriarty is at present in Rome with Archbishop O'Connell. Mgr. O'Brien is the editorial director of our ever welcome contemporary, the Sacred Heart Review, and this tribute to his work for the apostolate of the press has been splendidly deserved.

—Plans have been accepted for the new buildings at Newton of Boston College that outline fifteen structures in English Collegiate Gothic style. Work on the first of these is to begin this summer. A friend of the institution has sent it its first ornamental gift, the famous marble statue of St. Michael conquering Lucifer, which was executed in 1868 by M. le Chevalier Scipione Tadolini at the order of the late Gardner Brewer, Boston merchant and art lover. At its completion it was the sensation of all Rome. It cost $20,000.

—Just as Bishop Ludden, of Syracuse, was about to start for Rome an attack of grip forced him to relinquish the trip, and he has sent Right Rev. Mgr. J. S. M. Lynch, who sailed on April 17, to represent him at the Holy See. Before the bishop was taken ill the priests of the diocese met to bid him a formal adieu and then presented him with a purse of $12,000 and an address in which among other things they say:

"Never in the twenty-two years of your episcopacy have you called once on your priests to aid in any enterprise you may have undertaken. When there was question of a cathedral for the diocese you did not, as is customary the world over, tax the respective parishes of the diocese, but, in your own unostentatious way removed what was once considered a permanent barrier to the church's extension, and in its place built a magnificent sanctuary, thus making of an unfinished church one of the most complete and gorgeous temples to be found in the United States—all from your own private purse. And to this day no man has ever heard you refer to the expense."

—The Rt. Rev. Monsignor John P. Farrelly, spiritual director of the American College in Rome, has been appointed to the bishopric of Cleveland, Ohio, made vacant by the death of Bishop Horstman almost a year ago. Mgr. Farrelly was born at Pine Bluff, Ark., about fifty years ago. The new bishop made his studies abroad and was ordained in Rome in 1882. After his ordination he was appointed secretary to Bishop Rademacher, and Chancellor of the Diocese of Nashville. His position as spiritual director in the American College and adviser to the Congregation of the Propaganda brought him in contact with the students in Rome who afterward returned to this country to take up parochial work. The Diocese of Cleveland has 427 priests and over 300 churches, with 66 stations and 42 chapels. It has a seminary with one hundred students preparing for the priesthood, and a Catholic population of 330,000.

—On his departure for his visit ad limina, New Orleans gave Archbishop Blenk an extraordinary ovation which the Times-Democrat says editorially, "was a proper tribute . . . to a man who has not only filled with honor the high ecclesiastical position he holds, but who has interested himself as a citizen in every work that could tend to the moral upbuilding of New Orleans and its people. No one has done more in the grand work in this direction in the last few years than Archbishop Blenk."

—During part of February and the whole month of March, the German press, especially in Bavaria and the surrounding districts, was flooded with notices of the "Tremel Case." The Liberal newspapers savagely attacked the Archbishop of Bamberg, Dr. von Abert, and even the Apostolic Nuncio, who were denounced as tyrannical destroyers of freedom, violators of the constitution, etc. In point of fact, the Nuncio took no step whatsoever in the matter, and the Archbishop was not only acting within his rights but in duty bound to repress the insubordination of a priest of his diocese. The case is this. Father Tremel, a parish priest, attended, in opposition to the command of his bishop, an assembly of the Liberal party, who are bitterly hostile to the Church. When called upon by his ordinary to express regret for his conduct, Father Tremel refused and was in consequence suspended. He then announced his determination to appeal to the protection of the State against his bishop,—an action, the penalty of which is, according to Canon Law, excommunication. The Liberals hailed him as a martyr for his opinions and raised a subscription to indemnify him for any losses he might incur. The Archbishop and many priests of the diocese exhorted Father Tremel not to push matters to an open breach. The priest relented and wrote a letter to his bishop, expressing regret for his action and submitting humbly to ecclesiastical authority.

—The Church Extension Society has issued a complete record of the official proceedings of the Catholic Missionary Congress held in Chicago, November last, as well as of the addresses delivered and the papers read on that occasion (printed by J. S. Hyland & Co., of Chicago). Although, owing to the ease with which our rapid-fire living obliterates momentous incidents, the congress itself is but a memory with most of us, yet the story of its proceedings cannot fail to be of unusual interest to Catholic readers.

Called at a most opportune time, the great gathering of ecclesiastics and laymen in Chicago meeting at the call of the Church Extension Society marked the beginning of a new era in the history of the Church in North America. By Pontifical Act that Church, hitherto a missionary field under the tutelage of Propaganda, had passed out of the jurisdiction of the Sacred Congregation and taken its stand among the fully organized and equipped hierarchical unities of the world. To give fitting opportunity to study the new duties and responsibilities devolving upon us in this change, the congress convened on Nov. 15th last—the first meeting of the kind. The splendid pomp and solemnity of its ceremonies, the extraordinarily large attendance of laymen, priests and bishops from all parts of the land, the enthusiasm and earnestness which marked each day's program and the evident care with which those who spoke in its many sessions had labored to secure accuracy of statement in their important papers—all marked the sense of importance the promoters of the notable gathering attached to its assembling.

Practically every question affecting the work of the Church in the promotion of that which Pius X has made the special aim of his Pontificate—"to restore all things in Christ" (restaurare omnia in Christo)—was at least touched upon, in some or other of the sessions, and the dominant note of the entire congress was that the time had come when America's Catholics must arouse themselves to the need of strenuous, unselfish effort in co-operating, clergy and people alike, to this magnificent purpose. Plain speaking characterized the deliberations of the assembly, and in this some have found the one element which gives fair room for criticism. Not that any Catholic objects to the throwing of light into the innermost ways of the Church, or grows restive under courteous reference to weaknesses and mistakes and faults; but Junius-like scoring of our pioneers without the saving grace of a kindly appreciation of the splendid way in which they have borne the heat and burden of the day does not appeal to most of us, and this tone, we regret to say, marks a few, happily a very few, of the utterances of the Congress. The editor has included in the volume extracts from some of the sermons delivered in the churches of Chicago on the opening day of the Congress by the visiting delegates, bishops and priests. The extracts, in many cases, are so full of the spirit of apostolic enthusiasm that one regrets the lack of space which forbade reproducing the sermons in their entirety. The publisher has done his share of the work excellently, and the neatly bound and substantial volume will make an attractive addition to one's library.

—The Diocese of Münster, Westphalia, is making preparations for the eleventh centenary of the death of its first bishop and patron saint, Ludgerus, who died on March 26, in the year 809. The great feature of the celebration will be a pilgrimage from all parts of the diocese to Billerbeck, the place where the saint died. On March 26 a pontifical high Mass was sung in the chapel which marks the exact location of the room in which the saint breathed his last. But the pilgrimages and other solemnities will take place between June 20 and July 4.

—It is not too late to call attention to the appeal made by Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishops Ryan and Farley in behalf of the Negro and Indian Missions of the United States. With great sorrow they bring before the Catholics of the country the necessity of greater and more unselfish co-operation in a work of first importance to the Church in America. The collection taken up for the support of these missions during 1908 showed a notable falling off and in consequence the work of those who have the care of Negro and Indian Missions has been seriously crippled. Meantime, the Indian Mission Schools, for the present, may not be discontinued; the Bishops who have Indians in their dioceses declare that successful mission work among them is impossible without the schools. And the necessity of aggressive interest in work among our colored brethren should be apparent in a day when even the nation begins to have a suspicion that the solution of the "negro problem" rests with the Catholic Church. It is, therefore, not strange that the Most Reverend Prelates making the appeal declare "that the collection for 1909 must not produce less than the collections of former years—it must by all means be increased; and should be a notable testimony not only of the loyalty of bishop, priest and people to the call of the Sovereign Pontiff, but a proof positive of the zeal for souls which abounds in the hearts of the Catholics of America."

—Father Alexander Karl, Abbot of the famous Benedictine monastery of Melk, in upper Austria, who died recently in his eighty-fifth year, was a member of the Austrian Herrenhaus and of the Landtag of Upper Austria. His public services, for which he had received several decorations, were many and various.

—On the thirteenth of July, 1908, there took place, in Madrid, the exchange of ratifications of the Protocol agreed upon between the Holy See and Spain introducing certain modifications into the Concordat of 1851, in respect to the expenses of public worship. By one of the articles of this Protocol a mixed commission is to be named, one-half to be appointed by the Pope, and the other by the Government, but with the condition that the Archbishop of Toledo must be its President. It is said that the Government contemplates the suppression of nine dioceses, various capitular foundations and seminaries. The populations of the districts threatened have protested energetically. The loss of their episcopal sees means ruin to many districts. What the Treasury pays to the Spanish clergy is a minimum of indemnification for the spoliation perpetrated by the Liberals in 1851; while, in the Concordat of that year, the endowments of public worship and the clergy were assigned "without prejudice to the increase in them which may be made when circumstances permit" (Article 36). This increase has not come, but, on the contrary, diminutions and discounts, although at the same time the emoluments of other functionaries have been augmented. And now they are threatened with these suppressions.

—In Cologne a committee has been formed to make arrangements for the International Eucharistic Congress, which is to be celebrated in that city next summer. The occasion will no doubt be marked by one of the grandest celebrations in the history of the old city, and will afford an opportunity to display with pardonable pride the vast treasures of her relics and to impress a multitude of visitors with the magnificence of her churches. There was a peculiar charm accompanying the Eucharistic Congress in the capital of Protestant England. There will be another and still greater charm when the congress meets in a city from whose beautiful temples the Eucharistic God has never been banished.

—Three years ago the Catholic boatmen on the Rhine and its tributaries formed an association called "The St. Nicholas' Society of Seamen," which now numbers about 2500 members. Its object is to keep alive the Catholic spirit among its members and to bring about a regulation of the hours of labor and a better observance of Sunday. Another purpose of the society is to provide orphan asylums for the children of the rivermen, to have savings banks of their own and agencies where legal advice will be given to the members. Cardinal Fischer, of Cologne, is the protector of the society. Sunday observance is said to be in a better condition in Holland, where no river-boat is allowed to leave on Saturday unless it puts into some port at least once on Sunday.

—It seems strange that the question of a Catholic university should exist in Austria, a Catholic country. But there is no closing one's eyes to facts. The question does exist and is pressing for an answer. One answer has been to win back the already existing universities to their Catholic character. The other is to found a distinctly Catholic university under the guidance of the Austrian hierarchy on the plan of the Catholic University of Louvain. To further this last plan an association was founded which has just completed the first quarter-century of its existence. The president of the association, Cardinal Katschthaler, Prince Bishop of Salzburg, has taken the occasion of the completion of these twenty-five years, to write an important letter to the Catholics of Austria. His Eminence impresses upon the Austrian Catholics that there would be no difficulty in the way of the realization of the project on the part of the Austrian government. The bishops of Austria have the right under the law to found institutions of higher learning if they choose. Neither would there be difficulty from the financial standpoint. Although one cannot expect government aid for the project, yet the example of Belgium, the United States, Canada and Spain shows that this difficulty can be easily overcome by the generosity of Catholics. The failure lies in the lack of common effort on the part of the Catholics of Austria. This is due in part to national contentions, which are of influence here as in so many other fields of endeavor. Against this national feeling, so calamitous for Austria, the university would be a powerful remedy, as it would be Catholic, not national.

—Bishop Frederick Linnoborn, C.S.C., who had been placed in charge of the diocese of Dacca, Bengal, India, is the latest American contributor to the missionary force in the East. He was formerly rector of Holy Cross Hall of the University of Notre Dame. In 1898 he was appointed Procurator General of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, with residence in Rome. Bishop Hurth, whom he succeeds, and who resigned because of ill health, was formerly president of St. Joseph's College, Cincinnati, Ohio. Many of the priests now laboring on the missions in the East Indian diocese were educated at Notre Dame University and ordained specially for work in the Bengal missions.

It will be news to many that Catholic priests in Prussia receive in very many places what is called a "salary" from the State. This money is in reality a compensation for the immense amount of Church property seized upon by the State in the beginning of the last century, and it is only granted where certain other conditions obtain. These "salaries" have always been insignificant and considerably lower than those of Protestant clergymen of the same rank. A law has now been passed which provides for higher compensation. Unfortunately it will not benefit the assistant priests but only the parish priests and others of higher rank. The bishops whose advice in the matter was asked reluctantly yielded to this restriction. They resisted strongly another restriction suggested by Prussian policy in regard to Polish subjects, namely, that the three dioceses which are almost exclusively inhabited by Poles shall not derive any benefit from this law. As Cardinal Kopp protested in the Prussian House of Lords, they would have declared the whole law unsatisfactory and would have prevented its passage, had not the bishops of the three dioceses, with complete unselfishness, asked them to consent under protest, and not to permit by far the greater part of the Prussian clergy to be deprived of what is to be allowed them.

—The publication of all the articles in Borinquen, the new Porto Rican Catholic magazine, in both Spanish and English illustrates the conditions of the island to which Bishop Jones alludes in his official approbation:

"The two distinct forms of civilization, embracing peoples of diverse nations and tongues, with traditions and education very divergent, have met to be blended into a harmonious unit. Borinquen, as the exponent of Catholic principles and doctrine, will appeal with force even to those who are outside the household of the Faith or who have forsaken the priceless inheritance of their fathers."

Bourke Cockran's Chicago speech on "The Catholic Church, the Author and Defender of True Liberty," published in sonorous Spanish, should prove interesting to a people who are sometimes taught that Catholicity and democracy are incompatible.

The general report of baptisms and marriages in the diocese for 1908 is instructive. Of the 74 parishes, six sent in no statement, the remainder total 28,901 baptisms and 4,283 marriages.

The neighboring republic does not appear to enjoy the religious liberty of Porto Rico. The Archbishop of San Domingo, wishing to erect a mausoleum to his predecessor, received the following note from the government:

"Since the churches are the property of the State, the permission of Congress is necessary for the erection of a monument as well as for anything else done within its precincts not having an exclusively religious character."

The Archbishop protests that the State never had or even claimed such a right, but it is not stated whether the protest was made practical. The following extract from Bishop Jones' reply to his Grace of San Domingo is instructive.

"We are surprised to know that the State should interfere in a matter so plainly within the province of ecclesiastical authority. Only a few months ago the Spanish colony in San Juan asked our permission to deposit the remains of Juan Ponce de Leon in our cathedral with the view of erecting in time a fitting monument to the first governor of Porto Rico. The transfer was accomplished without any thought of asking our government for permission."

OBITUARY

Doctor Joseph Maria Peruter died recently in Arco, South Tyrol. He was Director of the Royal Imperial Central-Institute for Meteorology and Geodynamics, in Vienna, and Professor of Geophysics in the University of that city. Peruter was born in 1848 in Neumarkt in the South Tyrol, and after his gymnasium studies, entered the Society of Jesus, in which he remained for thirteen years. Recognizing that he had no vocation to the priesthood, he left the Society, after a bitter internal struggle, in 1877, with the full consent and approval of his superiors. He decided to study natural sciences and became one of the greatest authorities on meteorology.

His writings were numerous and distinguished for clearness and thoroughness. He had interested himself especially in the optics of the atmosphere, but his great work on this subject was unfortunately not completed. He reorganized and enlarged the meteorological institute in Vienna, adding a department for the study of earthquakes. After a lengthy struggle with the government he succeeded in having the weather reports of all the crown lands of Austria spread by telegraph over the whole country, to the decided benefit of agriculture and commerce. He had formed great plans for the foundation of a Catholic Academy of Sciences and for an international institute of Catholic scientists. In him both the Church and the scientific world in Austria have suffered a loss not easily to be repaired.

The State of California has lost a noble son in John Edmond McElroy of Oakland, who died there on March 24 of pneumonia. He was born in Oakland, where he continually resided, except the four years he spent at Santa Clara College, whence he graduated with marked honor in 1892. Immediately after he entered the Law-School in San Francisco, from which he graduated three years later, and at once began the practice of law in his native city. His great abilities, his charming address and open manner joined to unflinching fidelity to Christian principles, rendered him soon the best known and the most popular of the younger attorneys of Oakland. He was elected in 1903 to the office of City Attorney, a position which he held to the end of his life. His funeral was honored by an immense concourse of people, and the Oakland Tribune says that "it is no exaggeration to say that everybody attended the funeral," thus expressing what otherwise does not seem to be expressible.

Father Beauchene, the missionary, died recently at the Pasteur Institute, Paris, of sleeping sickness, contracted in Africa. He was walking across the Luxembourg Gardens when he suddenly collapsed and was conveyed to the Pasteur Institute. All the remedies applied proved unavailing. The Catholic Times of London declares that the number of deaths due to this disease is alarmingly on the increase. Whole villages are swept away in Uganda and the reports from the German West Africa Colony of Togo describe its ravages there as equally destructive. Leading medical men from Great Britain and Germany who have made investigations on the spot have so far been baffled.

One of the most famous and most prolific composers of Spain, Don Ruperto Chapi, died at Madrid on the 25th of March. He was born on the 27th of March, 1851, the son of a poor barber of Villena, Alicante. At the age of seven he had finished his solfeggio, and at nine he composed pieces which the town band of Villen performed. He wrote his first work for the theatre when he was seventeen: a sarzuella in one act, entitled "La Estrella del Bosque," which has not been published.

He arrived in Madrid in September, 1867, and entered the Conservatorio in the classes of Pianoforte and Harmony. His works are considerable and varied—orchestral, chamber music, pianoforte pieces, melodies for voice and pianoforte, religious music, military band music, sarzuellas, operas, and other productions. Death surprised him just when his admirers were preparing an enthusiastic tribute of homage upon the triumph of his last opera. His funeral was an imposing display of popular mourning such as Madrid has seldom witnessed.

General M. C. Butler, noted as a soldier, statesman and lawyer, died at Columbia, S. C., April 14, having received all the rites of the Catholic Church. He had been baptized by Father Fleming, of Columbia, February 26, and confirmed by Bishop Northrup on March 8, his seventy-third birthday. He will receive a more extended notice in the next issue of AMERICA.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Expressions Concerning America.

"I think your idea is good. What I purpose doing with your AMERICA is this: Every Sunday at Vespers, read from the magazine any article or articles I think may be interesting to the people. This will be instructive food for the people who cannot or will not subscribe, and will help to advertise it to those who may have an inclination to buy. Sometimes I may do it at late Mass. You know that a wise man is he who knows he has no brains of his own, but at least knows enough to use the brains God has given to others. Don't give us any milk and water with more water than milk—give us articles with solid reasonings appealing not only to the heart but to the intellect of our practical people. I am an old war horse, having living thirty-two years among people of every shade of thought.

"I hail with delight your AMERICA as I am fully aware that under your supervision one will have something worth reading."

Yours very sincerely,

(REV.) E. J. FLYNN.

Sacred Heart Rectory, Mt. Vernon, N. Y.

I am greatly rejoiced that the weekly AMERICA is to be undertaken by yourself and colleagues. I think it will do a great good, as I observe that its scope will be wide, and, as it will appear weekly it will be much fresher in its news, and I think, is bound to be more effective in its work than the best of monthly publications could ever hope to be. I trust you will have the highest success in its promotion, and I am pleased to have the opportunity of becoming a charter subscriber. . . .

Yours very sincerely,

RICHARD M. REILLY.

. . . While regretting to lose the old we are all anxious to welcome the new. Success seems inevitable. Everything is ripe for it. With best wishes,

ANDREW MAGUIRE.

. . . Allow me to congratulate you on the new magazine of which you are one of the editors. I wish you every success in the world. . . .

Very truly yours,

RICHARD H. CLARKE, JR.

49-51 Chambers Street, New York.

. . . You have my best wishes in your laudable enterprise. May your efforts meet with the material success the good cause in which you and your associates are enlisted deserves. As far the literary success no just fears are entertained, for the men at the head of the movement make such success an assured fact. I shall await in pleasurable anticipation the initial number of AMERICA.

Very respectfully,
L. CAILLOUET.

Thibodaux, La.

. . . I hope AMERICA will be a great success and a great help for Catholic information. We are anxiously awaiting its first issue.

Yours, etc.,

. . . I need hardly assure you of the interest I take in your new weekly and its success. I am looking forward with pleasure to its reception every week, as I know it will fill a want long felt by Catholics, who desire accurate information as to general news affecting their interests. . . .

Yours faithfully,
W. P. O'CONNOR.

Our "Cosmopolitanness."

. . . I desire to say I am heartily glad to learn you are about to publish a weekly along the lines you mention in your circular. In my humble opinion it will be a Godspeed for clergy and laity. Your well-known accuracy and thoroughness along with your cosmopolitanness will make your review a leader from the start. I for one thank Our Lord for having inspired the project and given you the means to carry it into execution.

Respectfully indeed,
D. LEHANE.

Until the Daily Comes.

DEAR SIR:

I have an idea that you would like to know what a Benedictine Father of Mt. Angel, Oregon, says about the Messenger. On the first page of No. 7, St. Joseph's Blatt, the Rev. Father says: "Why, in the United States fourteen million Catholics and not a single Catholic daily paper. Millions and millions are spent for new Cathedrals and can we not spare half a million to get up and sustain a daily Catholic press. Happily there is at present a light dawning from the Jesuit quarters in New York, that this most just desire of a Catholic population may in a near future be realized. The Jesuits are going to publish the Messenger weekly, and we have not the least doubt that their work will be a success, and it is our intimate desire that sooner or later this weekly will become a daily, the first English Catholic Gazette."

From yours sincerely,

JOHN POST, S.J.

De Smet, Idaho.

How America May Serve.

. . . The value of your new weekly, it seemed to me, could be brought directly home to the great lay backbone of American Catholic manhood, by telling them how AMERICA will serve them in making the important part of their fortnightly meetings both interesting and profitable Catholicly. Through your various agencies and by direct circular to the "Lecturers" and others of the K. of C. this plan could be unfolded in detail with good effect. For there would be a pretty general awakening amongst us as to the need of a practical and intelligent participation in matters Catholic, thank God! and at the same time a happy realization of the possibilities of the Social Session in this connection. . . .

Sincerely,
E. J. G.

CHRONICLE

The Tariff.—The tariff problem continues to be of all-absorbing interest. The people, apparently thoroughly aroused to the situation, are asking, "unless there be an honest, downward revision which will decrease the cost of living, why any revision at all?" And the members of Congress, Republicans and Democrats alike, are daily growing worried over the situation. The anticipated harmony of action on the part of Republican Senators seems not to be realized, the western "progressive" members of that body showing an inclination to plan another solution to the problem than that advocated by the old-line protectionists. Mr. Bailey, of Texas, the eloquent exponent of Democratic principles, took up his fight for an income tax early in the week and his opening speech was listened to by a large and brilliant audience. He began his speech by a declaration of his motive for favoring an income tax as a source of needed revenue rather than a protection tax: "If your law ended when it gave your fellow-citizens an advantage over the citizens of another country, I would be one of its most ardent supporters. But it does not end there, because its inevitable effect is to give a few of our fellow-citizens an advantage over the others of our countrymen."

The Maximum and Minimum Rate.—Chairman Aldrich of the Senate Finance Committee, has perfected a substitute for the maximum and minimum clause of the House Bill, which he is ready to submit to the full Senate and which he claims does away with certain objectionable features of the clause accepted by the House. Briefly described it provides as follows: Duties will be collected at the rates named in the Senate bill and 25 per cent. additional from countries which assess against goods from this country by rates which are unequal and unreciprocal. The established rates will continue until March 31, 1910, and thereafter unless the President by proclamation puts into effect the additional rate of 25 per cent. increase. This will be done only upon the President's receiving satisfactory evidence that a foreign country is discriminating against the United States.

The Situation in Egypt.—Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, traveler, politician and poet, throws a side light on the Egyptian situation in The Manchester Guardian, April 16. He explains that Lord Cromer's retirement from Egypt in 1907 was by no means for reasons of health; the fact being that short of the deposition of the Khedive he could not carry on his rule in Egypt. The Khedive had united with the Nationalists, and the continuance of British rule was endangered. So Lord Cromer threw up the sponge. Sir Eldon Gorst, who succeeded him, was chosen for his friendship with the Khedive, and the revolution at Constantinople in which England posed as the friend and protector of Islam, helped to diminish religious antagonism to British rule in Egypt. The Khedive, whose quarrel with Lord Cromer was a personal one, is once more reconciled to his rôle. The National party has become more purely political where before it was Pan-Islamic. By so much it has lost strength, though in the end it will profit. In the long run events in Turkey will prove unfavorable to foreign rule in Egypt.

Woman Suffrage.—The New York Sun recently instructed its correspondents in various states in which woman suffrage is exercised completely or in part to gather information regarding its actual exercise. Briefly the information sent in may be thus summarized: Full franchise rights are conceded to women in four states, Idaho, Colorado, Utah and Wyoming; partial voting privilege belongs to them in twenty-eight other states; the general testimony declares that women suffrage where conceded is helpful in conserving and promoting the best interests of the public schools; the system is pronounced a failure in Colorado; and in other states granting full suffrage opinions differ regarding its success; a moderate degree of independence appears to be exercised by women who use the privilege; Louisiana's tax-paying women have done excellent work in promoting legislation looking to the general health of the community. The investigation made by the Sun's correspondents appears to have been fair and impartial; the questions suggested in the outline of their instructions were certainly broad enough to cover the ground of thorough inquiry, and the results of their inquisition vouch for the fairly generous attention given by the correspondents to the task imposed. It appears that in Denver, and in Colorado generally, women are rather a help than a hindrance to the reign of unclean politics; it is rare indeed that woman suffrage has made the political atmosphere cleaner or purer. Rare, too, are the instances showing that better men have been nominated for office as the result of woman voting. The general opinion seems to be that women speedily tire of voting, and rich women and club-women are chiefly those who use the opportunity.

Pius X and Historical Research.—Few governments allow such an unlimited use of their archives as Leo XIII did of the treasures of the Vatican. When he died there was some apprehension lest these great privileges granted to scholars of all branches of science might be restricted by his successor. Nothing of the kind was done. Pius X even transferred a collection of important documents which were kept in the Lateran Palace to the Vatican archives last year and added to the latter also the acts of the Consistorial archives. On March 27, Ludwig von Pastor, the author of the famous "History of the Popes After the Close of the Middle Ages," had an audience with the Pope, who showed the greatest interest in the progress of the work. The Holy Father expressed his satisfaction at hearing that the fifth volume was already in print. This volume completes the first half of the entire publication. "You are still hale and hearty," said the Pope, "and there is no doubt that you will be able to finish your great task, though even this first half is monumental. By your History of the Popes you are doing an inestimable service to the Church, which can only be benefited by the fearless setting forth of the full truth. Every priest ought to have and read your work. I hope the Italian translation of the new volume will soon be ready."

The Old Catholics.—The "Old Catholics" came into existence on their refusal to accept papal infallibility as defined by the Vatican Council in 1870. They chose this name because they maintained that by this dogma the character of the whole Church had been changed, and that they were the only Catholics left who still clung to the old Faith. The soul of the opposition was Professor Döllinger of Munich, though he did not favor the establishment of a separate hierarchy. With the hearty encouragement and material support of the civil power in some states, especially Prussia, Joseph Hubert Reinkens was made their bishop for Germany. Several more bishops were appointed. But outside of Germany the Old Catholics in Switzerland, France and America are known by various titles, as will appear from the following tables. They soon dispensed with such dogmas as the Immaculate Conception, indulgences, confession, as well as infallibility.

During the first decade of their existence one might with propriety speak of the progress and increase of the Old Catholics; one can no longer do so to-day. The "Los-von-Rom" movement in Austria imparted to it an increase of vigor which was only temporary. In the year 1907 Old Catholicism embraced the following "Churches": (1) The Catholic Episcopate of the Old Catholics of Germany; (2) The Christian Catholic National Episcopate of Switzerland; (3) The Old Catholics of Austria; (4) The Church of the Old-Episcopal Clergy (in Holland); (5) The Gallic Catholic Church (in France); (6) The National Catholic Church of America. Although the conference held in Utrecht, 24 Sept., 1889, succeeded in uniting these various groups, they preserved severally their own peculiar characteristics. The Austrians are the most radical, and next to them the Swiss, who were named "the stokers" at the first Congress of Old Catholics held in Cologne in 1870. At the same Congress, the Germans were dubbed the "guards," and the Dutch "the brakesmen." The Dutch, however, were little inclined to remain "brakesmen," as in 1890 the Bishop of Deventer, in Rotterdam, allowed on the occasion of confirmation the celebration of Mass in the vernacular, and in 1903 the parish priest of Haag solemnized the marriage of his colleague of Keulenburg.

The following figures fairly represent the number of Old Catholics to-day. Germany: clergy, including bishops, 64, adherents, about 30,000; Switzerland: 55, and 35,000; Austria: 21, and 22,505; Holland: 31, and 8,573; France: 1, and 291; North America: 21, and 40,000; total, 193, and about 136,000. The great falling off in numbers may be seen by comparing these figures with those of twenty-five years ago, when Germany and Switzerland alone could boast of 130,000 adherents. The Old Catholics, in spite of their name, cut themselves off from the old tree of the Church. State protection, pride and self-will have kept some semblance of life in the branch, but it can hardly be the Church which Christ appointed to "teach all nations."

Catholic Press in Hungary.—Notwithstanding the fact that some 60 per cent. of the population of Hungary is Catholic, Catholics have, until recent years, evinced a perfectly inconceivable apathy, and Jewish organs could attack Christianity with impunity. However, the Catholic Press Association is now beginning to make its influence felt, and the daily organ of the Catholic Democratic Party, "Alkotmány," is gradually establishing itself on a firmer and broader basis. Thanks to the efforts of the Press Association, the progress made by the Catholic political paper, the "Uj Lap," has been unusually rapid; the circulation of this paper, which costs 2 heller (half a cent), was 19,000 at the end of December, 1908; in two months it had risen to 60,000 and is likely to reach 100,000 in the near future. The Hungarian newspapers, exclusive of magazines, etc., have a yearly circulation of 152,000,000, and of this huge total but 2,000,000 copies are issued from the Catholic press. The greatest obstacle to success is the indifference of so many Catholics, who have not yet realized with sufficient clearness the increasing danger arising from the muzzling of Catholicism in the press. Every year they contribute thousands of crowns for every imaginable good object, but in a matter which affects their religion more vitally than any other, they refrain from taking the necessary action.

M. Briand Shows his Hand.—When M. Briand wished Catholics to accept the Separation Law, he presented it to them as a liberal and straightforward law that guaranteed to Catholics all the funds of the Church. Many Catholics believed him, although he was an enemy. In his new book he tells his secret motive and confesses his trickery. He had secret designs which he could not reveal and hoped to bring about the spoliation of the Church with the assistance of the Catholics themselves. He is proud of his trick, and calls it strategy. His confession is a singular homage to the foresight of those who detected the snare and were not caught. The foresight and firmness of Pius X frustrated the infamous scheme of Briand and his Bloc. The law was condemned, and the odium of persecution with all its brutality has fallen upon the lawmaker.

Tenure of French Church Property.—A question entirely overlooked in the Church Separation legislation in France has of late come into a prominence quite out of proportion with its importance. Should the curés or pastors of the churches insure against loss by fire the edifices which they hold merely as "occupants?" One sees how a seemingly innocent question of detail reopens the whole difficulty of the position of the French clergy in reference to the property taken over by the State.

The curé, say many, has no property right whatever in the Church fabric, and an insurance policy, therefore, will be of advantage neither to him nor to his people. In case of loss by fire the damages paid according to policy would revert to the owner, the State or the civil community, and there would exist no obligation binding the owner to use the sum recovered in the rebuilding or restoring of the church edifice. De jure the sum may be put into the owner's coffers to be later turned to any use whatever, and de facto, in the present condition of antagonism on the part of the authorities no one will deem it likely that much thought will be given to the Church's needs. No binding contract making certain the turning over of the monies to the Church authorities can be made, since the curé's rights in the property are nil and the powers that be will surely not make legal the writing into the policy by the insurance company of conditions making specifically favorable arrangements for church or clergy.

Archbishop Amette is not thus pessimistic in judgment. Nay, his stand in favor of the opposite view led many to suspect that the Paris Archbishop was not in full accord with the Holy See in this and other points of view pertaining to the Separation laws. However, so many forceful reasons were urged in favor of the "insurance" that Rome after long consideration of the question has definitely put itself on record as agreeing with the Archbishop.

The Roman authorities say among other things that insurance in the name of the priest "occupant" appears to be required as a measure of self-protection. Precisely because of the difficulties of the French priests' tenure of Church property as "occupants" it might occur to the enemy to hold them personally responsible for all losses by fire occurring through their occupancy. And in order that the benefit accruing from the policy may certainly fall to the Church there is suggested that the curé in each case have introduced into his policy a condition nullifying the same unless the damages paid in case of loss through fire be utilized for the specific purpose of church rebuilding or restoration. By virtue of this provision, these latter argue, the civil authorities will be obliged either to carry out the terms of the contract and to rebuild the church or to relinquish all claims to the insurance.

Evidently Archbishop Amette considers his view the legally tenable one and he has consequently issued instructions to the pastors within his jurisdiction to insure in their own names the churches of which they are the "occupants." Optimistic persons naturally draw all manner of conclusions from his action, even seeing in it a possible basis for future understanding between Church and State in the vexed question of property rights. Whether their judgment be good time will tell; at all events the Archbishop's action must lead to important developments in the Church's position in France in regard to the legal tenure of Church property.

To Reform Liberia.—Three commissioners sailed from here on April 24 to investigate conditions in Liberia, the African republic, where philanthropy dreamed that some amends might be made for the evils and injustices of the old slave system of the United States. The idea of such a colony in Africa was first broached in 1774, and the American Colonization Society, which had for its object the sending there of colored persons of African descent was organized in 1811. This society sent its first colony in 1820. British commercial aggression forced the colony thus established under American auspices to declare itself an independent republic in 1848. It now consists of colored emigrants from the United States and their descendants, who make up the ruling class, and uncivilized native tribes. The record of the republic has not been free from discord and maladministration, and the present investigation is the first attempt to reform its affairs, but we are concerned here only with the connection Catholics have had with its progress and of which not many are now aware. Charles Carroll was one of the first presidents of the Colonization Society and actively aided a branch of its work inaugurated in Maryland. At the Second Provincial Council of Baltimore in 1834, the Fathers drew the attention of the Holy See to the sad spiritual condition of the Catholic negroes from Maryland who had gone to Liberia, and Propaganda asked the Bishops of New York and Philadelphia to send missionaries there. Accordingly, the Rev. John Kelly, a brother of Eugene Kelly the New York banker; the Rev. Edward Barron, afterwards bishop, and a catechist, Dennis Pindar, sailed from Baltimore on December 21, 1841, for Mesurado. The climate of Liberia is fatal to white men. Pindar died on January 1, 1844, but not before he had nursed the two priests through a severe attack of fever. Father Barron was made Vicar-Apostolic and Titular Bishop of Constantine. He went to Rome and, in 1843, returned with several priests and brothers of the Sacred Heart of Mary Congregation to take care of the mission. His strength and that of Father Kelly also became exhausted, and he resigned and both returned to the United States in 1845. Father Kelly when carried on board the ship was supposed to be dying. The voyage revived him, however, and he later became the first pastor of Jersey City, where he died in 1866. Bishop Barron died of yellow fever at Savannah, September 12, 1854. The American Catholic mission to Liberia thus failed, but it has since been continued by the Holy Ghost Fathers.

Canada.—The Paris Univers of April 13 prints a long and interesting letter from Vice-Admiral de Cuverville, Senator for Finistère, a militant and pious Catholic, on the extraordinary growth of French influence in Canada and the northern States just south of the boundary. What interests us most at this moment is his view of the commercial treaty between France and Canada, signed in Paris, September 19, 1907, but not ratified by the French Senate until the beginning of April of this year. He says: "A regrettable mistake as to the relations between Switzerland and Canada, which, contrary to what our negotiators thought, gives to the Swiss a right to be treated as the most favored nation—this mistake, I say, coupled with the reduction in duties on agricultural machines and the alarm caused by the possible admission of Canadian cattle to our markets, has led many of my colleagues to withhold their vote in favor of the agreement. As the lateness of the hour at which the debate closed prevented my taking the floor, I here summarize the motives which determined me to ratify this treaty in spite of its defects."

After a bird's eye view of the present situation in Canada, Vice-Admiral de Cuverville concludes: "After following very closely the debate which has just taken place in the Senate I hold that the fears expressed of the harm that may be done to our agriculture and manufactures by Canadian imports are exaggerated. To my mind that harm cannot be compared to the advantages presented by close commercial relations with French Canadians. It is France's interest to help on, with all its might, the development of these relations, and to prepare, by means of select emigrants, the possibility of establishing French centres in the Canadian Northwest."

Last Monday in the Ottawa House of Commons, Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, made the following statement:

"The treaty of 1907 was approved in due course by the Parliament of Canada and also by the Chamber of Deputies of France, but when it reached the French Senate there was considerable delay, owing to the strong opposition among the French Senators who claimed that the treaty was too favorable to Canada. After considerable delay and negotiations a supplementary treaty was entered into, which has been laid before this House. That, as well as the original treaty, has been approved by the French Senate, but it requires yet to be approved by the Chamber of Deputies.

"We have delayed bringing forward a resolution to confirm the supplementary treaty, because we desire to await the action of the French Chamber of Deputies. That body has adjourned for several weeks, but I anticipate that at an early date the treaty will receive its approval, and, at the same time, steps will be taken to present to this Parliament a measure for the approval of the new treaty."

On receiving the first number of our new review, an enthusiastic correspondent writes: "Movebo candelabrum tuum. While statesmen are boasting of 'putting out the lights of heaven' in the old world, the metropolis of America—soon perhaps the metropolis of the world—is seizing the torch of faith and preparing to hold it up with a firm hand, not to a few passing ships, but to a whole continent clamoring for light. What a grand work!"

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

L'Enfant and the Capital

In accordance with the Act of Congress, passed during the last session, the body of Major Pierre Charles L'Enfant has been removed from the grave in Maryland in which it had rested for years, and after lying in state in the Rotunda of the Capitol, has been reinterred in the National Cemetery at Arlington.

Curiously enough the whole section of the country in which Washington, D. C., is located, was owned in 1663 by a man named Pope, who called it Rome. Following its choice, July 16, 1790, as the site of the future city, a Catholic, Daniel Carroll, brother of Archbishop John Carroll, was one of the three commissioners named by Congress to locate its boundaries. Part of his farm was taken and on it the Capitol was built. A Catholic, Major L'Enfant, planned the city; another, James Hoban, designed and built the White House and superintended the erection of the Capitol, and then Messrs. Cornelius McDermott Roe, Patrick McDermott Roe and John Delahunty contracted on the original brick and stone work on both buildings, while John Kearney did the plastering on the Capitol, and Patrick Whalen dug the canal necessary to drain it.

When the site of the proposed Federal city was definitely fixed, Washington turned to L'Enfant, who was then residing in Philadelphia, to lay it out. He was born in France in August, 1755, and came to this country in 1777 as a volunteer with Lafayette. Appointed captain of engineers February 18, 1778, and brevet major May 2, 1783, he did valiant service during the Revolutionary War. The changes that remodeled the old City Hall, in Wall street, New York, for the meeting-place of the first Congress were made under his direction, and later he also arranged the Federal House of Assembly in Philadelphia. During the spring and summer of 1791 he brooded over the plan of the new city. On April 4 he wrote to Thomas Jefferson requesting that maps and data should be procured for him concerning London, Madrid, Paris, Amsterdam, Naples, Venice and Florence, not that he wanted to imitate their details, but that he might have a variety of ideas. "I shall endeavor to delineate in a new and original way," he said, "the plan, the contrivance of which the President has left me without any restriction whatever." When he announced his plan it was the fashion to decry it as extravagant, but it has been vindicated by time. The Capital city owes much of its beauty and the fascination of its broad streets, great squares and wide straight avenues to the energy of this far-sighted man building for the future in an age of narrow views and small conceptions.

With Washington, and Andrew Elliott as field surveyor, he went over the ground and then drew his plan.

The original is still preserved among the government archives at Washington. On it are these marginal notes:

PLAN

*of the City, intended for the Permanent Seat of the Government of the United States
Projected agreeable to the direction of the President of the United States in pursuance of an ACT of Congress passed the sixteenth day of July, MDCCXC
"establishing the Permanent Seat on the bank of the Potommac."*

By PETER CHARLES L'ENFANT.

L'Enfant had a quick temper and an overbearing disposition. When his plan was finished the commissioners demanded it from him so that it could be published. He refused to give it up on the ground that if it were published speculators would buy up the best locations and spoil the attractive vistas he had designed. For this refusal Washington dismissed him on March 1, 1792, and appointed Andrew Elliott in his place. The latter drew a plan in imitation of L'Enfant's and the work went on. The testy old Frenchman never gave up the original of his plan, and it was only after his death that the Government secured it. Thomas Jefferson wrote to Congress urging that an appropriation of $2,500 or $3,000 should be given L'Enfant for his services and the commissioners offered him 500 guineas and a building lot near the President's house, but he scorned both. He then went to Philadelphia, where he designed some buildings, but soon retired to private life. President Madison appointed him professor of engineering at the military academy at West Point, but he refused the place. In the War of 1812 he set to work to construct Fort Washington on the Potomac, but he soon quarreled with his superior officers and left the service.

He then went to live with an old friend, William Dudley Digges, of Chellum Castle, near Bladensburg, Maryland, and there spent the rest of his days. He haunted the doors of Congress with applications for recompense for his work that were never heeded. Tradition tells how his tall, thin form, clad in a faded blue military coat, with a napless bell-crowned hat, and swinging a silver-headed hickory cane, was for years a familiar object in the streets of the city he had planned. Poor and forgotten, he died at the Digges place on June 4, 1823.

Daniel Carroll, David Stuart and Thomas Johnson, the commissioners to lay out the new city and provide the government buildings, offered, on March 14, 1792, a premium for the best designs for the Capitol and the "President's Palace." For the latter the plans of James Hoban were accepted, and in them he followed the lines of the Duke of Leinster's house near Dublin. Hoban was born in 1758 at Tullamore, near Callan, County Kilkenny, Ireland, and came to Charleston, S. C., about 1782. He remained there for some time practising his profession of architect, and designed the State House at Columbia, in 1786. This building was burned by Sherman's army in February, 1865. When the public notice was issued calling for plans for the new Federal city, Hoban left South Carolina and, through his friend, Colonel Laurens, was introduced by Washington to the commissioners. His plan for the President's house was accepted at once, but he did not compete for the Capitol, in the construction of which, according to the plans of Dr. William Thornton, a native of the Island of Tortola, West Indies, however, he was made superintendent, on September 23, 1793, at a salary of 300 guineas a year.

"This morning we went with Mr. Hoban to the site of the Palace, that he might lay out the foundations," wrote the commissioners to Washington, July 19, 1792, "the plan being much less than Major L'Enfant's design, will not fill up the diverging points marked by the stakes."

Washington in his answer says: "I think you have engaged Mr. Hoban upon advantageous terms, and hope if his industry and honesty are of a piece with his specimens he has given of his abilities, he will prove a useful man and a considerable acquisition." Hoban, according to the direction of the commissioners, September 23, 1793, took "on himself the general superintendency of the Capitol and that the work thereof be conducted agreeable to the orders and directions which may be given from time to time."

During his residence of forty years at Washington he was almost continuously employed in superintending work for the government. In January, 1799, he was married to Susannah Sewell, by whom he had ten children. He was captain of the Washington artillery, and when the city was incorporated in 1802 he was elected a member of the City Council, an office he held until his death, which took place December 8, 1831. He was buried in St. Patrick's churchyard, of which parish he was one of the founders and generous supporters. A local historian describes him as "a quick tempered though generous man, and his professional life at the capital was stormy despite his success. He took a large view of his own authority, had a high regard for his own opinion, and, despite official poverty and parsimony, obtained emoluments fitted to his standing as an architect and the dignity of the work entrusted to his supervision. His designs and proportions for the executive mansion were deemed too princely for a young republic by President Washington, but in the end the architect prevailed over the statesman." In May, 1863, the remains of James Hoban and others of his family were removed from St. Patrick's churchyard and reinterred in Mount Olivet Cemetery, Washington.

Of his children, his son James, who died January 19, 1846, was an eloquent lawyer and served as a United States Attorney. This son married Margaret Neale and had four children—one of them, Henry, became a Jesuit.

Daniel Carroll owned a large patrimonial estate called

Carrollsbury, which included the present Capitol Hill. His house, Duddington Manor, was the first residence built after the city was laid out. When he wanted to build it in the middle of New Jersey avenue near the Capitol grounds, L'Enfant protested that this would close the avenue and destroy the symmetry of the city; but Carroll paid no attention to this objection and went on with the building.

L'Enfant then tore down the walls. Carroll complained to Washington, who ordered that the house should be rebuilt, but the site was changed to North Carolina avenue. In its early days it was the scene of profuse hospitality and social splendor. Carroll's land, however, failed to appreciate in value as he expected, the building of the city turning to the westward. When he died in 1849 he was poor and a bankrupt.

Church Organization in Turkey

The late Sultan startled the world by giving to his subjects a representative constitution. Will this important change of policy bring about any amelioration in the condition of the Christians in his empire? We do not know. It might be interesting, however, to learn from a well informed missionary what position the Christians hold at present in the Sultan's dominions.

Turkey is the home of a multiplicity of Christian Churches and Rites—Greeks, Armenians, Maronites, all are found within its confines. Some of these are rent by internal schisms. Many are, as Uniats, united with the Catholic Church. Each of these churches, as far as it is recognized by the Turkish government, forms a body politic by itself; each is, as it were, a state within a state. Politically outcasts, they are almost entirely free in the management of their interior affairs. The system has great advantages but is also fraught with dangers, which result from the preponderance of lay influence. A church that allows free scope to lay activity and lay enterprise, but under the guidance and control of the successors of the Apostles, will always flourish. Active Christian life will wane and disappear in proportion as this relation is hampered, though perhaps a semblance of Christianity remains.

At the head of each of the several Christian bodies stands the patriarch, whose authority is supreme in matters both spiritual and temporal. The bishops are his representatives in the provinces, the parish priests in the cities and villages. These have judicial power in all lawsuits of Christian against Christian. Until very recently they were also the tax collectors for the Sultan's government. At present they gather the church taxes for the patriarch only. The community in each particular place or city elects three representative bodies for local government. The first is the Council of the Ancients, the members of which are elected for two years. Roughly speaking, they perform the functions of our city representatives. The second is the School-Ephory. It has the administration of the school funds, appoints the inspectors and teachers and pays their salaries. The schools, as a rule, have sufficient funds; instruction is free and the poor children even receive books and stationery. There is, finally, the Church-Ephory, somewhat like our board of trustees. Its charge is the maintenance of the church building and the Divine service, and the distribution of alms among the poor. The Church-Ephories are presided over by the parish priests. Among the schismatics, unfortunately, the parish priests are seldom well educated. Hence it is that they wield very little influence in the Church-Ephory. In spiritual matters they content themselves with saying Mass and singing the liturgical prayers. They busy themselves very little about the instruction of the children, and if preaching takes place at all, it is done by laymen.

In the civil life of the community the parish priest's position is not unimportant. It is considered his special duty to protect his flock, the individual as well as the whole, against the aggressiveness of the Turkish officials. For the good of his people, it is necessary that he should possess, not only knowledge and piety, but influence and diplomacy in dealing with the government. These avaricious Oriental pastors have many sources of revenue and are well paid. The same charge is constantly being made against all the members of the three representative bodies. Fraud and graft are of daily occurrence and are the usual causes of the endless dissensions within Oriental municipalities. The National Assembly, presided over by the bishop, is convoked to decide matters of extraordinary importance, every man who is of age having the right to vote; members of the Ephories are elected, accounts of the officials examined, measures taken against common dangers, etc.

Not infrequently factions are formed, the outvoted minority setting up a party of its own, the usual consequence of the interference of lay power in spiritual matters. The Uniat priest, by reason of his greater scientific and religious training and the affection felt for him by his people, has usually practical control of the school, and is often as wise an adviser in temporal matters as in spiritual. The wealth and happier condition of the Catholic communities are frequently attributed to his ability, and rouse the envy of the schismatics. The many wranglings in the schismatic communities, more especially the avarice and overreaching policy of the clergy, have caused the transition of entire villages to the Catholic Church. A considerable number of Orientals, now Catholics, have been won in this way. The City of Peramos would now be entirely Catholic had not the Turkish authorities, prompted by the Greek schismatics, refused to acknowledge the new Catholic community.

These details apply to all Christian bodies alike, but thanks to the better training of the Uniat clergy, the objectionable features of the system are to a large extent offset by the esteem that is accorded the priests.

The Real Luther*

I.

Every observant reader of history must be aware that no period has undergone more noticeable readjustment and a more marked change of perspective, nor has any historical character been the subject of a more radical reappraisal, than the German Reformation and its concrete embodiment, Luther. To "study the Reformation is to study Luther," is an old axiom of history laid down by Professor Baumgarten many years ago, and by its universal adoption fully admitted. No student can any longer avail himself of the legendary texture, which of old clothed the Reformer's personality and interpreted the guiding principles of his conduct in the light of the historical deposit handed down by early historians in both the Catholic and the Protestant camps. He might as well endeavor to relieve his physical ailments by availing himself of the skill of an old-time surgeon, or satisfy his astronomical doubts by having recourse to the pseudo-science of the astrologist. A great deal of this change must be ascribed to the inborn objectivity of Protestant historians, who have made the German nationality not only synonymous with broad scholarship, minute research, plodding patience, but also with audacious independence and inflexible, even if pedantic, obstinacy.

Without in the least disparaging these praiseworthy efforts, at times involving no little mortification, it will be admitted, that the main impetus, the impellent initiative, was given, however, by two Catholic historians, in two epoch-making works, which bid fair to attain the dignity and authority of historical classics. We refer to Döllinger's "Die Reformation" and Janssen's "Geschichte des deutschen Volkes." True, before these there had been desultory efforts to unravel the vexed Reformation period, usually revealing themselves in an ocean of passionate declamation, stacks of inflammatory pamphlets and a deafening din of pulpit thunder. But the results were only a deepening of the prevailing confusion, mere picket line skirmishes and a needless expenditure of lung power.

The first notable upheaval caused by Döllinger's work in 1846 needs no further comment than that the work is still indispensable in every historical collection. The unwearied research, penetrative vision and passionless arraignment of the Reformation, made the three volumes a masterpiece that still remains unanswered. In the spring of 1879 Janssen gave us the second volume of his great history dealing with the German Reformation period. It struck the German reading and thinking public with staggering amazement. Patient in research, cautious in inference, guarded in statement, with a matchless architectonic skill, he laid prostrate the whole squadron of myth and legend, fable and fiction, which for years had bolstered up Luther as a religious reformer. For the first time, with incomparable scientific deftness and delicacy, but remorseless analysis, the man Luther is taken from the twilight of the gods, from the incense-laden altar of hero worship, and is brought to the tribunal of calm, critical, inflexible historical scrutiny. How Luther fared is but too well known. A glance at the first edition (1883) of Köstlin's authoritative "Life of Luther," and the fifth edition, published by Kawerau after the author's death in 1903, conveys a volume of thoughtful reflection.

Need we wonder that the modest but dauntless historian was fairly smothered in a deluge of pamphlets replying to what a leading critical review calls his "crushing examination of the Luther myth?" Need we wonder that the Protestant historiographers of Germany banded together in a Verein für Reformationsgeschichte, whose object was, to draw again on the review quoted above, "a society for the suppression of Janssen and the perpetuation of the Luther myth?" Need we be surprised that Professor Waitz, Protestant historian and publicist, in view of the author's stupendous accomplishments, declared in print that "Janssen is the first of living German historians"? This, be it remembered, in the lifetime of Leopold von Ranke.

But both these upheavals dwindle into comparative unimportance when we recall the consternation, not to say polemical hysteria, created by the publication of Denifle's "Luther und Lutherthum" in 1904, followed in quick succession by a second edition. Hitherto controversy raged about the personality and the work of the Reformer. Now it was to probe deeper, to the very core of his inner life. Was Luther trustworthy in his autobiographic and doctrinal utterances? Was he qualified by an accurate knowledge of Scholasticism and unbiased equipoise of judgment to quote the ecclesiastical authorities with the apodictic cocksureness he invariably assumes? Does he even show a bowing acquaintance with truth and fairness, when he, in speech or writing, represents the theological thought or historical data of the Church he was endeavoring to destroy? Denifle has the hardihood to stand forth and give a defiant "No." And he will prove it, and, judging from the panic created, he seems to be doing so.

It was while scouring the libraries at Munich, Leipzig, Eichstätt, Bamberg, Salzburg, Vienna, Innsbruck, Florence, Monte Cassino, Assisi, Venice, Padua, Oxford, Cambridge, above all the Bibliotheca Palatina in the Vatican, with a view to securing material for a contemplated work on the decline of the secular and regular clergy in the Middle Ages, that the conclusion forced itself on him, that precisely this material would be most effective in bringing Luther and Lutheranism to the bar of modern critico-historical writers. Shakespeare and Blessed Jeanne D'Arc

It must be a matter of keen regret at the present time to all men of English speech that the name of the world's greatest dramatist should be associated with a most degrading presentment of the character of the world's most famous heroine. We say the name of the world's greatest dramatist, because for more than a century past it has been recognized that the Shakespearian authorship of the first part of "King Henry VI" is a matter of great uncertainty. At the present time, despite the opinion of a few individual critics like Charles Knight and Dr. H. N. Hudson, it is plain that almost all scholars incline strongly to the conclusion that Shakespeare's personal share in the composition of this play was an exceedingly slender one. Thus Mr. Israel Gollancz, one of the most capable of modern authorities, says: "The opening lines in the play are sufficient to render it well-nigh certain that the 'I Henry VI' is not wholly Shakespeare's, and there can be little doubt that the hand of the great master is only occasionally perceptible therein . . . we may be sure that at no time in his career could he have been guilty of the crude and vulgar presentment of Joan of Arc in the latter part of the play."*

Similarly, Professor A. W. Ward, the editor of the most important work on English literature which has appeared in modern times—I refer to the Cambridge "History of English Literature"—holds equally decided opinions. "But even," he says, "as a mere adaptation, 'I Henry VI' exhibits divergences too extraordinary from Shakespeare's usual method of treating a historical subject and too marked a want of discretion and sobriety in the free introduction of all manner of idle tales—above all in the revolting rapidity of the development of the Pucelle story—to allow of its being accepted as Shakespeare's."† But whoever the author of the play may have been, the character of the Maid is detestable, and one is glad to be able to add that as an acting drama it has found so little sympathy among the patrons of the stage, that from the time of Shakespeare's death, or at any rate from 1642, down to the close of the nineteenth century, it is only known to have been performed on a single occasion.* Even then it remains somewhat uncertain whether the drama represented was the Shakespearian "I King Henry VI" or Crowne's perversion of that play. In our own time it has been acted in England on two occasions only, both of these at Stratford-on-Avon, first in 1899, and then again in 1906. In the latter case the whole trilogy of "Henry VI" was gone through on successive nights.

*Gollancz in the "Larger Temple Shakespeare," Vol. XI, 1899, "Henry VI," part 1, preface.

†A. W. Ward. "History of Dramatic Literature," London, Vol. II, p. 73. This opinion Mr. Ward has reiterated in his introduction to "Henry VI" in the University Press "Shakespeare."

*This was at Covent Garden Theatre in 1738. See Genest, "History of the Stage," Vol. III, p. 556.

As the first part of "King Henry VI" is almost as little read as acted, it may perhaps be advisable before going further to recall the part which is therein assigned to "Joan la Pucelle, commonly called Joan of Arc." In the first act, during the Dauphin's sore need, while the siege of Orleans is being resolutely pushed on by the English, Jeanne is introduced to him as "A holy maid which by a vision sent to her from heaven

Ordained, is to raise this tedious siege
And drive the English out the bounds of France."

Charles the Dauphin, after testing the Pucelle and being worsted by her in a fencing bout, falls under the spell of her beauty and address. She is made a leader of the French army and wins a great victory. In Act III, in violent contradiction to the facts of history, she, by her eloquent pleading of the needs of France, succeeds in inducing the Duke of Burgundy to forsake his alliance with the English. All through the earlier part of the play, the Pucelle, though taunted by her opponents as morally depraved, and in league with the fiends of hell, does not clearly reveal herself. The spectator might still believe her innocent and even divinely inspired. It is only the fifth act that crudely and violently tears the mask away and shows us Joan vainly invoking the diabolical agencies that have so far favored her designs. Upon a reverse of the French arms, she summons the fiends, who come at her call; whereupon she says:

"This speedy and quick appearance argues proof
Of your accustomed diligence to me.
Now ye familiar spirits, that are culled
Out of the powerful regions under earth
Help me this once that France may get the field.

* * * * *

[They hang their heads.

No hope to have redress? my body shall Pay recompense, if you will grant my suit.

[They shake their heads.

Cannot my body nor blood-sacrifice
Entreat you to your wonted furtherance?
Then take my soul, my body, soul and all
Before that England give the French the foil."

After this Joan is taken prisoner in a single-handed encounter with the Duke of York, who taunts her with being the mistress of Charles the Dauphin. Finally, the lowest depth of all, when a shepherd comes to visit her in captivity and claims her as his daughter, she denies and mocks him.

"York. Bring forth that sorceress condemned to burn.
Enter La Pucelle, guarded, and a Shepherd."

Shepherd. Ah, Joan! this kills thy father's heart outright.

Have I sought every country far and near,
And now, it is my chance to find thee out,
Must I behold thy timeless cruel death?
Ah Joan! sweet daughter Joan! I'll die with thee.

Pucelle. Decrepit miser! base ignoble wretch!
I am descended of a gentler blood;
Thou art no father nor no friend of mine."

What follows is in some sense even more base. The father thrice repulsed ends by cursing his daughter.

"Dost thou deny thy father, cursed drab?
O, burn her, burn her! hanging is too good."

Then Joan, when the order is given to carry her off to execution, first attempts to daunt her captors by pleading high lineage, a heavenly mission and unspotted purity, concluding her speech with the bold threat:

"Joan of Arc hath been
A virgin from her tender infancy
Chaste and immaculate in very thought,
Whose maiden blood, thus rigorously effused
Will cry for vengeance at the gate of heaven."

But when this fails the Pucelle hesitates not to put forward the wildest, vilest of all pretexts for a respite:

"I am with child, ye bloody homicides,
Murder not then the fruit within my womb
Although ye hale me to a violent death."

Though we have the gravest reason for doubting whether the creator of "Hamlet" and "King Lear" had himself any hand in this abominable calumny, it will be convenient to speak as if the play were really Shakespeare's. And first I may venture to say that atrocious as this libel must appear, it would have been almost impossible for Shakespeare, writing in London in 1591 or thereabouts, to conceive of the character of Joan of Arc with anything like justice. At that date there was practically no book in the English language which was content to narrate the facts of the Maid's career without gross distortion and abuse. Her English contemporaries, strange to say, tell us practically nothing about her. Neither would it be reasonable to expect that a dramatist before composing his play should give himself to historical research and should hunt up manuscript State papers. Even so, if we may judge from the two or three surviving specimens of official documents emanating from the English commanders—for example, the justification of Jeanne's execution despatched to foreign princes in the name of Henry VI, and the letter on the reverses of the English army in France sent to Henry VI by Bedford in 1433—calumny and prejudice reigned supreme in all that had to do with the Maid. The former missive speaks of her "pestilent errors," her "falsehood, subtleties and unnatural cruelties," and describes her as a "superstitious sorceress and a diabolical blasphemer of God"; in the latter despatch Bedford refers to Jeanne as "a disciple and limb of the fiend, called the Pucelle, that used false enchantments and sorcery." But for the ordinary playwright, the examination of the first hand sources of history was, of course, out of the question. He had almost of necessity to depend upon the account of past events current in the chronicles most read and most esteemed amongst his own contemporaries. Shakespeare had Holinshed, the second and amplified edition of which appeared in 1587, and Hall (1547), but these he could only have controlled by such meagre illumination as was obtainable from the more Catholicly minded annalists of pre-Reformation days, Caxton, Fabyan, Rastell, and if we may stretch a point, Polydore Vergil. How little these were likely to contribute towards a juster view of the Maid may be estimated by the fact that honest William Caxton, the father of English typography, who set up his press within the precincts of the great Abbey of Westminster, is the earliest known authority for the atrocious incident which adds a final crown of shame to the calumnies of the Elizabethan play. Matthew Calbraith Butler

The passing away of Matthew Calbraith Butler, soldier, senator, patriot, attracted slight notice north of the Dixie line. Though for four decades the leader of South Carolina in war and peace, he had never been wont to pose before the populace or cater to the passions of the hour; he was not in sympathy with the tone and tactics of her late leaders, and for some years had withdrawn from public life; but he left behind him a record of character, ability and achievement that should be a prized possession of state and nation when the present-day idols are forgotten.

A major-general of the Confederacy and of the Union, he helped to heal the wounds and bridge the chasms of war. A binding link between the Old South and the New, he allowed no bitter memories to rankle, devoting his energies to developing the resources of his people and shaping their activities to new requirements. While adapting himself to the conditions of the New South, he retained the best traditions of the Old.

His own family traditions are the most glorious in American history. His ancestors for four generations have been navy and army officers, generals, judges, governors, senators and legislators. He was named after his uncle, Commodore M. C. Perry, who opened the Japanese ports to the world and whose father and brother were both distinguished captains of the navy. His Butler ancestry gave generals to every war of the Union. His first American progenitor, Capt. James Butler, who came from Ireland in 1745, belonged to the Ormond Butlers of Tipperary, a family distinguished in Church and State for seven centuries and well represented to-day by Gen. Sir William Butler, C.B. and Very Rev. T. W. Butler, S.J. Capt. Butler died fighting for American independence, but he left four sons to continue the fight, Generals Pierce, Richard, James and William Butler. Of them Lafayette said: "If I want a thing well done I order a Butler to do it." Pierce's son, Gen. William Butler, fought at New Orleans, served several terms in Congress, became Major-General and for a time Commander-in-chief in the Mexican war, and in 1861 attended the Peace Congress to save the Union, to which he always remained faithful.

But his young grandson, Matthew Calbraith Butler, was not bound to the Union by ties of service. A graduate of the University of South Carolina, he practised law with his uncle, Senator Butler, and at twenty-three was elected to the State legislature, while his father, Dr. William Butler, represented his district in Congress. When the Civil War broke out young Butler was elected captain of the Edgefield Hussars in Hampton's Brigade. His gallantry and military judgment secured him advancement, and at twenty-eight he was a major-general. A daring cavalry leader, he was always a Christian gentleman. He would take the sick soldiers to his quarters and personally attend to their wants. The cannon-ball that carried off his leg at Brandy Station, mortally wounded Capt. Farley who was riding near him. Officers ran to Butler's aid, but he said: "Go at once to Farley, he needs you more than I." Farley was also of heroic mould. "Gentlemen," he said, "I shall be dead in an hour. Good-by. Go at once to Butler." As soon as his wound permitted, Gen. Butler was back in the saddle and served to the end of the war.

The citizens of Pennsylvania bore witness to his humanity and honor during Lee's invasion, and on his election to the United States Senate, in 1876, wrote him many congratulatory letters. To one of these he replied: "I am glad that you remember the pleasant side of the martial picture. Why should we not all do so, and forget the passions, heart burnings and wounds of our fearful strife? The country, north and south, requires a more natural, kindly feeling . . . If you come to South Carolina I shall be happy to have you make a raid on Edgefield and make me prisoner in my own house. Then we shall be even."

Returning penniless from the war he took up the practice of his profession and soon became the first lawyer of South Carolina, "brilliant, logical, eloquent, learned and conclusive." He devoted his talents chiefly to saving his people from reconstruction spoilsmen; and when with the aid of Gen. Wade Hampton he had ousted them from the state, he was able to declare in the United States Senate: "My only weapon was a law-book."

In fighting the battle of the whites he felt he was serving the best interests of the negroes for whom he had always the kindest feelings. Replying to Senator Frye, he said: "The South is 'solid' for good and honest government, and there is not a man among us, who is a man, that feels enmity towards the colored people. The Senator has pathetically said that they stayed at home while we were at the front, and protected our wives and children. So they did; and may my right arm be paralyzed if I have cherished a sentiment of hostility against those kind-hearted people who guarded all that were dear to me! . . . I wish I could take the Senator from Maine and all these Senators to my home and farm, and let them ask the one hundred and thirty-six colored people there if I ever did them wrong."

Senator Butler was judged by some the most eloquent, by all the most striking and handsome figure in the Senate. While he defended the interests of his state with force and dignity, his honorable character and personal magnetism won respect and friendship from all parties. His sense of honor was not Quixotic or un-Christian. His denunciation of duelling as "border ruffianism," and his contemptuous rejection of a challenge, put an end to the practice in the South.

Retiring from the Senate, 1891, after eighteen years' service, he practised law in Washington, D. C., and on the declaration of war with Spain offered his services to the nation. President McKinley appointed him major-general, the rank he had held in the Confederacy, and later named him Commissioner to Cuba to arrange the terms of peace. He was not much impressed by the Cuban soldiers, but conceived a great admiration for the Spaniards. "They were gentlemen," he told the writer later, "and their treatment of the South-American native was in marked contrast to ours. We exterminated the Indian or permitted him to perish; they preserved, Christianized and civilized him. I can only attribute the difference to one element: the spiritual influence of the Catholic Church."

Always a religious man, he was, as Gladstone says of O'Connell, "interested like all strong minds in theological discussion," and it was no surprise to his friends when the news went out that he had become a Catholic. In 1904 Gen. Butler requested his friend, the late James R. Randall, to introduce him to the Jesuit Fathers in Augusta, Ga., and he then announced his intention of entering the Church. But, as there was no resident priest at his home in Edgefield, S.C., it was not till inflammation of his old wounds necessitated his entering the Columbia Hospital last February that an opportunity presented itself. He sent at once for a Catholic priest and Rev. B. H. Fleming promptly responded, attending him assiduously during the seven weeks that remained. Father Fleming has kindly furnished an interesting account of his last days, the fitting ending of a noble life.

"I baptized Gen. Butler, February 26, 1909, his seventy-third birthday," he says. "He was confirmed by Bishop Northrop of Charleston, S. C., March 8th, Col. U. R. Brooks, his aide-de-camp in the war, being sponsor at both ceremonies. In the course of instructions I asked the General what influence had led him to change his faith in his last years. He answered: 'I have been studying the Catholic Church and her doctrines for eighteen years; I have watched her closer than you think. I have been witness to her great work in the betterment of the world, but what made the greatest impression on me, among her many good works, was the Little Sisters of the Poor. I had occasion to visit their Home in Washington, D. C., on a Committee from the Senate concerning an appropriation they had asked from the District of Columbia of $20,000 for a new building. I was shown everything from cellar to roof, and I was amazed. I saw clean linens on bed and table, food prepared by loving hands, an air of peace and happiness on the faces of the Sisters and the helpless, homeless inmates. 'How do you manage to feed all these people?'

I asked the Mother. 'God feeds them, Senator,' she said. 'We beg every mouthful we eat here. Every day our wagon calls at markets, hotels, restaurants and private houses, and asks for the crumbs. Into our baskets fall the offerings that seem as tears of repentance from sinners. Jew and Gentile, Protestant ministers, Catholic priests, drunken men, newsboys—all give at times their tribute to the poor.'

'I inquired about the food of the Sisters and found that it was just the same as the inmates.' 'Good-by, Mother,' I said; 'you'll get your money.' I got them the $20,000 and regretted it was not $40,000. From that moment I made up my mind to study the teachings and history of the Catholic Church, so here I am. I believe all the Church believes; you may make the preliminaries short.'

"After he had been baptized and confirmed, he turned to Col. U. R. Brooks, his old scout and camp-fire friend. 'Ulick,' he said, 'for the first time in my life I am not afraid to die.' He passed away April 14th, clasping the Crucifix, the symbol of redemption."

Chinese Students in Japan

Ten years ago there were only two Chinese students in Japan: four years later there were 500: two years ago there were 15,000 in Tokio alone, and to-day there are not 5,000 in the whole Japanese Empire. How are we to account for this migration and exodus? It seems clear that China was at one time convinced that Japan had a secret of advancement which China ought to discover. But the absorbing attraction which American and European methods and ideals of education have lately had for the Chinese mind has left the leaders of Chinese thought less confident than formerly as to the advisability of attempting to become "modern" by the aid of Japan.

This Chinese reaction against Japanese education finds an echo in certain movements now going on in the educational institutions of the Chinese Empire. Among these the recent extensive dismissal of Japanese teachers from Chinese schools must be regarded as significant. The same principle is being carried out in the naval and military colleges of China. The example of Germany in offering teachers without charge to Chinese schools for the purpose of increasing her prestige in that country has impressed the Japanese mind as significant; and while Japan feels that she is not financially able to compete with this charity, she is not quite sure whether she can afford not to be represented by some worthy institution of learning in Pekin. It is coming to be pretty well understood in Japan, as in the more intelligent centres of Europe and America, that the Chinese are a people much more impressed and influenced by proficiency in the arts of peace and progress than by any prowess of war or diplomacy.

AMERICA ought to have strong support from both priests and laymen. I cordially recommend it to all readers in my diocese.

CORRESPONDENCE

Some Anglican Difficulties

LONDON, APRIL 17, 1909.

Canon Hensley Henson, the Anglican rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and a Canon of the Abbey, has gone to America to fulfil engagements at Yale and elsewhere. I note this because he has just been the hero of an incident which may have very important consequences in the Church of England. Canon Hensley Henson seemed at one time in his career to be drawing near the Catholic Church, but he stopped, and then, as often happens, there came a reaction towards a Protestantism of the Broad Church type. He has shown a stronger and stronger feeling against the "sacerdotalism" and High Church views of the Ritualist party, and he is an advocate of close co-operation, if not union, between the Church of England and the Dissenters. A fortnight ago he was invited to deliver an address or a sermon at a Nonconformist Institution in Birmingham. The Anglican rector of the parish protested, and appealed to the Anglican Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Gore, who forbade Canon Henson to preach. The Canon disregarded the prohibition and wrote to Dr. Gore telling him that he meant no personal disrespect, but had acted on principle, as the "law of the Church" which he violated belonged to the period when there was no toleration for Dissenters. The Bishop wrote in reply that he would have to take further legal action, but agreed to defer it till after the Canon's return from America. The correspondence between Bishop and Canon is rather curious. One suspects that the Bishop's hand has been forced by the incumbent of the parish into which Canon Henson intruded, for Dr. Gore writes that the whole thing is "a bore."

The Canon seems to revel in provoking a crisis. He is an effective speaker and writer, and he loses no opportunity of pressing on the attention of his Ritualist colleagues of the Establishment the essential Protestantism of the Church of England and the clear break with the past at the Reformation, as he did, for instance, in the speech at the last Church Congress where he pointed out that "revival was not the same thing as continuity." As a consequence of this attitude there he leans towards union with other Protestant sects who disclaim episcopal orders and the whole pseudo-Catholic system of the Anglicans; and the importance of Canon Hensley Henson raising the question in a practical form at Birmingham arises from the fact that there is a growing movement in the same direction in the English Established Church. Canon Beeching has been preaching a Lenten sermon in Exeter Cathedral, and telling his audience that the time has come to consider whether "exaggerated theories" of the episcopate are not an obstacle to union with other Protestant bodies. It is not long since Dr. Percival, the state Bishop of Hereford, from his cathedral pulpit declared that the Church of England had "no sacerdotal system," and protested against the attempt to introduce into it "the erroneous and misleading doctrine of a sacrificing priesthood." Another Bishop of the Establishment, Dr. Diggle of Carlisle, has been declaring that the ministers of the Anglican Church are primarily "preachers of the Word," and pointing out that while in Pre-Reformation times in England a chalice and paten were placed in the hands of the ordained, the Church of England gives her newly ordained minister not a sacrificial vessel, but a copy of the Bible. Those who hold such views are inclined to see in a more or less close co-operation with the Nonconformists a means of strengthening their assertion of the Protestant character of the Establishment. The Birmingham incident has already produced a result in this direction. To-day, Sir George Kekewich, Liberal M.P. for Exeter, and a "Churchman of moderate views," introduces a Bill in the House of Commons "to amend the ecclesiastical law with respect to inter-communion between the Church of England and other Christian Churches." It is a short Bill and proposes to enact—

"That it shall be lawful for any clergyman in holy orders of the Church of England (not suspended or deprived by order of an ecclesiastical court) to preach or minister in any chapel of any other Christian denomination, or in any building, with the assent of the minister, or owners or trustees thereof, as the case may be; and for any minister of any other Christian denomination to preach or minister in any cathedral or collegiate or parish church or chapel of the Church of England, with the assent of the dean, incumbent, or clergyman, or other person in charge thereof, as the case may be."

The Bill does more than authorize an "exchange of pulpits." It would legalize the administration of the "Lord's Supper" by a clergyman of the Church of England in a Wesleyan chapel. Sir George explained last evening to an interviewer that it would even extend its privileges "to Roman Catholics," who, however, are only interested in it as outsiders. What we Catholics feel is a hope that the incident will open the eyes of some men of good will in the Anglican Church to the realities of their position. For this trafficking with the Dissenters must bring a strain to bear on the allegiance of the more earnest Ritualists. It may well be that out of this movement for union with Nonconformist sects will come the next great shock that will drive many earnest Anglicans into the True Church.

In any case there is a time of much agitation beginning for the English Church "as by law established." The question of the revision of the Prayer Book, officially raised by the report of the Committee of Convocation, has let loose already a storm of debate. The old-fashioned Protestant party is furious at the idea that the "Mass vestments" of the Ritualists may be legalized. Sincere High Churchmen are anxious over proposed concessions to Rationalist Broad Church views, such as the alterations suggested in the recitation of the Athanasian Creed. Some of the utterances on the question of revision reveal the fact that there are clergymen of the Establishment who believe very little, and would be best pleased with elastic formularies.

Socialism in England

I spoke in a recent letter of the remarkable decrease of the Socialist vote at the Croydon election. I hear there has been an equally remarkable decrease of late in the circulation of the Socialist press. The Independent Labor Party has been holding its annual conference at Edinburgh during the Easter holidays. The chairman announced that the Parliamentary fund of the party was exhausted; there was nothing in the treasury. He asked for a collection of £11,000 to enable the party to put forward its candidates at the next General Election, which may come very soon. The decision of the courts that Trades Union funds cannot be applied to political purposes has evidently been a severe blow to Socialism in England. The proceedings of the Congress also revealed a serious amount of dissension in the ranks of the party. On Tuesday the extremists defeated a resolution of the official leaders condemning the action of one of the stormy petrels of the party, Victor Grayson, M.P. He was elected for the Colne Valley division two years ago, and described his success as "a victory for Revolutionary Socialism." He is a young man of twenty-seven. At fourteen he ran away to sea, and after working as an engineer's apprentice for six years went to study at Liverpool and Manchester Universities with the idea of becoming a Unitarian preacher. This project he abandoned "because it is useless to expect any true religion in a social system like the present," and he took to politics. He is a wild talker, who delights in ridiculing Parliamentary methods, and indulges in hints of violence, which, however, he sometimes tries to explain away when challenged. He has been the hero of more than one disorderly scene in the House of Commons, and during the last session was suspended by the Speaker. The vote of the Labor party congress in his favor is a sign of weakness rather than strength. When it was carried, Keir Hardie, Philip Snowden and the other leaders at once resigned, and after a stormy scene their resignations were accepted. This means that the party in Parliament loses the guidance of experienced men with some sense of responsibility, and that wild talkers who "play to the gallery" are coming to the front. This will tend to detach from the Socialist ranks and from the Socialist vote at elections, the considerable body of well meaning people who confuse Socialism with Social Reform and imagine that such Reform, and not some vague scheme of Revolutionary change, is the object for which the Socialist Labor Party is working. Socialism will be on the down grade for some time to come in England. A. H. A.

The University of Paris

PARIS, APRIL 8, 1909.

The University of Paris for the year 1906-07 had 16,609 matriculated students, of whom 3,021 were foreigners. There were 7,182 in the law school and 3,320 in the school of medicine. Last year (1907-08) there were 16,935 matriculated students, of whom 1,773 were women. The enrolment in law and medicine was about the same as for the year before. The figures for the present year (1908-09) are not yet made up, but the total will exceed 17,500.

These figures far surpass those of any other university. In fact no other school of learning on the earth has half as many students as this great mother of the universities. For example, the largest of the German universities is at Berlin, where there are on an average about 7,000 students. In 1906-07 they reported 876 foreign students, the greatest number they have ever had there. In America our largest universities enroll scarcely a third of the number in Paris. Oxford has hardly one-sixth and Cambridge about one-tenth as many.

But from another point of view America makes a better showing. There are on an average, according to some figures furnished by the embassy, between a thousand and eleven hundred American students in the Latin Quarter. This means students from the United States and includes students of art and architecture and special students in all the thousand-and-one things which are to be learned in Paris, outside of and in addition to what is taught at the university.

Besides the actual enrolment at the University of Paris as above, there are always several thousand unmatriculated students in more or less regular attendance upon one or other of the courses at the university; so that 20,000 is not an extravagant figure for the number of students actually taught from year to year on the Mont Ste-Geneviève. Furthermore, this multitude of learners comes not only from France and from America, but from almost all the other countries in the world. Large numbers come every year from Germany, England, Scotland, Ireland, Servia, Bulgaria, Roumania, Switzerland, China, Japan, Russia, Brazil, Bolivia, Austria, Turkey, Persia, Belgium and Spain.

Taking account of the numbers in the various technical, art and industrial schools which are independent of the university, as for example, Le Collège de France, l'Ecole Polytechnique, l'Ecole des Mines, l'Ecole Centrale, l'Ecole des Arts et Métiers, l'Ecole des Hautes Études, l'Ecole des Sciences Politiques, le Conservatoire de Musique, the school of Living Oriental languages, etc., there are in Paris every year on an average something closely approaching 50,000 students of one sort or another, not including the students in the various lycées and colleges. Thus Paris maintains her cosmopolitan lead in education as much as in art and architecture or in science and literature. She is first in human learning as much as she is first in women's gowns and bonnets. She sets the hill of the university over against the Rue de la Paix.

CHARLES F. BEACH.

May-Day Forebodings

PARIS, APRIL 9.

The situation in France just now looks serious. It is the opinion in government circles that the first of May will witness a wholesale strike not only among the working classes, but in the civil service. There may be some exaggeration in this fear, and it is well to remember that the government would be glad to win favor just now by preventing disorders not even contemplated.

In 1906, when M. Clemenceau was Minister of the Interior, a similar game was played with great success. Nevertheless the popular movement is gradually growing too strong for the Government to handle even with the dubious aid of the military. The strike leaders have learned the effect of crippling industry and communications, and their watchword is Passive Resistance or "strike without violence," so that the military may have no occasion to interfere.

On Sunday last, at a meeting 10,000 strong, an alliance was entered into between the workmen in private employ and those engaged in the service of the State, by which a committee of twelve, six workmen and six civil servants, was given complete control of all striking arrangements. At that same meeting, not only the Cabinet, but the senators, and parliament itself, including even the Socialist deputies, were hissed at and jeered as the "Quinze Mille" [i. e., Deputies receiving 15,000 francs, $3,000 a year. Ed. AM.]. M. Pataud, secretary of the Electricians' Union, was loudly cheered when he declared that if the Deputies made laws for the Civil Servants, the Civil Servants might make laws for the Deputies, including a law obliging them to assist at the sessions of the Chamber and to do something while there, and another forbidding them to receive bribes or to sell their votes. Besides the parliamentary party, the Freemasons came in for opprobrium. It is the general belief among the working classes that the Freemasons are responsible for the system of "spying", which has been so prevalent of late, especially among those engaged in Government employment.

It is fairly certain that the present ministry will fall in the near future. There is little probability of any "rapprochement" between the labor organizations and the parliamentary groups. If the Revolution of 1789-1795 freed France from Jacobine individualism, the coming Revolution brings us face to face with the rule of autonomous corporations in which professional interests weigh more than political considerations. Catholics need not be alarmed. Catholic workmen from one end of France to the other have been organized in associations by Count Albert de Mun, and to them all parties look for safety. Already the Revolution is at the doors, and the only question now is how will the government meet it. Should the demands of the workmen for legal recognition of their associations and unions as civil personalities with proportionate parliamentary representation be granted, there will be peace; but, on the other hand, war if it refuses. It is said that sooner than yield, M. Clemenceau will call in Prince Victor Napoleon and set up a Bonaparte dictatorship. This is probably an exaggeration; but the fact is the country is in a bad way, and sadly needs a ruler.

JOSEPH DENAIS.

Servia After the Crisis

BELGRADE, APRIL 10.

Servia is trying to find herself after the turmoil in which she had well nigh lost her compass. Still too sore and indignant at the defection of her primarily devoted ally, Russia, and the acquiescence therein of her sympathizers, France and England, she does not yet realize that she has been saved from an abyss. Her people are slow to be persuaded that their five divisions would indeed have been left to cope alone with Austria-Hungary's eighteen, although it was on this certitude their government acted. It required nerve and fortitude on the part of the responsible ministers to face the country and say: We will not move a finger to deliver Bosnia for we have been misled in our calculations and must bow to the will of Europe. We have done our best, but our efforts have been unsuccessful, since the same Powers who permitted the occupation of two Serb lands are now prepared to ratify their annexation rather than risk bloodshed. If we resist they will abandon us to the mercy of the covetous neighbor who, after seizing Bosnia, has amassed overwhelming forces on all our frontiers."

Common sense does not always appeal to the multitude, and there were clamors of "cowardice," "incompetence," and foolish whispers of "betrayal of the nation." But no solid support could be found for an organized attack on the Coalition Cabinet composed of the leaders of every political section in the land. Gen. Jivkovitch himself, the popular, bellicose war minister, had signed his name to the peace formula submitted by the foreign representatives. It is being borne in on the most determined fire-eaters that Servia is lucky to have escaped with a whole skin, and crumbs of consolation are now sought for and dwelt upon.

The issue at stake was, after all, less that of Servia's racial rights than the supremacy disputed between Eastern and Western as opposed to Middle Europe. Servia's case has been transferred to more potent hands, and how keenly Austria realizes this fact may be seen from her immediate laying down of two first-class battleships. Serb patriots may be pardoned for registering the news with a certain malicious satisfaction. "First result of truckling to the mailed fist!"

The semi-official Sameuprava, published in Belgrade, remarks that Servia adhered persistently to the European aspect of the Bosnian question while her opponent's attitude was distinctly anti-European. And it adds that Servia comes out of the conflict with a "moral capital." "Our cause was just and our ardent espousal of it has increased our prestige. Not to speak of the sympathy aroused in far America and farther Japan—a sympathy most precious to all far-seeing statesmen—the country has had an experience productive of good consequences. A spirit of solidarity replaces the party broils which absorbed our best intellects; a strong race-sentiment attracted notice in those quarters we were most desirous of convincing, and to which we can henceforth appeal, sure of close attention; our courageous attempt at defense of our separated brethren's freedom cements the bond which unites them to us in the future as in the past. Servia's voice will not be ignored in the next scheme of alteration of the Balkan map."

There are other tangible advantages due to the six months' scare that kept Europe in an atmosphere of unrest. Servia's army equipments, which had been neglected, are completed and renovated to the great satisfaction of those who believe that once an army exists it should be clothed, fed and trained. Constant drilling of the troops has rendered them confident, because efficient. It is idle to scoff at the numerical inferiority of a small state, for in a continental war Servia's contingent would be highly important. She can, as a last resort, put 350,000 men in the field, and her regular standing army is 32,000 men. No mean quantum surely, for a population of two and a half millions to bring to the aid of a combatant in the throes of a desperate encounter with a rival! Servia is, thanks again to the scare, now well supplied with guns, from the famous Creusot foundry in France; and important reforms have been carried out in her army administration. The spurt given to all state departments led to the realization of long-delayed improvements and to much useful initiative. Unity of purpose, swiftness of organization, renewed activity in humanitarian enterprise—these are some of the benefits which make the spectre of war appear to many a blessing in disguise.

Nor has Servia reason to repent the bold stand she took up and which she did not relinquish at the bidding of a single foe, however formidable. Champion of the sacredness of a plighted word, she has proposed the question of how far international treaties are guarantees of European equilibrium, of the world's chance of peace. She has laid bare the iniquity of Austria's arbitrary spoliation, and its menace to the civilized states of Europe. As Servia's protest against the incorporation of Bosnia and Herzegovina with the Dual-Empire was listened to with more favor by the Powers, Austria set more seriously about the business of mobilizing. There was never the slightest indication of a desire to submit the case to an international council. What Austria had seized she meant to keep at the cost of involving Europe in a general war, for Germany's battalions were at her disposal. To the honor of Servia it must be said that she alone did not quail, and was ready to take the plunge were any assistance forthcoming. Eastern and Western politicians may well ask themselves whether the abandonment of Servia at such a juncture has not paved the way for Teuton extension from the Baltic to the Ægean, and thence to the Persian Gulf.

A distinguished Balkan scientist, one of Europe's first ethnographers, told me that after studying the trend of recent events he had come to the conclusion that Briton and Latin would grievously feel the counter-blow of the Southern Slav defeat.

From an eminent politician, who has taken an active part in solving the Austro-Serb crisis, I heard, on the other hand, that resentment at Russia's backsliding would soon give way in serious Serb minds to appreciation of what Russia had done and wished to do. He hoped that some form of union with the Great Slav Mother would be advocated for the Balkan States, after the model of the Imperial German Federation. The hopelessness of a single-handed struggle against Teuton preponderance is made evident by Servia's failure to assert her rights; and even those patriots who hitherto rejected the idea of Russian protectorship as a lesion of Servian independence, must now see that it is a choice between eventual absorption by a strong and hostile element, or affiliation with a kindred people capable and willing to safeguard nationality and creed. It would be less derogatory to free Servia, said my informant, to accept openly a position equivalent to Bavaria's than to continue in real but unavowed vassaldom to Austria who stifles her economic development. Servia's military expenditure, which takes a large proportion of her national income, would not be decreased, but it would at least not be futile, since the Serb army would form an important asset in the great military force of Russia.

These and other projects are now likely to be discussed, and important steps will doubtless be taken in the near future to consolidate both Servia's and Bulgaria's status. That a conflict is impending, in which they will be forced to take part, cannot be dissimulated; and England's reliance on her Dreadnoughts is not so overweening that she will sneer at the proffered help of the brave little Kingdom of Servia.

BEN HURST.

Educational Progress in China

An Anglo-American University is being planned for China with the support of the Rev. Lord William Cecil, son of the late Lord Salisbury, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the Eton Grammar School. Such a university would be a centre of religious influence and would propagate the Christian point of view. It would also take the place of several smaller establishments, train native teachers and help to raise the low standard that prevails in Chinese life and thought. The professors would be drawn from Oxford, Cambridge and the United States, and examinations and degrees would be similar to those at home. If the scheme matures, it will much benefit the country. The financial question, $15,000 being annually required, and the attitude of the Chinese Government towards such an institution, are the greatest obstacles to the work.

The German Government is to establish a high school for Chinese at Kiaschow, Shantung Province, at a cost of $150,000 and a yearly expenditure of $25,000. The Chinese Government has promised an annual subsidy of 40,000 taels (the tael is equal to $1.56 gold); it will also provide suitable teachers for the native language, and will admit scholars, who have been successful in the examinations, to government posts. The school will open in autumn next. Six German teachers are already on the way out.

Dr. Burton and Dr. Chamberlain, both of Chicago University, have reached Shanghai, investigating education in China. Their purpose is to study educational needs in schools, examine what is being done by the Government, missionaries and individuals, and take back their report. They will remain in China four months. The Chicago University, it is expected, will then bring educational salvation to millions.

The $11,000,000 of the Boxer indemnity, which the government of the United States gave back to China, will be devoted to educational purposes. The Ministry of Education will send one hundred students annually to the United States for four years, and after that half this number will go annually.

The Prince Regent has instructed the Ministry of Education to put into force throughout the empire the law of compulsory education which went into operation with February of the present year. This is intended as a necessary step for the coming Constitution. Great difficulty is, however, experienced in raising the necessary funds and securing competent teachers.

An Imperial decree has been issued ordering all vice-roys and governors to prepare for local government in cities, towns and villages. This, like the compulsory education law, is a measure in connection with Constitutional Government, and must necessarily precede it. The scheme will be carried out under official control, and to allay all popular prejudice the decree states that similar autonomy existed already as far back as under the Chow and Han dynasties, or 3,000 years B. C.

The Pan-Anglican Congress is sending to China and Japan, for educational purposes, the sum of $150,000 each. Besides the university in China, a theological college is to be built in Tokio.

The International Meteorological Society at its last meeting resolved to adopt a system of storm-signals similar to that already in use on the China coast, and due to the Zikawei Observatory conducted by Jesuit priests. A commission composed of six members will meet in June next in London, England. The Rev. A. Froc, S.J., Director of the Zikawei Observatory, has been requested to take part in the proceedings. Missionaries are thus in all parts of the globe not only messengers of the Gospel but also the pioneers of civilization and progress.

The International Opium Commission, proposed by the United States and accepted by the other Powers, was inaugurated at Shanghai on February 1st. The Viceroy of Nanking presided at the opening. The aim of the Commission is first, to devise means to restrict the use of the drug; second, to ascertain the best means of suppressing the traffic; third, to offer definite suggestions to China for the gradual suppression of opium cultivation, traffic and use; fourth, to examine what China has done so far in regard to the production, commerce and use of the drug. The result of the meeting is rather doubtful, as financial considerations weigh heavy in the balance and it is suspected that China wants the monopoly for herself.

The Manchester Guardian warns the French Government that anarchy works rapidly in France once it is started. It considers the contempt of the French working classes towards the whole parliamentary system as the gravest aspect of the present situation. The laboring population is sick of what it conceives to be the farce of government by deputies, and the fraud and favoritism it believes to be rampant among the delegates of the constituencies. The question of the government's action in the matter of the postal strike has precipitated the coming crisis.

St. Mary's Vacant Rectorship

OFFICIAL.

April 28, 1909.

TO THE REVEREND CLERGY OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF
NEW YORK:

The irremovable rectorship of the parish of St. Mary, Grand street, Manhattan, having become vacant on April 19, 1909, by the death of the Rev. Nicholas J. Hughes, a concursus to fill this vacant charge will be held in accordance with the prescriptions of the Council of Trent and the Third Council of Baltimore, on Thursday, May 13, 1909, at 10 A. M., in Cathedral College, 462 Madison avenue, New York City. Those only are eligible who have exercised the sacred ministry in this diocese for ten years, and have passed three years in successful parochial administration. The names of all candidates must be sent to the Chancellor, 23 East Fifty-first street, New York City, on or before Monday, May 10, 1909.

Federal Children's Bureau

The bill to establish a federal children's bureau, introduced during the last Congress and so strongly urged by the delegates to the Conference of Charities which met last January, remained part of the unfinished business at the close of Congress, March 4. Evidently its friends do not mean to allow it to be forgotten. Representative Parsons of New York and Senator Flint of California have re-introduced the bill and mean to push its consideration in the special session if the tariff debate permit.

A prominent social worker thus tersely states the reason for such a bureau: "There is a definite goal towards which all those who stand back of the federal children's bureau are making. They have in mind that the child is a member of a family; the clue they wish to hold to in the labyrinth of effort is ascertained fact; the definite goal is the overcoming of the stubborn, many-sided destroyer of child-life. They claim that the collecting of facts, the holding of them, the disseminating of them, is a national task. The government should hold the clues."

No one will deny that in the task of protecting the child until it reaches the years of discretion, we shall be helpfully aided by the clues offered by a central collaborating bureau such as a federal bureau would be. Through its assistance the truth might become known concerning the condition of helpless and fatherless and illiterate children in our land; crimes against children might be the subject of accurate statistics; child labor might be carefully investigated; information might be afforded regarding juvenile courts and efficient truancy service. Thus fortified to take effective action, thus guarded against unintelligent attacks upon side issues, there may be made a concerted advance on the disintegrating forces which threaten family life.

In all this, however, it will be well for us to hold in mind the point forcibly accentuated in the sessions of the Charities Conference by the Catholic delegates. Whatever is to be done along the line of governmental control or direction should be done with a distinct understanding that the religious training of the child must not be put aside as a secondary matter and that the conditions of his religious life must be respected always.

This point safeguarded, Catholics can and should recognize the beneficial trend of the proposed legislation and aid its enactment in every way.

The English School Question

Sympathizing with Dr. Clifford in his refusal to pay rates for denominational education in England, The Outlook, for May, places him among the modern martyrs, and contrasts the sweet reasonable methods of the passive resister with the noisy harangues of the suffragette. On the supposition that Dr. Clifford's scruples are conscientious and not merely political, he is deserving of sympathy, but not at all of imitation. To refuse to pay rates on conscientious grounds is to deadlock administration, and to encourage that attitude is to preach rebellion. To agitate for repeal of a law is one thing, to refuse to obey it quite another. Of the two the noisy suffragette is the more loyal citizen. But the question at issue is not Dr. Clifford's martyrdom, but Dr. Clifford's want of logic. For the past seven years he has been writing and haranguing, at times, very noisily and violently, on the iniquity of using public money to teach denominational religion in the schools in England, and he has just now been reasserting his views in a letter thereon to the English press. He is not in favor of driving religion out of the schools, but he will have none of undenominationalism. "I am as strongly opposed to undenominational teaching as I am to Romanism." "I have not yet met with one who could tell what undenominationalism is, or define the fundamental Christianity 'common' to all the churches. Certainly there is not a common Anglicanism, and each Baptist may determine for himself what is the common faith of the Baptist Church" [Dr. Clifford is himself a Baptist minister]. After such a confession of faith it would be logical to hear him advocate secularism pure and simple, but no, he has a plan for keeping the Bible, not as mere literature, but by using portions of it suited to the capacity of the children, such use to be literary, historical, ethical and spiritual, but never in any way theological or ecclesiastical. Supposing, per impossibile, the portions suited to the capacity of the children could be chosen and agreed upon, how is the teacher to draw the line between the ethical and the theological, the spiritual and the ecclesiastical, when not even Dr. Clifford can define fundamental Christianity? And would not Catholics be equally justified in refusing rates for the upkeep of schools where such a travesty of religious teaching was given? Not that Catholics would do so, for they have over and over again declared that they would simply withdraw Catholic schools from all government aid, and maintain them on voluntary subscriptions, thus securing the right to teach the religion they believe in.

In England, Dr. Clifford on the Education question holds much the same position as Mrs. Carrie Nation on Temperance with us: and doubtless when he is ready he too will retire to his farm or house now safely held in his wife's name in order to avoid paying his education taxes, and the gain for Education will be great.

Toleration in Catholic Lorraine

Answer is made in a recent number of Germania, the strong Catholic organ of the German Empire, to the outcry that is widely heard of late regarding clerical intolerance in the Catholic "Reichsland," Lorraine. A certain Pfarrer Sell, representative of the Protestant Alliance in Lorraine has been airing fancied grievances suffered from the Catholic majority in that province, and basing upon them a plea for energetic action against the intolerance of the Catholics.

The reply of Germania is quite to the point. "Is it 'Intolerance,'" the editor asks, "that has permitted the Protestant Church in Lorraine to draw from the tax revenues of the Reichsland since 1875 no less than 2,869,000 marks in excess of the sum rightly coming to it on a basis of percentage of population, whilst the Catholic Church on a like basis, has received 5,924,000 marks less than its proper share? Is it 'Intolerance' that allows the Protestant clergy on an average double the salary per caput allowed to their confreres of the Catholic clergy? Is it 'Intolerance' that grants to the ministers of the Evangelical churches in Metz a perquisite of 1,200 marks for household expenses, whilst the Catholic priests of the same city receive the sum of 480 marks? Is it 'Intolerance' which permits the standing burden of a collection in all the Catholic churches of Metz every Sunday, the proceeds of which are handed over to the civic charity officials to be used for the benefit of Catholic and Evangelical poor alike, whilst no such collection is asked for in the Evangelical churches?"

A long series of similar "evidences of intolerance" are rehearsed and the final word is added. "Certainly the Protestants in Catholic Lorraine are far better off than are the Catholics in Protestant Saxony or Mecklenburg, in which provinces Catholics are not permitted to erect church edifices at their own expense, whilst their clergy may not celebrate solemn Church functions without permission in each case from the Evangelical ministers." Special little notes of this nature it is well for Catholics to retain in memory. The liberty we enjoy in our own land is not universal, nor is the old cry of "Catholic Intolerance" quite unknown in the world to-day.

An American Church

Several interviews given by Ambassador White in Paris were printed here last week in which he explained why he refused to attend the wedding ceremony of his daughter Muriel and Count Scherr-Thoss at St. Joseph's Church, Avenue Hoche. If he has been reported correctly the burden of his complaint was that being the American ambassador he thought there ought to have been a similar ceremony in "The American," that is the Episcopalian Chapel. For this the ecclesiastical authorities refused consent, so he staid away. It might be asked since when has the Episcopalian become "The American Church?" If any church in Paris may properly be called an American church it is the little edifice in the Avenue Hoche so long and so zealously served by the Passionist Fathers, in which the marriage actually took place. It is not so many years ago since an attempt was made by the anti-clerical government officials to steal this structure by the imposition of a tax that amounted to confiscation. Mrs. John W. Mackey, it will be remembered, generously came to the rescue and bought it with good American money. In its American aspect, therefore, Ambassador White should have been pleased that the ceremony was witnessed there and that we are not, in Paris or elsewhere, limited to any church, in accordance with a fundamental principle of the American Constitution that the State shall make no law regarding the establishment of religion or to restrict the free exercise thereof. Needless to say, the Ambassador's statement that there was precedent for permitting a double, that is, a Protestant as well as a Catholic ceremony in Paris, is without foundation. A special cable advice from our Paris correspondent, obtained from the Archbishop, denies that any such double ceremony had ever been permitted. No ecclesiastical authority is competent to grant such permission. To constitute a precedent it is not enough that some irresponsible curé may have failed to insist on the single ceremony as a condition on which the dispensation for a mixed marriage is granted. Much less is it a precedent, at least for a man of Mr. White's standing to follow when the prelate granting, or the priest obtaining the dispensation, is deceived by the parties contracting the marriage as happened in a flagrant instance in France a few years ago.

Unitarianism

The claim of some American Unitarians that a recent election has stimulated their growth, and their consequent aggressiveness, make a study of their tenets and history opportune. This is excellently done by Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, in the Irish Theological Quarterly. Though the name was adopted in Transylvania in 1600, and Socinians also denied the Divinity of Christ, the first Unitarian place of worship was opened in London, 1774, by Theophilus Lindsey, a seceder from the Anglican Establishment. He and his followers were "worshippers of the Father only." Dr. Martineau, the cleverest exponent of Unitarianism, states their object: "To take the Eternal Son of God from heaven, and isolate the Father as the One Infinite Mind." Worship is ascribed to God alone. Broad churchmen and ministers of various sects often preach Unitarianism under the guise of "primitive Christianity," but Unitarians are more honest: "In the primitive churches there were beliefs in the Messiahship . . . which are no part of our religion." In fact it is difficult to find anything that can be called religion or belief in their professions. It is all negation. They tried for a while to conciliate Protestants by giving a positive form to their negations: "We believe in the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the leadership of Jesus, salvation by character, the progress of mankind onward and upward forever." Even here Our Lord's religion had no dogma; it is merely "love to God and man." But soon they boldly denied every dogma specifically, the Trinity, Divinity of Christ, the inspiration of the Bible—at least in the Christian sense. "Incarnation and Revelation are not partial but universal truths"; that is we are all divine and all inspired. In our visions of the better and sorrow for the worse lies "the Common Essence of man and God." Dr. Martineau calls this "the religion of the Spirit," the badge adopted by some of the late Modernists; in both instances it is Pantheism pure and simple however disguised by counterfeit symbols. But the Unitarians have thrown off all disguise. Gannett, a Unitarian light, declares: "The great affirmation of religion is that God and man are in essence one. . . . All this I know, is pantheistic." God is incarnate not only in Garrison and Emerson, but in all of us. If the prophets were inspired, so was Shakespeare and Whitman, and so are you. This was boldly proclaimed in press and pulpit at the recent Unitarian Conference in New Orleans, and all believers in dogma were declared unscientific and superstitious.

"We are Unitarians," writes Dr. Crooker, "because we trace the revelation of truth and the incarnation of divinity through the evolution of humanity. . . .

Every dogma that denies the immanence of God in all souls seems a profanation."

"In 1865 American Unitarians took the lead in a pantheistic direction, showing," says J. F. Smith (Encyc. Brit.) "greater sympathy with recent scientific speculation and less fear of pantheistic theories than English Unitarians." But the intellectual Unitarians, English or American, have no such fear now; they are frankly pagan. They declare there is no logical alternative except Catholicism. "If you would trace a divine legacy," says Martineau, "from the age of the Cæsars, would you set out to meet it in the Protestant tracks which soon lose themselves in the forests of Germany or the Alps of Switzerland; or on the great Roman road of history which runs through all the centuries and sets you down in Greece or Asia Minor at the very door of the churches to which the Apostles wrote?"

Though there are only 986 Unitarian Congregations altogether, confined chiefly to the United States, Britain and Hungary, they have a wide and active literary propaganda, and those who are in mental agreement with them far outnumber the formal members and are continually on the increase. Thousands of nominal Protestants are Unitarian at heart. The New Orleans Conference claimed that in the last analysis Unitarianism was true Protestantism. They certainly seem to have exhausted the protest; one cannot see how it could be carried further. Starting out "to isolate God," they have distributed Him through all His creatures till there is no Divine Personality left. They may still speak of "God," "religion," "salvation," in a figurative or special sense, but in any real or Christian sense, Unitarianism to-day has no place for God, religion or salvation. It sees nothing beyond the grave; and all who will not brook the supernatural are steadily moving in the same direction. The battle is between Religion and Paganism, and "the real leaders in the struggle are Unitarianism and the Catholic Church."

A laudation of I. M. Synge is going around the secular press and there is an intimation that we are to have more of it. He belonged to a small set of literary "log-rollers" who posed as the only true artists in Ireland, and professing to represent the spiritual element of the Irish character of which they were ignorant, have imported Ibsen and Hegel to help them out. Mr. Synge became notorious for writing a play that was hissed off the Irish stage and broke up the National Theatre in Dublin. The hero of the play is an Irish peasant who murdered his father; the people are represented as lauding the act, protecting the murderer and making merry over the corpse. The play lacks literary merit, being a medley of incongruities dressed out in Ibsenized brogue. Now that the author is no more, the matter might be allowed to rest, had not the ill-advised propaganda of his friends tended to provoke a repetition of the scenes which the play originally excited.

LITERATURE

Along the Rivas of France and Italy, written and illustrated by GORDON HOME (London: I. M. Dent & Co.; New York, The Macmillan Co. 1908.)

This is a charming book. As the author travels along the Rivas of France and Italy, he shows he is an accurate, painstaking observer, an earnest student and investigator who knows how to turn the material of his researches into a very readable book. The work is beautifully illustrated from drawings by the author himself, and an accurate and very detailed map of the whole Riviera is appended. Though not a Catholic, the author deals in reverential manner with churches, sanctuaries, Madonnas, etc., in that land, once deeply Catholic. He seems to have a little grudge against the authority of the Pope, and twice lets it appear incidentally. Thus on page 134, he talks of "Papal chagrin at the progress of peaceful Italy." We do not know what special opportunities he may have had of observing such chagrin, but if over-taxation and an increasing emigration are signs of the 'progress of peaceful Italy,' we may pardon the Pope's chagrin. Again on page 175 and 176 he tells us how the splendid buildings that were once a Dominican Convent have been turned into military barracks, and then, playfully, asks, "What does the Vatican think?" If he really wants to know we can assure him that the Vatican prays for its persecutors, and forgives them, "for they know not what they do." On the other hand it is a pleasure to notice the author's touching tribute to Pius VII on page 228.

Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia. Vol. XIX, December, 1908, No. 4.

The Philadelphia Catholic Historical Society continues its good work of publishing letters found in diocesan archives. In this issue there are two instalments of important letters addressed to Bishop Carroll during the trying period which followed the American Revolution when the Church in the newly organized States was doing her utmost to meet the difficulties of a situation without a parallel in ecclesiastical history. The suppression of the Society of Jesus throughout the world had imperiled the brightest prospects of the missionaries of the Order who were laboring zealously in Pennsylvania and Maryland. Troubles were brewing in Philadelphia and pioneer priests were struggling with the immigrants in Kentucky. The letters of Father Farmer and of Father David, afterwards Bishop of Bardstown, Ky., and especially those of Father Badin throw an interesting light on a dark period. Father Devitt's biographical notes in the text are illuminating and add zest to the reading. The information to be gleaned from these letters may not substantially increase our knowledge of the Church given us by Shea and others, but there can be no questioning the usefulness of having in print the correspondence of those pioneers, the story of whose lives is the story of the infancy of the Catholic Church in the United States.

Child of Destiny. WILLIAM J. FISCHER, M.D. Toronto: William Briggs. Price $1.25.

A clean-cut, sane and healthy piece of fiction. Dr. Fischer, whose genius is many-sided—he is a poet, physician, novelist, short story writer and an excellent biographer—seems at his best in fiction, and the book now before us will give him an assured standing among the rapidly increasing literary coterie of the land of the maple leaf.

It has been stated by one of the large Canadian daily papers that the doctor writes with fervid haste, rushing from one production to another. We happen to know with regard to "Child of Destiny," that precisely the opposite is the case. This volume was written four years ago, then carefully re-written, and published serially. It was then carefully revised by the author before it was given to the printer. All this does not indicate undue haste.

The plot is studied and intricate enough to hold the reader, whose pleasure is enhanced, in many instances, by quite artistic delineations of character. There is enough tragedy to thrill, and the note of mild comedy is not wanting. The chief merit of the book lies in the wholesomeness of it all, such as makes for the cultivation of higher and better taste among those who read fiction only.

It would not be fair to the reader to give an outline of the story. We hope Dr. Fischer's pen will not lie idle. There is large room for just such novels as his. It is well produced, and one of the three fine illustrations is by Count Cattipani.

La concezione del Purgatorio Dantesco. Giovanni Busnelli, S.J. Rome: -906.

The arrangement which Dante gives to his Purgatory is not that which is commonly attributed to it by ascetic writers. He places it side by side with Earthly Paradise, which he supposes to exist in some island in the midst of a vast encompassing sea. As he was a theologian, he knew that while faith teaches nothing definite about arrangements in purgatory, we are, however, to believe that souls expiate past transgressions by suffering there and also that there exists a purgatorial fire. Dante was careful to maintain this in his Purgatory. He was not the first to make purgatory and paradise contiguous: before him there had been "The Vision of the Monk Albericus," the ancient MS. poem "Christ's Vengeance," the legend of "St. Patrick's Well," "Daedalus' Vision," "Seth's Journey to the Earthly Paradise," and other small medieval productions. It was not, however, from such scanty materials that Dante drew his sublime conception.

The Bible, of which he was a great student, as commented on by the Fathers and Christian Scholars, was his inspiration. Among the commentators of Holy Scripture there are two from whom he may be said to have derived his whole conception of purgatory. They are the Abbot Rupertus, so famous in the Middle Ages, as to give rise to the proverb, experto crede Roberto, and Cardinal Hugh of San Caro, a contemporary of St. Thomas Aquinas, and, like him, a Dominican. The general plan and main outline is chiefly from Rupertus. But the topography of Purgatory is wholly the poet's invention. Again the conception of Purgatory, as drawn from these sources and supplemented by his own fertile genius, serves as a symbol to convey a theology which is at once dogmatic, moral and ascetical. Even in this the poet borrows from these two great commentators of Scripture, and in them finds many of his types. Once we succeed in mastering the poet's conception of Purgatory the allegory is easily seized and, as Dante himself says, we see that the veil that shrouds the truth is thin. Our author in his little brochure shows this admirably. Father Busnelli is a great authority on Dante. As soon as his work on the first part of the "Divina Commedia" appeared, it gave him a very conspicuous place among Dante's best interpreters. The present work, which is a study in historical criticism, conducted on improved modern methods, gives us a new key to the interpretation of Dante's Purgatory. As a writer in the Civiltà Cattolica, Father Busnelli is well known, and the editor of AMERICA is to be congratulated on having him as a collaborator.

Helen Ayr; A Story of the Square Deal. FRANCIS SIDNEY HAYWARD, A.M., LL.B. New York: The Cochrane Publishing Co.

This "story of the square deal," as the author calls it in the sub-title, depicts, at times in the phraseology of high-wrought fiction and romance, conditions and phases of modern society very well known to the average reader in these days of huge monopolies and trusts. "Helen Ayr" is an allegory; the conception of the work is original, the execution, on the whole, successful, and the purpose generous and manly.

The heroine is held in duress by a set of ruthless, hard-hearted barons, de Vectur, d'Olei, d'Aurum, de Pruna, de Caro, de Fer and others, till the Chief Herald of Templand—read President of the United States—throws the balance of power in her favor and she is rescued by the two champions, Mons Altus and Paganus—the plain people of the town and country. Helen is, of course, Columbia, and Mr. Hayward did not need to supply a key to the "robber barons."

There is a sincere ring of indignation and scorn against the misuse of power, and the oppression of the masses. If the picture of the barons is melodramatic, here and there, the author has at least given earnest thought to the economic questions of the day; he views the sombre side, yet with the buoyancy of youth hopes for better things. There is a trifle of the amateur's touch about the writing, a little bookish dilettanteism that spoils the effect, and some padding; but in spite of these defects, Mr. Hayward has literary talent, has faith in God, and in justice and goodness. Let him step into the arena next time with visor up, leave pretty sword-play aside and strike home.

A discovery that will be welcomed by all who wish to learn typewriting and which, it is claimed, makes the learning of all typewriting easy, and eliminates drudgery and strain on the nerves is called "The Diagram System of Learning Typewriting." No one hitherto dreamed of learning typewriting without the aid of a typewriter and from a book. This book proves that there is a twofold training in learning typewriting: one of which belongs to the mind and the other to the fingers. By far the hardest part of learning and gaining speed on the typewriter is the training of the mind, and this the "Diagram System" claims to do without the machine. When the mind is trained the fingers follow with ease and pleasure. This book enables the student to study speed and accuracy at home without a machine. It has been introduced in many schools and the pupils of those schools are said to excel in accuracy and speed pupils taught by other methods. It is published by the Diagram Publishers, Chicago, Ill.

Among the recent publications of the Professors of the Catholic University of Washington, we may mention "The Making and Unmaking of a Dullard," by Dr. Thomas E. Shields; "La vie de Saint Patrice," a Breton mystery play in three acts, edited and translated into modern French by Dr. Joseph Runn, and an adaptation of the Gospels for Sunday School use, entitled the "Divine Story," by Rev. Cornelius T. Holland, of Providence, R. I., a licentiate of the University.

Mgr. Touchet proves convincingly in Le Correspondant that the supposed abjuration of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc was no abjuration whatsoever. It consisted of six lines about the length of an Our Father, and was afterwards destroyed. The written records prove (1), that this writing was reduced to French; (2) that it commenced by the words, "I, Jeanne"; (3) that she agreed to submit herself to the conscience of her judges; (4) that she promised not to carry arms or wear man's dress; (5) that she submitted to the decision, judgment and orders of the Church. In return, she was to be allowed to hear Mass, receive Holy Communion and be transferred to a church prison where women alone would attend her. These promises she made willingly, for they contained no denial of her Voices or her mission. The fact that Cauchon substituted another document containing such denial, the only thing he desired, would alone prove that it was absent in the first. Moreover, Jeanne had a horror of being burned, and that was the only alternative. She preferred "seven times death by the axe and rest in consecrated ground." She said, indeed, she had rather sign than be burned and this feeling seemed afterwards a sin to her tender conscience, but she also said thrice to Cauchon, when he declared that her submission to "the Church" was equivalent to abjuration: "I have not understood my submission in the sense you have given it." Mgr. Touchet's article is the last word on the subject. We commend its perusal to certain writers who accepted the "recantation" story too easily.

The second edition of Karl Domanig's trilogy, "The Tyrolese War of Liberation," presents a much improved text and the make-up is a credit to the publisher. It is adorned with pictures of the three heroes of liberty, Speckbacher, Straub and Andreas Hofer. The book is a most beautiful and appropriate gift which the Muse of poetry places upon the altar of the Tyrolese Fatherland as a memorial of 1909, the year of its glory and disaster. The poet has successfully represented the great characteristics of the Tyrolese race in the personalities of the heroes. The indignation one generally feels at the sight of outraged right and justice forms, as it were, the background, and brings out in bolder relief the ideals which lay deep in the nation's mind and called for action. The characters of the foreign conquerors either form a powerful contrast or intensify the light which is shed upon the heroes. To gain a true insight into the soul of that liberty-loving people and the cause and nature of their achievement one must read Domanig's book.

Several interesting papers on Joan of Arc have appeared during the past few months in the newspapers and magazines of the country. A notable one was written for the Sunday edition of the Brooklyn Eagle. Another, which shows scholarship and research forms a prominent feature of the Sunday's Springfield Republican. It gives the story of the process of Joan's beatification, discusses the merits of the several tribunals before which the Cause of the Maid was tried, and does all this with so much fairness and accuracy that the reader is filled with amazement to find an article that would grace the pages of any standard Catholic periodical side by side with the frivolous outpourings about the paint and powder people of the stage.

The December number of Stranik, a religious magazine of St. Petersburg, contains an article called "The Struggle Against Immorality," the opening paragraphs of which fit equally well the conditions of Western Europe and America.

"The nineteenth century," it says, "was the century of steam and electricity, but the twentieth century bids fair to be the century of pornography, as a German novelist remarks, and it must be confessed that this sad prophecy has much likelihood of being fulfilled. It is a pity that in the whole civilized world the lowest instincts of mankind show themselves with unprecedented strength and audacity. The rebellion against morality advances everywhere with terrifying strides. The aspirations of the soul, literature, art, whatsoever serves ideal ends, are now turned into the service of these instincts. In literature pornographic productions are spread in greater quantities than the editions of other works. Magazines often create their subscribers by pornographic romances and scandalous engravings. Newspapers are filled with abominable advertisements, while every scandal in the law courts is rehearsed to its utmost limits. After literature comes art. Here again the pornographic dogs enjoy their choicest morsels in the theatre. Cinematographs lend the theatres active support. Pictures and statues of seductive import are placed in the show windows of stores, often amid holy pictures, and serve as an allurement to the purchaser. Pornographic revelations of the latest scandals are scattered everywhere in millions of copies. Hundreds of business firms flourish, thanks to the manufacture and trade in such wares. Of course this sort of immorality always existed, but never has it attained such proportions and systematic organization in Christian society, and never has it flourished with such insolent frankness."

REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.

The plague of divorce, which "to our shame and cost is most virulent and widespread in the United States" is the topic of Cardinal Gibbons' paper in the May Century. It is a brief study of the newest phase of this all-important topic of the social life about us, "the alarming diagnosis whereby we are told that divorce is a necessity—nay, is not an unmixed evil."

Needless to say the Cardinal touches the sore spot which makes the present-day civilization in the States as full almost of venomous contagion to the moral life of the nation as ever was that of Pagan Rome. And Rome's story of divorce was a startlingly wicked one. But he touches it with the kindly tenderness of the surgeon who seeks to remove the evil that would destroy. As a Catholic Churchman he gives the reason of the faith that is in him and holds the indissolubility of the marriage tie to be an absolute bar to divorce with right to marry during the life of the divorced party.

The Cardinal, however, writes for those who are not of his own faith as well, and upon these he urges as the one cure of the cancerous growth of the divorce evil among us an increase of the faith, and fear of God, and religion that held sway in the days when divorce was almost unknown among men.

"Uniform legislative restriction," he says, "severity on the part of the judges, social ostracism, each might help, and, I believe, would help a little; but unless people restrain themselves, because of the all-seeing eye of God, or, better still, because of their hope of reward from Him, we shall never obtain a generally successful cure for the divorce evil."

The "New Basis of Work for the Blind" is an intensely interesting paper in this number of the Century. It sketches the new movement in charity work of our day, especially in its attitude towards the blind. Blindness is a pitiable misfortune, but the enthusiasm with which those thus afflicted are responding to the promise held out in the new methods of their training, and the joy and courage with which, when trained, they turn to assume new responsibilities must be realized before one can fancy the full horror of the old-time incubus laid upon them "who walked in the dark."

The writer reviews two phases of the work done in the modern methods. First there is the training of those born blind. And the school at Overbrook, Pennsylvania, has been selected as typical of this phase, because, as the author tells us, "with its perfect equipment and ideal management it represents the greatest achievement thus far in fitting the blind school child to overcome his handicap and to take his position as a useful citizen in the world."

But since it is true that three-quarters of the entire number of blind persons lose their sight after the school age, the in a way greater problem of what to do to aid this number faces modern society. The author discusses the splendid work of the New York Association for the Blind as a striking manner of efficient solution.

This sketch, illustrates how, when proper direction is taken for this class, singularly remarkable and happy results follow in lifting its members out of the plane of permanent poverty and dependence upon private charity into a condition of moral seriousness, self-respect and vital hope which belong to real and possible efficiency. The author has given us a readable paper full of human interest.

Harper's Monthly Magazine for May offers its readers its wonted full measure of poesy, fact and fiction. Carefully "layered in" the measure one comes upon the Monthly's usual popular science paper, May's offering being a rather technical and intricate article—though the author may not have intended it to be such—"On the Chemical Interpretation of Life." In the stimulating effects of the new science of radio-activity, of which Professor Duncan, the author, speaks, he has probably seen clear his title to push aside as worthless the analysis of the old philosopher, and instead of the ancient query, what is it in things evidently living that constitutes life, he asks where is life.

To answer his question the Professor proceeds to chemically dissolve the living thing to discover where there is in it anything which is esoteric to matter, anything that may prove the presence of an unknowable and vital force other than chemistry.

Dressing out the details of his reply in the new terms of progressive modern chemistry, Mr. Duncan makes answer to his question in the old-fashioned manner of the materialists. Forgetting, or voluntarily overlooking, the truism of the old philosophy that matter as such, forceless and inert as it is, does not and cannot exist, he forgets, too, that the specifically different principles of activity in the original causes, chemical and physical energy, play about the living and non-living being alike, and naturally there will be something suggesting likeness or similarity in the effects they produce in the one and the other. But no mere chance likeness of effect in petty detail will permit us to see in these forces a sufficient reason to hold the fullness of vital activity to be only a further evolution of chemical or physical energy over that exhibited in non-living bodies. There are functions of the living organism—those of self-nutrition, self-augmentation and self-production—in which chemical activity does its part, but directed and used by a higher principle, in the absence of which chemical force will never achieve a like effect in matter. This force the old philosophy terms the vital principle or form. Professor Duncan finds no trace of it in the process of laboratory analysis. Happily there are many still among us who do not require the evidence of laboratory processes to recognize the reasonableness of the demand for adequate principles to explain evident facts. And surely there is reasonableness in the insistence upon a vital force dominating and directing and using chemical activities in the development of the living body, since where no such force exists no mere chemical activity can produce the functions we accept as essentially vital.

The Irish Theological Quarterly for April (Dublin: M. H. Gill & Son) is well up to its exceptionally high standard. There are two useful articles on certain practical aspects of commutative justice. Fr. Slater, S.J., treats of the just price in general; Dr. Barry deals with the mutual obligations of contractors and public institutions. We have seldom seen so clear and convincing a presentation as Dr. McRory's "Theories of Our Lord's Resurrection." It is certainly a paper that should be issued in pamphlet form and should be widely distributed. Dr. Esposito, an Italian, and Canon Gougoud, a Frenchman, are engaged in friendly rivalry as to which can produce the largest number of Irish Medieval Latin writers. The list seems inexhaustible. The literary criticisms form, perhaps, the most valuable department of the Quarterly. Father Hitchcock's "Unitarianism" is noticed elsewhere.

EDUCATION

At the invitation of Louvain University, the Liberal University of Ghent has unanimously decided to be represented at the celebrations in May. Liege, likewise Liberal, has followed suit after a debate of some days. This action of the Liberals has been appreciated by the Catholic Press, and contrasts favorably with that of the University of Paris, and of the Belgian Royal Academy of Sciences, which refused to attend the celebrations. Final arrangements have been made, by several literary societies of Belgium, for a grand literary festival to be held in conjunction with the jubilee. Its aim is to honor Belgian Catholic writers and especially those of the movement of 1880. Emile Verhaeren, one of these, will give readings from his poems, in illustration of a lecture, which will be one of the features.

The first of the festivities in connection with the twenty-fifth anniversary of the coming of the Catholic party into power (in 1848), took place at Ghent on April 18. A week later at Marche, on April 24-25, a grand meeting of the Federation of Catholic Societies, was held at which the chief figure was M. Beernaert, the veteran Catholic statesman. It was at Marche, just twenty-five years ago, he made the famous speech which is regarded as creating the campaign that ended with victory for the Catholic party. It might be well to recall here that on March 12, the Pope, addressing the Belgian pilgrims, remarked that if the party have done so much and so well, they owe it in great measure to the university and the influence it has had for three-fourths of a century on the activity and thought of the country. Indeed were it not for the university the destiny of Belgium might have been quite other than it has been.

An occurrence of the highest importance for the future of Catholic education in Belgium is the constitution of a general committee to superintend Catholic primary schools there. Hitherto primary schools have not received at the hands of Catholics all the attention they deserve. Lately, however, under the active and intelligent lead of Cardinal Mercier, Archbishop of Mechlin, a strong movement has been set on foot for the union of all the Catholic forces. Last month a meeting was held at Mechlin, presided over by Mgr. Mercier, of representative ecclesiastics and laymen, of the seven dioceses of Belgium. The scheme proposed by his eminence for the foundation of a "Ligue scolaire catholique" was enthusiastically approved and the following measures adopted: There is to be a Central Committee, presided over by M. F. Belpaire (Antwerp), composed of ecclesiastical delegates of the bishops and of one or two laymen appointed by the bishops in each diocese, who will meet at least once a month at Mechlin.

The sevenfold aim of the "Ligue scolaire catholique" is clearly defined: (1) as much as possible to provide accommodations for all the Catholic children in a Catholic school; (2) The legal section will make it its object to control the observance of the existing school legislation, to examine if any changes might be desirable, to give legal advice for the foundation of schools; (3) Technical section: construction and furnishing of schools; museum for teachers. (4) Pedagogical Section: scientific progress of free schools, training colleges. (5) Financial section: collecting and administering of the common funds. (6) Teachers' section: higher salaries for masters; pensions. (7) Section of the Press: Defence of Catholic interests in newspapers and reviews. (8) Section for post-graduates. Finally a section of ladies will take in hand all that concerns charitable help to poor children; clothing, meals, Christmas trees, etc., and also catechism. The foundation of this new league has been enthusiastically welcomed by all Catholics throughout the country and it may be expected to become a powerful army for the coming struggle. Canon Temmerman (Heverle) and Messrs. V. Brifant (Brussels), G. della Faille de Leverghem (Antwerp) and P. Verhaegen (Ghent) have been appointed secretaries. Under the Central Committee, each diocese will have its Provincial Committee, which must include at least five laymen. Each parish is to make an inquiry on the present state of education within its limits.

The Electrical World, of April 15, feels moved to protest against "the already too low existing standards" of education in this country. The occasion that gives rise to this protest is a bill "now under discussion in the ancient Commonwealth of Massachusetts which, if carried through, will do more to demoralize genuine education than anything yet seriously proposed. In brief the plan is as follows: Any town or city which is willing to lend space in its school buildings is to have established in it, through the medium of tutors and peripatetic professors borrowed from other institutions, a full-fledged 'college' with the power of granting degrees of learning. It is figured that by this device the goods can be delivered at the cost of about $134 for the four years' course. By this means, too, the students have the opportunity of living at home and of securing work, if necessary, while pursuing their studies, and the 'aristocratic ideals' of the ordinary college designed for the 'privileged few' would be eliminated. It is only fair to state that the remarkable institutions with its so-called 'distribution centers' is to have a genuine endowment, and has the support of a certain number of 'educators,' mostly of the kind rampant in the public schools."

Three hundred women school teachers making a pilgrimage from Vienna to Rome were received in audience by Pope Pius on April 12 and enjoyed the privilege of listening to his fatherly commendation of their efforts in the religious training of those in their care. "Your visit," the Holy Father said to them, "is at once a consolation to me and a proof of the religious zeal with which you fulfill the all-important duty of your vocation. That vocation is truly an apostolic one. You can, in a certain measure, make of your children what you will. When you train them to piety, and to generous practice of their religion and to obedience, you have the assurance that your little ones, now innocent and good, will later come to be excellent Christian women and mothers. I thank you from my heart for the good results you are achieving and will continue to achieve."

ART

Early in August at statue to Father Marquette, S.J., the pioneer and explorer of the Upper Lake region, will be placed on Macinac Island, Mich., by the heirs of the late Hon. Peter White. Marquette, Mich. The fund for this memorial was started thirty years ago, but up to last year only $2,600 had been subscribed. Then Mr. White said he would pay whatever more was necessary for a bronze figure and granite pedestal. He died suddenly before the plan could be carried out, but his heirs will see that all its details are perfected and the dedication take place as he wished.

A point on the banks of the Potomac River, in the newly improved park at Washington, has been selected for the site of the statue of John Paul Jones, for which Congress has appropriated $50,000. Charles H. Niehaus has been awarded the contract for designing and erecting the statue. No action seems to have been taken by the Government commissioners as yet in regard to the objection made by the representatives of the Irish-American societies to the nude figures and other inappropriate details of the design made by Andrew O'Connor for the memorial to Commodore John Barry.

SCIENCE

Our sun is known to be surrounded, first by the four so-called terrestrial planets, Mercury, Venus, Earth and Mars; next by a ring of many hundreds of smaller bodies, asteroids or planetoids, and lastly by the four major planets, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus and Neptune, not to mention the innumerable comets and meteors that meander through the planetary orbits in every conceivable direction. As the outermost planet, Neptune, whose distance from the sun is thirty times the earth's distance, and whose year is 164 times as long as ours, was discovered in 1846 by the perturbations it produced upon its nearest neighbor, Uranus, it has been the ambition of the astronomers ever since to discover a planet beyond Neptune, by the perturbations that Neptune itself experiences. As these Neptunian perturbations are, however, very small and may probably be fully accounted for by the attractions of known bodies, no such new planet has ever been found.

Professor Forbes, of England, has lately attacked the problem from another point of view. It is a well-known fact to those who compute the orbits of comets, that these bodies may have their orbits considerably and even essentially modified when they pass close to the larger planets. Comets that used to roam in hyperbolic orbits, coming from one part of space and receding to another, with a velocity that the sun itself could not control, were forced to move in elliptical orbits by the attraction of a large planet, and from transient visitors were made permanent members of our solar system; that is, as astronomers express themselves, they were captured by a planet. Successive approaches of the comet to the planet imposed further modifications upon its orbit, until at last this orbit became a very elongated ellipse whose major axis, or in this case the farthest excursion of the comet away from the sun, became very nearly equal to the planet's distance from this luminary, and its time of revolution equal to about half that of the planet. Some planets are credited with quite a number of such comets, which are then said to belong to the family of that planet. Thus, for example, Halley's comet, which is expected to return and to become visible in a few months, belongs to the family of Neptune, its period, ranging on account of perturbations from seventy-four to seventy-eight years, being about half of the 164 years that it takes Neptune to move about the sun.

In carefully examining the list of cometary orbits Professor Forbes found six of them which have such tolerably equal major axis that they seem to him to constitute a family and to point to the existence of a large planet about 100 times as far from the sun as we are, its time of revolution being about 1,000 years. He has even ventured to compute its approximate orbit, and maintains that its inclinations to the ecliptic is fifty-three degrees, the maximum inclination of our existing large planet being known to be only seven degrees.

Professor Forbes's theory has been adversely criticized by competent authorities, and his planet has not yet been found. If it does exist, it must be excessively faint and its motion so slow that in a whole year of our reckoning it would appear to move over a space only about two-thirds the diameter of the moon. It is therefore practically a fixed star, and its discovery will necessitate the laborious comparisons of photographic plates. If it is found near the stars and proves to be at the distance indicated by Professor Forbes, his name will take rank with those of Leverrier and Adams, the discoverers of Neptune. If not, his able and ingenious theory will be relegated to the scrap heap of beautiful but unconfirmed hypotheses. At all events the prize is a glorious one, and well worth the labor.

A short notice in the January Observatory states that, according to the Harvard College Circular, No. 144, Professor W. H. Pickering places another hypothetical planet beyond Neptune, and that this planet is entirely different from Prof. Forbes'. A search is being made for it photographically with the 24-inch Bruce telescope at the Harvard station at Arquipa, Peru, South America, as well as with the 12-inch doublet at Cambridge, Mass. The method used by Prof. Pickering in locating the new planet is not given in the Observatory.

In Berlin, on April 22, the Bundesrath voted to accept the new patent-right agreement entered into between Germany and the United States. According to this agreement a patent-right may be granted on condition that the article patented be manufactured in the land granting the patent. After the manner of a "favored nation clause," however, there is added the permission to the authorities of both lands to grant the patent when the article it covers is manufactured in the other country and imported for sale. The agreement had already been approved in the United States Senate.

Reports to hand mark the colossal nature of the work undertaken by the United States in its building of the Panama Canal. During January the sum expended on the work amounted to $3,- 250,000. Up to February 1 of this year brings the total of the moneys paid out in the Panama Zone since the United States officials took over the work to the vast sum of $93,915,000, expended under the principal heads of governmental expense, sanitation and payment for actual labor in the digging of the canal.

SOCIOLOGY

Several very interesting topics were considered at the recent annual meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, held in Philadelphia. At the session devoted to the discussion of the obstacles to race progress in the United States, the Very Rev. Dr. Thomas J. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University, presided, and in his opening address placed the alcohol habit in the front place in the list of obstacles. Another was the incessant toil of the husband, wife and other members of the household, while the disregard of the family ties was held up as a very dangerous factor in the destruction of the influence of the fireside.

"With the bane of alcoholism is the awful drug habit and their terrible current of crime, insanity and disease and all their progeny," he said, "but not only do we find these evils in the homes of the poor, but in high society, and the leering face of barbarism peers at us in the very midst of the achievements of this age." Dr. Shahan was of a very optimistic disposition, despite the dangers and perils he so vividly depicted, and said that while greed was at the bottom of all the social trouble of the world, Americans were an unselfish people, and he felt certain that they would settle these problems in a novel way, and in settling them for the United States would settle them for the whole world; for he believed that the Almighty designed the Western Hemisphere as His great workshop for the solution of those things which vex the race. When that time comes, he said he felt assured, the individual and the family would again be entities in the great social fabric.

Employment of very young boys as messengers by the great telegraph companies and the custom of sending them with messages into all sorts of evil places was declared by Mrs. Florence Kelly as infamous and a crime against the home and society.

Mrs. Kelly is secretary of the National Consumers' League, of New York City, and her indictment of the telegraph companies was framed in an address in a discussion of "The Fatal Invasion of Family Life and Industry."

"I speak from exact information when I say that these boys are sent into disreputable houses late at night," continued Mrs. Kelly, and so great are the temptations that it is a marvel if any boy remains honest three months after he enters the service of any of these companies. Late at night they go about the city when they should be under their home roof. All sorts of temptations to lure them into the vilest of sins beset them."

Mrs. Joseph J. O'Donoghue presiding, the seventh annual conference of the Association of Catholic Charities met at the Catholic Club on April 27. Reports read on Day Nurseries, Hospital Visiting, Girls' Clubs, Settlements and kindred work all indicated substantial progress in these directions of philanthropic effort. In all the reports there was a plea for more workers in the cause and more earnest interest in what is being done by these organizations. The necessity of more sympathetic co-operation on the part of the Catholic laity to counteract the aggressive non-Catholic and proselyting influences at work in Protestant or so-called non-sectarian settlements and nurseries among the Catholic population was emphasized. The Rev. Dr. White, director of the Brooklyn charities, in a brief address said that Catholic women, especially those coming from our convent schools and colleges, should now take an intelligent interest in these sociological problems so as to get at the causes of economic ills and be able to offer arguments for their relief that would be based on facts and not on sentimental beliefs. He held that one of the chief things to be aimed at was the encouragement of perseverance among the members of the various charitable organizations to make their work effective. Right Rev. Mgr. Lavelle, V.G., who represented Archbishop Farley, unavoidably absent, urged the care of the great foreign element that has come from Southern and Eastern Europe. The needs of the large district in the lower east side of New York was specially brought to the attention of the meeting. Henry W. De Forest and Right Rev. Mgr. D. J. McMahon also spoke.

The principal issue occupying the religious stage in Belgium is the crusade against race suicide, and especially against the preaching thereof. The impulse was given by the Lenten pastoral of Cardinal Mercier on the "duties of married life." Though to a lesser degree than in France, the evil of depopulation is working in Belgium also. True the population is increasing in absolute numbers (1899, 6,744,535; 1909, about 7,500,000), but it must not be forgotten that there have been many immigrants and besides a diminution of mortality due to superior life-saving devices in medicine and surgery. Then, too, the birth-rate has decreased, even with the increase in the number of inhabitants. A glance at the statistics proves this, viz.; 1901, 200,077 births; 1903, 192,301; 1905, 187,435; 1908, 184,400.

That is, in 1881 Belgium had a birth rate of 31 per 1,000, while to-day it is but 25 per 1,000. The cardinal, therefore, was well warranted in sounding a cry of alarm. His eminence says, though a Walloon himself, that the evil is more widespread in the Walloon part of the country than in the Flemish. This is no doubt due to the fact that pamphlets, etc., coming from France and advocating the Neo-Malthusian doctrine, find ready circulation where French is read, and none where it is not.

His eminence insists on the sacredness of the marriage-tie, and the responsibility before God of those who regard it merely as a means to satisfy their instincts and passions; the two arguments that with many children they are poor, and cannot give them a good education or leave a substantial heritage, he triumphantly refutes. The duties of conscience are above worldly considerations, and besides, it is the large families who are the best. As P. Leroy-Beaulieu has said: "On the social ladder those who are descending are shod in patent leather, and those who are climbing, in sabots." His eminence ends with the words of the Gospel: "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His justice, and all these things shall be added to you."

The pastoral has given rise to much activity; printed instructions are being sent to all the priests, and lectures are being given or to be given, on the subject, one of them being by Father Vermeersch, in Easter Week.

The editor of Survey, as the organ of the Charity Organization of the City of New York is to be named in future, in an interesting leader on the perversion of social institutions, presents some prudent guiding principles well worthy of study in our day when social work has become the fad of many.

"Prisons should not make criminals," he says; "the police system should not create hostility towards the representatives of law and order; charity should not make paupers; industry should not make workers unemployable; the school should not make its pupils inefficient; churches should not create an indifference to religion; missions organized to aid the starving should not make bread lines; recreation should not devitalize; politics should not undermine good citizenship; retail trade should not result in the exploitation of consumers; child saving agencies should not exhibit an excessive mortality; state labor departments should not neglect to make an intelligible report in regard to the factory conditions subject to their supervision; a federal investigation of the labor of women and children should not be unable to make reports of progress from time to time, like the bulletins of the Census Bureau, and thus be compelled to present its results in bulk long afterwards, when the facts upon which it reports are no longer of interest or of value."

In no line of civic activity is there greater need of "reasonable service" than in that looking to the betterment of social conditions among us.

PERSONAL

The Right Rev. Joseph G. Anderson, V.G., pastor of St. Paul's Church, Dorchester, has been appointed auxiliary to the Archbishop of Boston. The new bishop was born in Boston, Sept. 30, 1865, made his classical studies in Boston College and his theological course in Brighton Seminary, where he was ordained priest in May, 1892. He has been Supervisor of the Catholic Charities of Boston for some time, and has done much progressive work in his supervision of the philanthropic efforts of the diocese. Boston now has two auxiliary bishops.

The new Belgian Vicar Apostolic of Higher Congo, Mgr. Huis was born at Bruges on July 9, 1871; he became a Doctor of Divinity in Rome in 1875, and was ordained at the end of the same year. Two years later he left for the African mission of the White Fathers, where he resided till 1907; he was then sent back to Belgium to recover his health. He was consecrated at Antwerp during Easter week and embarked for his diocese on April 23 with M. Kenkin, minister of the Congo Colony.

The board of directors of the Maryland School for the Blind have elected Mr. Michael Jenkins, of Baltimore, president to succeed the late John T. Morris. Mr. Jenkins has been a director of the School for the Blind since 1885, and has always taken an active interest in the work. He is also treasurer of the Catholic University of America.

Mrs. Frances Tiernan, the Laetare medalist of this year, is a native of Salisbury, North Carolina, not New Carolina, as "The Catholic Who's Who" for 1909, with the Englishman's nice regard for American places and American matters generally, naively declares. Her parents were Col. Charles Frederic Fisher and Elizabeth Ruth Caldwell. She is a convert to the Faith, having been received into the Church in 1870. Since that time her pen has been very active as is attested by her long list of works of fiction, her translations and her numerous and exquisite contributions to The Ave Maria and Catholic World.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—The usual annual meeting of the Archbishops of the United States was held at the Catholic University on Thursday, April 22. There were present Cardinal Gibbons, and the Most Reverend Archbishops John M. Farley, of New York; Patrick William Riordan, of San Francisco; Patrick John Ryan, of Philadelphia. John Ireland, of St. Paul; John Joseph Glennon, of St. Louis, and Henry Moeller, of Cincinnati.

—One of the principal questions discussed in this annual conference was that of the suppression of the female-slave traffic, and it was resolved to urge the clergy throughout the land to lend every possible assistance to the civil authorities to make effective the energetic action these latter have undertaken to put an end to the shameful business. Other topics considered were the recent legislation regarding matrimony and the advisability of the lengthening of the course of theological study for candidates for the priesthood. Cardinal Gibbons, as usual, presided at the conference.

—The Executive Board of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions met at the Catholic University on April 23. His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, presided. There were also present Archbishops Ryan and Farley. Reverend William H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau, was present and presented his annual report for 1908, just published.

—The Commission for the Catholic Missions Among the Colored People met at the Catholic University on Saturday, April 24. There were present the chairman, His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Farley, Bishops Byrne of Nashville, Keiley of Savannah, Allen of Mobile, and the Reverend John E. Burke of Saint Benedict's Church, New York.

—Rev. Nicholas A. Weber, S.M., S.T.L., a young professor at the Marist College, near the Catholic University, Washington, passed his examination for the doctorate in theology on Thursday, April 29. Father Weber offered to the faculty of theology a printed dissertation of about two hundred and fifty pages, entitled a "History of Simony in the Early Church from the beginning to the death of Charlemagne." Besides an examination on this subject he also defended seventy-five theses from all departments of Catholic theology.

Satisfactory progress is reported in the plans of the Knights of Columbus to create in the Catholic University an Endowment fund of five hundred thousand dollars. With this generous sum it is intended to create fifty scholarships of ten thousand dollars each. The Ancient Order of Hibernians are also active in the establishment of a large number of scholarships at the University for the studying of the Gaelic language and literature, and the Catholic Knights of America contemplate the endowment of a chair.

The spring meeting of the board of trustees took place at the Catholic University April 23. There were present the Chancellor, Cardinal Gibbons, and Archbishops Riordan, Ireland, Farley, Glennon, Moeller and Ryan, also Bishops Maes, Harkins and Foley. Monsignor Lavelle, Messrs. Michael Jenkins of Baltimore, Richard C. Kerens, of St. Louis, Walter George Smith, of Philadelphia, Charles J. Bonaparte, of Baltimore, and the Very Reverend Pro-Rector, Dr. Thomas J. Shahan. Among the most important decisions of the Board was the transfer of the general library of the University from its present quarters under the house chapel of Divinity Hall to the western half of the first floor of McMahon Hall. The University Library numbers at present some 60,000 volumes. By this change of quarters space will be found for more than 130,000 volumes, besides much better ventilation and light, as the former quarters were becoming overcrowded.

—A notable gathering of college presidents, educators and distinguished visitors, assisted on April 22, at the house of higher studies for the Jesuit Order at Woodstock, Md., at what is known as a "Public Act," when the treatises "De Verbo Incarnato" and "De Beata Virgine Maria" were defended by Father Herbert J. Parker, S.J., of Philadelphia. The subject matter was divided into fifty comprehensive theses, and each objector was allowed free scope for about half an hour. Among those taking part in the discussion were The Very Rev. M. A. Waldron, O.P., professor of moral theology and history in the Dominican House of Studies, Washington; the Rev. A. Vieban, S.S., professor of dogmatic theology, St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore; the Rev. George Sauvage, C.S.C., professor of dogma and canon law, Holy Cross College, Washington, and the Rev. D. Giacobbi, S.J., associate editor of AMERICA.

The fifty theses covering the field of philosophy were entrusted to Mr. John P. Meagher, S.J., of Washington, and the objections were made by the Rev. E. A. Pace, Ph.D., S.T.D., the Catholic University of America; the Rev. F. X. McSweeney, S.T.D., professor of moral theology and history, Mount St. Mary's Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md.; the Rev. F. P. Siegfried, professor of physiology, St. Charles Borromeo Seminary, Overbrook, Philadelphia; the Rev. T. J. Gasson, S.J., rector of Boston College. The ability and skill of the learned doctors who took part in the disputations and the earnestness with which they went to work are a testimony to the proficiency of the defenders, who held their ground and did not falter. AMERICA rejoices in the success of Father Parker and Mr. Meagher, and congratulates them.

—A special despatch from Ottawa to L'Action Sociale, of Quebec city, announces that the date of the opening of the Plenary Council has been fixed for September 17. How many days it will last is not yet known. The work yet to be done is considerable, and is now in the hands of seven committees, which will report to a general meeting for discussion by that meeting. Latin, French and English will be the languages used at the Council. Each Archbishop will be accompanied by two theologians; each bishop will have one only.

—A numerous body of German Catholics from different sections of the country sailed on the König Albert on Saturday last, on a pilgrimage to Rome. Local arrangements had been made by the Rev. Urban C. Nageleisen, Director of the Leo House, in New York. The pilgrims hope to reach Rome on May 10, on which day they will be received in audience by the Holy Father. After a stay of some days in the Eternal City they will visit noted shrines in Italy, Germany, Switzerland and Belgium. This is the second pilgrimage of German Catholics—the first, made up of a distinguished band of priests and laymen, visited Rome on the occasion of the Holy Father's golden jubilee of the priesthood.

—The bishops of Hungary met in the palace, in Buda-Pest, of Cardinal Vaszary, the Primate, on March 15. They were officially informed that on account of very difficult conditions in Hungary, the provisions of the decree "Ne Temere" have been modified so as to conform to the regulations obtaining in the German Empire. This was done in answer to a petition addressed to the Holy See immediately upon the publication of the "Ne Temere." At the same time the mixed marriages concluded after the publication of the latter decree were declared valid. The same favor was extended to the partes annexae of the Kingdom of Hungary, i. e., Croatia and Slavonia.

—To discuss the best ways and means for the further organization and development of the mission movement in the United States, the fourth conference of missionaries will meet in the Apostolic Mission House, Washington, on June 9, and remain in session for several days. The Rev. A. P. Doyle, C.S.P., rector of the Apostolic Mission House, in his call for the meeting says that His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons has been invited to preside and that he expects a number of the hierarchy and representatives of the religious orders to attend the sessions. The graduation exercises of the Catholic University will be held on the same day.

The Commissions representing the States of Vermont and New York in the arrangements of the tercentennial anniversary of the discovery of Lake Champlain, have decided upon the dates. The celebrations Sunday, July 4th, will consist of religious services in New York, Vermont and Quebec. Monday the exercisees will be at Crown Point; Tuesday, at Ticonderoga; Wednesday, at Plattsburgh, which will be the scene of the closing celebrations in New York State. Burlington, Vt., will have its observances on Thursday, and Isle La Motte, on Friday.

—As there are many pressing matters for consideration, the Bishops of England decided to hold the usual Low Week Conference at the usual time. On Wednesday, April 21, the feast of St. Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the eighth centenary of his death, there was solemn High Mass at the Cathedral of Westminster, sung by the Archbishop in the presence of many of the bishops. The sermon was preached by Mgr. Moyes, one of the leading authorities on English Church History. He dealt with the strange delusion by which some of the Anglican bishops are led to persuade themselves that the Protestant prelate, Dr. Davidson, of Canterbury, is the legitimate successor of St. Anselm. In vindication of this "continuity" craze some of the Anglican extremists are preparing a celebration of the centenary in their own peculiar way. The great international Catholic celebration takes place in St. Anselm's native valley of Aosta, Italy, in September.

—On May 2 Archbishop Farley will consecrate the Church of Immaculate Conception, at Irvington-on-Hudson. Its pastor, the Rev. T. J. Earley, is to be congratulated on the generosity of a parishioner (si sic omnes!) who, by freeing the church from debt, renders the ceremony possible. God's houses are only too often weighted down by debt in this rich land, and consequently the consecration ceremony, with its beautiful liturgical symbolism is of rare occurrence.

—The latest statistics of the Belgian Catholic missions in the Congo which are given in the March number of Le Mouvement des Missions Catholiques au Congo furnish interesting information upon the object of M. Vandervelde's late attack in Le Peuple. The missionary field in the Congo entrusted to the Belgian Sacred Heart, White Fathers and Fathers of Scheut; three apostolic prefectures in charge of the Premonstratensians, Jesuits and Scheutists; and three missions administered by the Trappists, Redemptorists and the Fathers of the Holy Ghost. The oldest mission is that of the White Fathers, founded in 1878, the most recent, that of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, founded in 1907. In all there are 191 priests, 77 brothers and 125 sisters in charge of 54 chief stations and some 672 sub-stations. There are 37,475 Christians and about 86,650 catechumens and 173 schools, orphanages, hospitals, etc.. The baptisms for 1907 and 1908 numbered 16,442 and the marriages 1,594. In the schools, orphanages, etc., there are 9,280 children. Among the missionaries the Scheutists are the most numerous, being 70 in all; among the sisters there are 37 of St. Francis Missionaries of Mary, and 32 of the Sisters of Charity, of Ghent. The numbers of deaths among the missionaries, men and women, during 1907 and 1908 was 21.

—Servia, the little country which has been attracting so much attention of late, is the only land in which there is no Catholic organization at all, neither diocese nor vicariate apostolic nor prefecture. It is not even a regular missionary district. There are Catholic Serbs in Dalmatia who are cared for by Catholic Servian priests. In Montenegro also the Catholics enjoy a certain amount of freedom in consequence of a concordat concluded with Prince Nicolas. The Catholics who are now in Servia are immigrants, mostly Poles and Albanians. They number about ten thousand in all, among a population of two and a half million Serbs. The Servian government levies a tax for the maintenance of Divine worship, a certain percentage of which is shared by the Mohammedans, the Jews, and the Protestant ministers, but the Catholic priests receive nothing. The tax paid by Catholics goes into the pockets of the "Orthodox" popes. There were, sometime ago, three parishes, the two oldest being Belgrad and Kragujevac. After the Russo-Turkish war an immigrant priest, Willibald Tschok, started a new one in Nish, the city often mentioned as the future capital of the country, where there are about one thousand Catholics. But these parishes suffered constantly from the hostilities of the Servian government. Father Tschok died in 1903, and has had no successor. The city is visited once a year by a priest. There are two Catholic schools in the country, at Belgrade and Nish.

... AMERICA is destined to lead the Catholic press of the world and prove a veritable thirteen-inch gun of Truth.

THOMAS P. COWHEY.

OBITUARY

Charles Warren Stoddard, litterateur and educator, died at Monterey, Cal., on April 24, in his sixty-fifth year. He belonged to that group of writers, distinctively American and Californian, which includes Joaquin Miller, Gertrude Atherton and Bret Harte. Born in Rochester, N. Y., he received his early education at the schools in Western New York and at the University of California, to which State he accompanied his family while he was yet a lad. Ill health preventing his graduation, a spirit of unrest and the longing for travel, so characteristic of his later career, took possession of him. Before he was seventeen he had twice made the journey to California, once by the Nicaragua route and a second time by way of Panama, and on a return trip he rounded Cape Horn as a companion to an invalid brother. In 1864 he went to the Hawaiian Islands; again in 1868; in 1870 to Tahiti, and then and there began to write of his wanderings. As Marion Crawford's sojourn in the East gave us "Mr. Isaacs" with its Oriental setting, so Stoddard's voyages over the Pacific supplied the artist with the ready material for the sketches of people and places in the South Sea, which Dean Howells describes as "the lightest, sweetest, wildest, freshest things that were ever written about the life of that summer ocean." The isles of the Pacific cast their spell upon him, transforming him into a dreamer and a wanderer on the face of the earth. In 1873 he went to Europe as special correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle, and for five years drifted, he says, "at my own sweet will over Europe, Asia and Africa. In 1878 I was again in California, and for three years lived chiefly on reminiscences. Then weary of commonplaces I resolved to banish myself to Hawaii, and there end my days in some island of Tranquil Delights." Three years later his dream was o'er and he awakened to find himself, in 1885, Professor of English Literature in the University of Notre Dame, Indiana.

A visit to Alaska in 1886 was followed two years later by one to Rome, at which time the poet-professor was offered the chair of English Literature at the Catholic University of America, which he accepted and held for several years.

For Catholics the story of his conversion, as told anonymously in "How a Troubled Heart was Set at Rest," will remain a spontaneous unveiling of the purity of his soul and the basic sanity of his bright mind, while his life of St. Anthony, entitled "The Wonder-worker of Padua," shows how childlike was his piety. These professedly Catholic books also help us to realize the unobtrusive undercurrent of Catholic thought which runs through his contributions to poetic and lighter literature.

Mr. Stoddard has secured a niche apart in American letters. Of some of his writings it may be said, to quote Mr. Howells again, that "there are few such delicious bits of literature in the language—they always seemed to me of the very make of the tropic spray which 'knows not if it be sea or sun.'" That Mr. Stoddard's work was appreciated outside his native land is attested by a writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes, who styles him "the American Pierre Loti," and Kipling wrote to him:

I plowed the land with horses,
But my heart was ill at ease;
For the old seafaring men
Come to me now and then
With the sagas of the seas.

Bliss Carmen's tribute is as graceful as it is poetic:

"Give me your last aloha,
When I go out of sight,
Over the dark rim of the sea
Into the polar night;
And all the north-land give you
Skald for the voyage begun,
When your bright summer sail goes down
Into the zones of Sun." E. S.

The Rev. Nicholas J. Hughes who had been pastor of St. Mary's Church, this city, since 1881, died at the rectory, after a brief illness, on April 18, aged 61 years. He was born in the parish. Ordained in 1871, almost his whole sacerdotal service was given there. He freed the property from debt and renovated and embellished the old structure which has much historic interest in relation to the early days of the Church in New York. The parish is one in which the remarkable social changes of recent years are most manifest. Once one of the strongest Irish-American sections, the great congregations that filled the church of old have vanished and the whole neighborhood is now almost entirely peopled by Jews. Thanks to the prudent foresight of Father Hughes, the temporalities of the parish were placed on so substantial a footing that the foundation could be continued as formerly.

Peter Fenelon Collier, publisher, died suddenly of apoplexy in this city on April 23. Mr. Collier was born in the County Carlow, Ireland, Dec. 12, 1849, and came to this country in early manhood. He attended, for a time, St.

Mary's Seminary, Cincinnati, but finding that the priesthood was not his calling abandoned his course there and came to New York, where he entered the book selling business. He was a pioneer in the installment subscription scheme and laid the foundation of his large fortune by an edition he printed of the sermons of Father Burke, O.P., in the early seventies. Later his firm of P. F. Collier & Son and the successful promoting of Collier's Weekly added to his trade repute and material wealth.

Henry Dollard Macdona, a well-known and successful lawyer, died at his residence, Scarsdale, N. Y., on April 25. Mr. Macdona was born in this city in 1854, and graduated in 1876 from Manhattan College. He first turned his attention to newspaper work, and, as a member of the staff of the New York Herald, represented that paper in Mexico, in the expedition to the Arctic to search for the Jeanette survivors, in England and in France. He then studied law and after being admitted to the Bar served in the District Attorney's office. Afterwards he became one of the counsel for the traction and gas capitalists connected with the local system of public utilities. He was intimately associated with Januarius Aloysius McGahan, "the Liberator of Bulgaria," in his early newspaper work.

MUSIC

The fifth annual performance of the Catholic Oratorio Society took place on Sunday evening, April 25, in Carnegie Hall, when Theodore Dubois' dramatical oratorio, "Paradise Lost," was sung by the society itself, assisted by an orchestra from the Philharmonic Society. His Grace, Archbishop Farley, was present with a large audience. Mr. Emil Reyl conducted. Madame Selma Kronold, who had been assiduously training her choir for several months, has every reason to be proud of her success. Her solos as Eve were sung with admirable finish and effectiveness. The other soloists were Mr. Albert Farrington, barytone, who sang the part of Satan; Mr. George Carré and Mr. George Gillet, tenors; Mr. Francis Motley and Mr. David Sheehan, basses.

Mr. Theodore Dubois, who for years was head of the Paris Conservatoire, divides his oratorio into four parts: The Revolt; Hell, Paradise; The Temptation, and The Judgment. The third part is the longest, lasting forty minutes out of the one hundred and ten, which the entire performance takes, and it is the most exciting. From the opening chorus of spirits in this part, "Fair the Dawn Appears," to the closing aria of triumph by Satan, the attention of the audience is captured by the ever-changing melody.

ECONOMICS

At next year's great exhibition in Brussels, the nations to be officially represented are France, Germany, England, Italy and the Netherlands. Others will be represented by large exhibits. The floor space of the exposition will be nearly two million square feet, as compared to just half that amount at the Liège Exposition in 1905. Of this space the greater part is taken up by those nations participating for the first time in Belgium; thus, Germany will have 330,000 square feet, England, 220,000 square feet, and Italy, 180,000 square feet. No mention is made of the United States, which it is known will be represented by large private exhibits. The site of the exhibition is a fine one just on the outskirts of Brussels at Ixelles; to complete the leveling off, more than a million cubic yards of earth were filled in. They are now working at the great aviation park and field for sports. Present indications show that all will be ready in ample time for the opening.

To place the finance of the Empire on an entirely secure basis there is being planned by German law-makers, the introduction of an income tax instead of the originally intended inheritance tax. Mention is made, too, of a combination of both schemes with a tax on the working capital of business ventures and corporations. The mere mention of the possibility of the big increase in taxation is causing worry to the interests concerned.

Though Porto Rico has doubled its imports and exports, its coffee industries have fared badly since the American occupation, which cost it its favorable rates with Spain and France, where the rich Porto Rican berry is much admired, whereas it has not yet found favor in the United States. The Porto Rican executive is now petitioning Congress for special tariff adjustments that will create new markets for its coffee and re-open the old ones. The Cuban legislature has also a deputation in Washington, which is apparently more concerned with political than economical advantages. The legislature has refused to vote supplies unless the upper House grant all their demands, among others the election of judges and the establishment of an agricultural bank. As experiments in this direction resulted in "graft," and election meant the dictation of a local editor, the government withheld approval. This editor is now in Washington airing his grievances, among which his country's commercial needs are not numbered.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The summary of the report of the School Board of the Archdiocese of New York published in the first number of AMERICA, presents facts that are well worthy of consideration. The figures of $11,000,000, invested in school property, and an annual expenditure of $744,000 to support 65,000 scholars, are indeed remarkable evidences of the progress of Catholic education in the Archdiocese. However, it is not the amount of money raised for this purpose that causes exultation in a Catholic heart, but the knowledge that the bulk of this sum is cheerfully given by people who are struggling to earn a livelihood, and thus to contribute they must practice self-denial.

By all rules of equity and fairness, Catholic schools should be entitled to a proper proportion of the public school fund. The injustice of present methods brings into stronger light the fervency of Catholic Faith, and at the same time is an incentive to raise the people to a higher and holier plane of life, through the merits of their devotion in the cause of Christian education. If Catholics were not required to exercise self-denial to support schools, they would not take the same deep interest in their welfare, for we love an object for which we make a sacrifice. The support of schools also calls upon pastors to make extra exertions to raise the necessary funds, thus bringing them into closer touch with their parishioners, and fostering warmer attachments between priest and people for their mutual benefit.

... AMERICA, received, has made an excellent impression. It is clearly on the right lines, and fulfils the promise of not entering on a field occupied by other Catholic journals.

JOHN E. FRIEDEN, S.J.

St. Louis.

... AMERICA was a welcome sight, the fulfilment of eager hopes. Synopsis, chronicle, etc., the quality of the matter especially, all were subjects of favorable comment.

JOSEPH F. HANSELMAN, S.J.

... I have read every word of AMERICA with great interest and pleasure.

JOHN CORBETT, S.J.

New York.

... I know it will fill a want long felt by Catholics who desire accurate information as to general news affecting their interests.

WM. P. O'CONNOR.

New York.

... Very heartily do I rejoice in the Jesuit Fathers' new undertaking. Little can I do, but that little shall be done to further what I feel will be a powerful stay and a zealous teacher of holy Faith.

RIGHT REV. MGR. T. J. CAPEL.

Arno, Cal.

... Contents, form and type are all fine. I feel sure that it will be a success.

REV. DR. E. A. PACE.

Catholic University, Washington.

... May God bless it and spare you to see it established even a greater power than you anticipate. My experience with the Monitor of this Diocese, which I edited, convinces me still further that to reach our great mass of working people we need a paper that is not in the field. I know you will make AMERICA fill its mission.

S. H. HORGAN.

Glen Ridge, N. J.

... I wish the new venture success from the start. There is a long-felt want for such a publication, and I hope that this want will no longer exist—that it will be to the Catholic press, the Pope, whose opinions will be accepted as final in all matters coming within its scope. That it will not be the mouthpiece of any combination seeking private ends or to boom this or that person to the injury of others, to defend the right, and right the wrongs, as far as it can (in a word to be thoroughly Catholic). Wishing a bright and prosperous future to AMERICA.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA111-112

CHRONICLE

The Papal Encyclical.—A cable from Rome to AMERICA, dated May 5, summarizes the encyclical issued by the Holy Father on the occasion of the Centenary of St. Anselm. The Pope warmly thanks the faithful for the expressions of homage and loyalty he received from all over the world on the occasion of his Jubilee, and records the consolation he derived from the splendid manifestations of faith and unity at the Eucharistic Congress of London, and the celebrations at Lourdes. It saddens him, however, that the peace of the Church should continue to be disturbed by some of her own ill-advised and undisciplined members as well as by attacks from without. To crown this sadness, the enormity of the Sicilian disaster weighs down the heart of the Father of Christendom. While the freedom and fundamental rights of the Church are being assailed in countries once Catholic, and the bane of Modernism continues to endanger the faith of the people, the union of the Episcopate with Rome was never more staunch and whole-hearted. Let the Bishops be true to their office as guardians of sound doctrine, let them stand forth as champions of truth and liberty, let them avoid indifference as a most deadly foe, and any policy of compromise detrimental to justice and honor.

A Labor Report.—The statement was made early in the week by Secretary Morrison of the American Federation of Labor that 2,000,000 men in the United States are out of work. This statement is declared to be the summarized report of careful statements made by men thoroughly familiar with conditions of employment throughout the United States. The last report of the Commissioner of Licenses in New York, shows no improvement of labor conditions since the panic of 1907. Not only is there less demand for unskilled labor, but the wages paid to the laborers, with the exception of farm laborers, are lower. Even members of Congress itself are coming to grant that the disturbance of trade due to the uncertainty of tariff rates is responsible for the continuation of this state of things.

Tariff.—The revised Payne Bill is nearing a vote in the Senate under the leadership of Senator Aldrich. The reports early in the week conceded him thirty-four votes as certain for his bill. The twelve votes necessary to give him his majority, the Senator, who is an old and shrewd campaigner, expects to secure through "judicious" trading. How long the Senate will delay its decision depends upon the time this trading will consume. In this uncertainty, business interests, not knowing what course impending legislation will take, are holding back and delaying the recovery of trade and industry. The delay and the trading alike make clearer the need to heed the word commonly spoken by the people: "Prompt revision is important, but honest and thorough revision is imperative."

Red Cross Funds.—The Government and the Red Cross committee in Italy are being severely criticized for the mismanagement of the funds contributed all over the world to assist the earthquake victims. Rumors that portions of this fund were used for proselyting purposes are denied on good authority. There have been some attempts at "Souperism" on the part of the Waldesians of Torre Pellice, but only private money was so employed. It seems that it was these attempts that gave rise to the false rumors.

A May-Day Strike.—The only serious labor trouble on May-day last was the beginning of a strike which promises to become one of the greatest in the history of the Lake Seamen's Union. Claiming that the conditions now sought to be enforced upon them by the Lake Carriers' Association are intolerable, notices were sent out by the general secretary ordering all members of the union on the Great Lakes to quit work on Saturday last. More than 12,000 seamen of all classes are affected in Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo and other centres of shipping on the Great Lakes.

Proportional Parliamentary Representation.—The Canton of Lucerne, Switzerland, has finally decided to change its election method and to adopt what is called the "Proportional Representation System." This system gives to a minority a number of representatives proportionate to the number of votes they cast at the election. If, e. g., a party casts three thousand votes out of ten thousand, it will get three-tenths of all the representatives and will not simply be outvoted and excluded from representation, as would be the case under the Majority System.

The system, as chosen by Lucerne, supposes that there are in each electoral district several representatives to be elected. There is no regular nomination in our sense of the word. The several parties have to hand in to the proper authorities the lists of their candidates. Each list must be marked with the name of the party and signed by at least twenty voters. The name of a candidate must appear on one list only. Thus, by voting for a candidate, the vote is at the same time cast for the party to which he belongs. The number cast for the party decides how many candidates that party will carry. If a party obtains, e. g., two, those two are declared elected who among the candidates of that party have received the highest number of votes. Mathematical accuracy is of course impossible. In fixing the minor details of the law the experience of other cantons and states was utilized by the Lucerne law-makers. The measure being a change of the constitution, it had to be submitted to the popular vote. After a strenuous campaign the law was passed by a vote of 16,000 against 12,000.

This system of proportional representation has been in operation in the Canton of Neuchâtel, where it was first introduced on trial in 1891, and adopted finally in 1894. Belgium uses it for both Houses of Parliament since 1899, and Württemberg for a part of its House of Representatives since 1906. In the German Empire it is optional for the Industrial and obligatory for the Commercial Courts. The Swiss Canton of Ticino also employs it and ascribes to it the complete disappearance of political feuds. In fact, it is claimed that wherever this system is once introduced the people never show any desire to return to the majority system.

The British Budget.—While Senators Bailey, Cummins and others are laboring with slight success to convince the Senate that an income-tax is constitutional and advisable, on the principle that the distribution of taxation should be "according to ability to pay," Mr. Lloyd-George, the English Chancellor of the Exchequer, has translated the principle into action far more drastic than is contemplated by Democrat or "insurgent." This form of taxation is nothing new in England, a graduated income-tax having been in vogue since the days of Gladstone. It is Mr. Lloyd-George's novel application of it, especially the 20 per cent. on "unearned increment," that has alarmed the British plutocracy. To meet a deficit of $79,000,000, incurred by Old Age pensions and the race with Germany in Dreadnoughts, the Liberal Budget taxes heavily motors, club-saloons, and other luxuries of the rich, but the tax on land and income is the chief reliance. The tax on "unearned incomes," that is, on the future increase of value of lands due to the enterprise of communities, is increased from less than one per cent. to more than 17 per cent. While a $2,500 income is granted an abatement of $50 for every child under 15, the tax on $25,000 is raised to 5 per cent., and incomes exceeding $25,000 must pay 2.5 per cent. extra. The increase in death duties and on succession and legacy duties—totaling 27 per cent. for millionaires—will yield additional revenue of $16,850,000, and the new sliding scale of stamp duties on share transactions will add $7,000,000 more. The unpopularity of the liquor tax is offset by provisions for the unemployed, for afforestation and for industrial insurance. The features affecting the United States are the increase on tobacco and petroleum and the heavier stamp duties on stock transactions.

The wealthy are crying "confiscation" and invoking the House of Lords, but with poverty on the increase, millions out of work, and Socialism rampant, the statement of Lloyd-George that the nation is not over-taxed but wrongly taxed, and that his budget sets the balance right, will seem good to the masses who are gratified that the weight of the load is on the rich. Meanwhile the deficit has to be made up, and the Opposition can suggest no alternative to satisfy the country.

Japanese Sailors Entertained.—Six hundred sailors and one hundred officers and cadets of the visiting cruisers Aso and Soya were lavishly entertained by the San Francisco people in Golden Gate Park. The hearty welcome given suggested little of the recent war-scare talk in Pacific Coast reports.

Commission Government.—Though Government by Commission was at first deemed feasible only in smaller cities, the idea is growing that larger municipalities may usefully adopt it. A sub-committee sent to Texas by the Illinois Senate Committee to investigate conditions in Galveston and other Texas towns, made this report:

"In every city we visited we found the almost unanimous sentiment of the citizens favoring the commission form of government. The enthusiasm for it is hardly describable. Without doubt there has been a marked improvement in the conduct of the affairs of these cities under this plan of municipal government. Able, fearless, progressive and conscientious men are in charge of public affairs in these cities. Under the stimulus of great municipal improvements, conducted in the same manner as the affairs of great private enterprises, these cities are entering upon an era of great prosperity, with full confidence of their citizens in the integrity of their public officials and in the efficacy of the commission form of government."

Pueblo, Colorado Springs, Jacksonville, Fla., Atlanta, and several other cities are about to vote on a Commission Charter. Boston is also demanding a charter on similar lines:

1. Concentration of executive power and responsibility in the mayor to be elected for four years, subject to "recall" at the end of two years.

2. A City Council of one chamber and nine members elected at large for three-year terms.

3. The abolition of party nominations and party designations on the ticket, and substitution of nominations on petition of 5,000 voters are enough to prevent multiplicity and a cumbersome ballot.

4. Administration of departments by trained experts appointed by the mayor for four years, subject to investigation and approval as to qualifications by the Civil Service Commission.

5. A permanent finance commission appointed by the Governor to secure full publicity in relation to the conduct of the city government.

The "Galveston plan" has only five commissioners, who have executive power in their own departments, and no state finance committee. The general trend is to eliminate party politics, lessen expenses and increase efficiency.

Belgian Mining Laws.—The bill regulating the working hours of miners was passed by the Chamber on April 1. The agreement finally arrived at is a maximum of nine hours from entry to exit from the shaft, while besides that, the King is authorized to use his discretion in reducing that figure in necessary cases. A maximum of eight hours is also fixed for mines when the temperature is greater than 28 degrees centigrade.

This event is not without its political significance for Belgium, and shows how ideas have changed since two years ago. At that time an amendment was introduced of more moderate pretensions regarding the miners' working hours, and after a bitter fight was passed by a vote of 76 to 70, causing the Cabinet's downfall a few days later. But this is not all. The amendment was fought by the Liberals, yet here we find the Liberals voting in a mass for what they formerly opposed. In fact, history is only repeating itself, for it is the same with many other measures opposed by them, e. g., the bill of 1889, limiting labor of women and children. The conclusion of it all is that the best thing for Belgium today is the maintenance in power of the Catholic party, for while the Socialists are naturally carried to extremes, and the Liberal policy is one of immobility, the Catholics stand midway, and are thus in a position at the same time to act in moderation and to keep from stagnation.

Since the passing of this bill, the question that has been occupying the attention of the Chamber is that of forced labor in the Congo. The debate began by some severe strictures made on the Government's policy by M. Vandervelde. The particular point now at issue is the labor employed by the Great Lakes Railway Company, which, it is alleged, amounts to slavery.

The Facts About "a Riot."—Considerable space was recently given in the routine press despatches about "a riot" at a procession in Mexico and the shooting of the rioters. The item was also sent to the European papers. Father Ipiña, S.J., of Saltillo, Mexico, now supplies AMERICA with the facts. A foreign mining company, which practically owns Velardena, resolved to supply its workmen with a chaplain, and Rev. F. Ramon was chosen. At the request of the company the chaplain held all the Holy Week ceremonies in their own chapel, whereupon a petty official proceeded to arrest him on the ground that he had violated the Reform Laws, which forbid open-air ceremonies. The crowd repulsed this official, but Gonzalez, the government representative, riding up with a detachment shot down without notice twenty-one persons and he himself struck the chaplain with his sword. There has been an inquiry, but so far the criminals have not even been tried.

Disestablishment of the Welsh Church.—Prefacing his speech with the remark that all the thirty-four Welsh members in the British Parliament were in favor of his scheme, Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, introduced a bill on April 21, to disestablish the Welsh Church. The area affected includes Wales and Monmouthshire. After January 1, 1911, should the bill become law, the legal Establishment of four dioceses and 1,083 parishes will come to an end, and the total number of Spiritual Peers in the House of Lords will be reduced from 26 to 22. The bill provides for the creation of three bodies, the Welsh Commissioners, the Council in Wales, and the Church Representative Body. The cathedrals, churches, ecclesiastical residences, and benefactions dating since 1622 will be vested in the church Representative Body. The Glebes and Tithes will be administered by the Commissioners and will eventually pass into the hands of the County Councils to be used for secular purposes; all other property is to be vested in the Council of Wales to defray the cost of working the Act; the surplus to be employed in founding libraries, parish halls, etc. The bill is likely to meet with rough usage in the House of Lords; and Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Opposition, has already declared that its introduction is not in the interests of religion. Catholics will take a sorrowful interest in the uses to which Catholic pre-Reformation funds are to be put. Moreover, the bill is the thin end of the wedge of general disestablishment in England. When the late Cardinal Manning was asked whether he favored disestablishment, he replied, "No; the established church is at least a bulwark against infidelity."

Austrian Political Activity.—The feeling in Austria over the conclusion of the peace with Servia continues to be one of great satisfaction. The Emperor Francis Joseph is acclaimed by his subjects at the "Friedens-kaiser," "Emperor of Peace." To the feeling of satisfaction is added one of great elation over the fact, that one result of the negotiations with Servia has been to bring Austria-Hungary more to the fore as a great Power than she has been for years. The reserves of the Austrian army have been recalled from the Servian frontier, and by the end of April the frontier garrisons were reduced to the number they had before the international difficulty, although the actual strength of the troops is somewhat higher than before. The fleet, too, has dismissed ten thousand reserves.

Until more favorable conditions arise or develop, the commercial treaty with Servia will hang in abeyance, but this seems to be satisfactory to both Austria and Servia. The excitement aroused in England because of the energy shown by Germany in adding to her fleet, will not be lessened by the evident purpose of Austria to follow the example of Germany and to secure for herself a place among the sea-powers. The latest news from Vienna is that the keels of four Dreadnoughts will be laid in the coming autumn and that work on them will be rushed so as to make sure of their completion in 1912. The proposal marks a radical change in the policy of Austria-Hungary. Every one knows that the expensive burdens imposed through the army-reorganization plans undertaken after the disastrous experiences of 1866 forced into the background all thought of a development of the navy of the empire. Though some consideration of a naval reorganization did occupy the mind of Francis Joseph immediately after his accession, Austria has been practically without a fleet for the past century. The idea is again vitalized, since the impossibility, with a large unprotected seacoast, to play a conspicuous part in the world's politics, has dawned upon the Emperor's advisers. There is talk of opening a new navy yard in Hungary.

New Redemptorist General.—By cable from Rome comes the information that the general chapter of the Redemptorist Congregation elected on May 1 the Very Rev. Patrick Murray as Superior General and Rector Major in succession to the Very Rev. Father Matthias Raus, who resigned recently because of ill-health and the infirmities of age. The tenure of office is for life, and this is the first time in the history of the great congregation founded by St. Alphonsus that an English-speaking member has been chosen as its head. Father Murray is an Irishman and has been for some time Provincial in Ireland.

He was born November 24, 1865, and joined the Redemptorists October 23, 1889. As he had already made most of his theological course he was ordained priest September 10, 1890. He is well known as a zealous and successful missionary throughout Ireland and especially in Limerick, where he directed the men's sodality of that city which has had an international reputation. Father Murray is a fluent Gaelic speaker and frequently preaches in the old tongue. During his term as Provincial he was instrumental in sending several of the Redemptorists from the Irish province to the Philippines to help in the restoration of the Church there after the United States Government had taken possession of the islands. At the general chapter in Rome last week there were fifty-three fathers present, including the following from the United States: The Rev. William Lucking, provincial of the Baltimore province, with the Rev. Ferdinand Litz and the Rev. Paul Huber, of the same province; the Rev. Thomas Brown, with the Rev. Daniel Mullane and the Rev. Nicholas Franzen, of the St. Louis province.

A Week of Storms.—A storm of unusual magnitude has swept the country, doing most destruction in the Southern States. A tornado made a path, often a quarter of a mile wide, through Arkansas, Tennessee, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, and dividing in Georgia, swept south through Savannah and east through Norfolk. It was followed by a heavy rain-storm which has been particularly injurious to the cotton-belt. The storm seems to have swept south from the Lakes to the Gulf and east from western Kansas to Florida and the Carolinas and southern Pennsylvania, inflicting heavy damage in Chicago and Philadelphia. While property in the cyclone track has been ruined and hundreds have been killed or injured, it is fortunate, considering the force of the storm, that the death-list is not higher. The gloom of the disaster is relieved by many deeds of heroism, notably the saving of the fast Chicago train near Memphis, Tenn. A large oak fell across the track, catching under it and severely injuring the negro section hand, but as he heard the whistle of the engine he forced himself free, and creeping along the track ignited his own clothes as a signal and thus saved train and passengers. The country has been generous as usual in aiding the sufferers.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Political Map of Italy

Catholics in Italy have been for some years past in the throes of a crisis arising from internal dissensions and lack of uniformity of program. The dissolving of the Opera dei Congressi by the Holy See, five years ago, was a sad necessity, which, for a time, crippled Catholic activity in social matters. Then, as now, Catholics were divided into groups, which for want of better words, we may call Conservatives and Progressivists, differing widely in principles and methods. Both claim to represent Catholic ideals: but in reality the Progressivists, the more numerous body, have so diluted their religious policy that it savors largely of the old Cavour-liberalism, with its empty promises that have brought Socialism to our doors. On the other hand, the Conservative group belongs to the intransigent school of D'ondes Reggio, Margotti, and Albertario in his younger days, and is sternly opposed to any recognition of what the Revolution has brought to pass, and more particularly its treatment of the Papacy. They call themselves Papalists, and the name suits them admirably.

The Progressivists are less thin-skinned in this regard, and while they have kept silent concerning certain vital matters of Catholic interest, they have not failed to voice their admiration for one or other leader in the Revolution, and even to accept in an open official manner the consequences of the Revolution.

The platform of the Conservative party has for its most important plank religion as the saving of society. The social question as such is hardly touched on; whereas the Progressivists aim at benefiting religion indirectly, through a Christian solution of the social difficulty, brought about along democratic lines, by an adjustment of the relations between employers and employees, capital and labor. This object is doubly laudable; laudable in itself, and in the blow it would deal to the power of the Socialists over the masses who are best appealed to by arguments affecting their material well-being. The weakness of the Progressivists, however, lies in their giving way too easily in matters of principle, while the Conservatives err by going to the opposite extreme.

In Lombardy, their stronghold, the Progressivists are the best organized of all the Catholic groups in Italy. They work silently but effectively, as the recent elections have proved. In Piedmont there are so many sections and sub-divisions that vigorous Catholic action is impossible. A peculiarity of the Conservative policy in Piedmont, the cradle of the Italian monarchy, is its dynastic note, which prevents it from grasping the full meaning of the quarrel between the Vatican and the Quirinal. As a rule outside Piedmont this factor is not generally understood, nor is sufficient allowance made for it. In any case it has so far resulted in allowing the Socialists to keep possession of four of the five parliamentary seats of Turin, and to form a strong minority on its municipal benches. In the Veneto things are somewhat brighter, in fact, almost as bright as in Lombardy, and moreover, its Catholic principles are sounder and more to be relied on. In the country around Genoa Catholic activity is still in a very weak condition. There are leaders aplenty, but few in the rank and file. In consequence there has been for some time a partial alliance in municipal affairs between the Clerical and the Moderate groups, which during the recent elections entered the political field with unexpected results.

In Emilia there is disunion everywhere. The discredited Christian Democracy party, no longer a Catholic asset, finds there its staunchest supporters. When the Opera dei Congressi was dissolved the leaders were for loyal submission, but the turbulent element prevailed, and thus through a quarrel centering around persons rather than principles, the Church has received a temporary setback, of which the Socialists have not been slow to profit. The insubordinate element started a National Democratic League, the few Conservatives entered the Cave of Adullam, and the remainder of the Catholics were divided and scattered. Out of the ruins has arisen the Young Mountain Party, founded by a youthful but sterling democrat, named Michieli, who has gathered about him the young men from the mountains around Parma, and aims at driving the Socialists out of that stronghold. Elsewhere similar attempts have proven failures or worse, and have merely played into the hands of the enemies of social order, religion and patriotism. From a Catholic point of view there is no organization in the Romagna, and if in Tuscany things are slightly better, they are by no means creditable. The tale of Southern Italy is one of stagnation; leaders without followers, banners without supporters. It is the nature of the South to flare up enthusiastically in support of a cause and sink back into lethargy before a blow has been struck. Sicily gives promise, however, of bright hopes, but only an optimist would build on them.

This rapid summary or sketch of the Catholic political map of Italy will enable our readers to judge how little truth there is in the assertion that the total abolition of the *Non-Expedi*t would assure an important Catholic majority in the Italian Chamber. The formation of a Catholic party in the Chamber would be at present a tactical mistake, and a historical anachronism. The most to be hoped for is that Catholics may send to the Chamber a body of fifty deputies (not necessarily Catholic deputies) who will work as best they can in defense of religion and country against the attacks of Socialists and Atheists. All other hopes are dreams. For the moment Catholic thought in Italy is going through a crisis, brought about by headstrong opposition to authority, and eagerness to try untrodden paths. The Democratic movement had the approval of the Holy See, but the bounds laid down for action were soon rashly overstepped, and the guidance of the bishops ignored. In consequence, under the ægis of religion, a class-war was started, a Christian campaign became a Socialistic mutiny, an evolutionary movement was changed to a revolution. In many places the younger clergy preferred the platform to the pulpit, the hustings to the sacristy, and thus came to pass that revolt against authority, which in a former issue was pointed out as the peculiar note of Italian modernism, and which is unfortunately not yet quite extinct. There are signs within recent months that, at least in the press, Catholics in Italy are ceasing their unseemly strife. Religion will be the gainer, and Catholics throughout the world will rejoice should these signs prove true.

Literature and Dogmatism

Literature is very hard on religious dogmatists. It pictures them as dried-up, parchment-skinned old men, eagerly crowding about and "poring over a little inexactitude in phrases and pecking at it like domestic fowls." Carlyle, with characteristic downrightness, has called them "thrashers of straw." More moderate writers than Carlyle are in agreement with him on this score, only they change his bludgeon of indignation for the more genteel weapon of irony and sneer. And to-day nearly every young whiffler that stalks into print signalizes his advent in the field of letters by puffing his smoke into the face of the "priesthood under copes and mitres," that strives to conceal "nature's blue skies and awful, eternal verities" by raising "sordid dust-winds of theological controversy." What do these pokey churchmen know of the fine complexity of the modern human heart that they should venture to regulate and control it? Out upon them!

We have just passed through one of those periodical rages against the dogmatist that have been recurring with unvarying regularity from the days of Arianism to the days of Modernism. We have been treated once more to the same old dishes, recrudescences of hackneyed epithets,—“obscurantists,” “ultramontane reactionaries,” “the narrow Roman curia,” “insolent ignorance,” “innocent medievalism” and much Carlylean gasconade,—all nicely caluculated to produce upon readers the impression that there is in existence a certain group of crafty conspirators whose object is to keep people benighted and trodden into a state of craven obedience for its own selfish and mean purposes.

And so the spirit of revolt, like an ancient chorus, keeps the stage forever, while other actors come and go, breaking forth at intervals into clamorous and angry derision over the intolerant and intolerable arrogance which undertakes to decide definitively and in detail on all the most intimate relationships of life, seeks to circumscribe the activities of the aspiring mind, and dares to chart the unseen realms of the spirit and the hereafter.

Only once, as far as he can now recall, has the present writer ever been edified at the unusual spectacle of a non-Catholic author halting abruptly in mid-career whilst in the act of leveling sarcasms at Catholic beliefs and practices. It was in “The Inland Voyage,” where Stevenson pokes fun at the good, pious ladies of Creil. “I cannot help wondering,” he suddenly stops to remark, “as I transcribe these notes, whether a Protestant born and bred is in a fit state to understand these signs, and do them what justice they deserve: and I cannot help answering that he is not. They cannot look so very ugly and mean to the faithful as they do to me. I see that as clearly as a proposition in Euclid. For these believers are neither weak nor wicked . . . I see it as plainly, I say, as a proposition in Euclid, that my Protestant mind has missed the point, and that there goes with these deformities some higher and more religious spirit than I dream.”

There is a gallant condescension about this access of doubt, most amusing to the Catholic. The magical weaver of tales, at least suspects he may be in the dark, which is an intellectual advance beyond the serene intransigence of many literary personages enjoying a greater reputation for profundity and insight. Whatever may be said of Stevenson, he was not a dogmatist. He lacked the deep learning and the deeper conceit which makes men disagreeable.

For, it must be admitted, dogmatism is, in general, a most indefensible phenomenon. From every natural point of view, dogmatists are anomalies against whom our gorge rises. No man has made the universe, or even a small portion of it, and it is safe to declare that no one but the Maker of it can undertake to tell us anything about it, or about Himself, or about ourselves, absolutely and with finality. The only dogmatist in the nature of things is God. He alone knows;—unless, of course, He has seen fit to communicate some of His knowledge to His creatures. In that case, the only proper dogmatists among men are those to whom that knowledge has been imparted.

The only defense, therefore, for the dogmatists is their actual possession of certain Divine truths. It is a startling defense; but it is the very one which the Catholic Church offers. She holds that Christ was God, that He left upon earth a fund of truth in the care of a visible Church that was never to fail in existence or integrity as long as time shall last; that in dogmatizing she merely states correctly, under Divine guidance, one or another of the truths for which God is the sole and ultimate authority. That is, at least, a sane and intelligible position. You may deny that Christ was God, or that Christ entrusted a set of definite beliefs to a teaching corporation; but you cannot deny that, from the point of view of the dogmatist, the rational nature of his position is unassailable.

Now let us examine the ground of literary dogmatism, for dogmatism is not confined to ecclesiastics. Who told the creedless writers that Christ was not God; that He did not found a visible Church with power to decree authoritatively on matters of faith and morals; that Purgatory is a fiction and the Mass a superstition? Has God revealed all this to them? How have they been qualified to declare the purposes and wishes of Divinity in the economy of mankind? They undertake to interpret for us on lofty a priori grounds, not, perhaps, what is the will of God, but—and it is the same thing—what is not the will of God. And they do this in matters which, when examined, are not obviously in contradiction with antecedent notions concerning the Creator.

They do not beg to differ from the Church, nor express their dissent in the form of views of the matter which may or may not be untenable, nor commit themselves respectfully and tentatively to an opposite belief. No, their decisions on the Church's standing are forceful, categorical and condemnatory. They dismiss her pretensions with a tolerant and incredulous smile, or with angry abuse, or with supercilious contempt. And all this is done, as a rule, without the slightest preliminary investigation, and on mere hear-say tags of evidence. Now, we should like to know which has the more reason to complain of injustice and inconsistency in this conflict of opposing dogmatisms—Literature or the Church?

Shakespeare and Blessed Jeanne D'Arc

(Concluded.)

"And thenne she (the Pucelle) sayde that she was with chylde, whereby she was respyted a whyle. But in conclusyon it was founde that she was not with chylde. And thenne she was brente in Roan."*

This fable is repeated by Polydore Vergil, by Fabyan and by Holinshed; while the others, who, like Hall and Crafton, do not mention this incident, denounce the Maid none the less as a sorceress and an impudent impostor. Only one of all the English chroniclers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries treats Jeanne with some measure of respect, at least negatively, by refraining from any word of calumny or abuse. It is pleasant to be able to say that this upright man, remarkable among so many examples of national prejudice and unworthy superstition, was the brother-in-law of Blessed Thomas More, John Rastell, the printer. He was also a champion of the doctrine of Purgatory against Frith, and despite a fabulous statement by Foxe, the martyrologist, that he was converted to Protestantism by the arguments of his opponent, Rastell seems to have become a confessor of the Faith under Thomas Cromwell and to have ended his days in prison. No doubt his championship of Blessed Jeanne was purely negative, but it was something in those days to set down a simple statement of the facts of her brief career without any word of disparagement. On the other hand, whatever ungenerous national feeling may be detected in Fabyan and Caxton finds itself a thousand-fold developed and exaggerated in the Protestant atmosphere of Hall and Holinshed. This is no doubt largely due to the fact that they had acquainted themselves with the writings of certain French chroniclers, Tillet, for example, and Monstrelet, and had learnt that already before their time, a certain religious cult of the Maid had grown up among her countrymen. As it is we can hardly now read without a start of surprise the words of Charles the Dauphin in "I King Henry VI":

"'Tis Joan, not we, by whom the day is won;
For which I will divide my crown with her,
And all the priests and friars in my realm
Shall in procession sing her endless praise.
A statelier pyramis to her I'll rear
Than Penelope's or Memphis' ever was:
In memory of her when she is dead.
Her ashes, in an urn more precious
Than the rich jewelled coffer of Darius,
Transported shall be at high festivals
Before the kings and queens of France.
No longer on Saint Denis will we cry,
But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint."

Act I, sc. 6.

No doubt the words were written of the Maid in all dramatic irony by one who remembered that her ashes had in fact been cast into the Seine, but the significance of this innuendo against the cult of the Pucelle seems to me unmistakable. For the dramatist without obvious reason comes back to it a second time, later in the play, making Alençon say to Joan:

"We'll set thy statue in some holy place
And have thee revered like a blessed saint;
Employ thee then, sweet virgin, for our good."

If anyone should wonder how this strange prevision of what has actually happened, however ironically penned by the dramatist, could have occurred to his mind more than three centuries ago, he has only to turn to Hall's "Chronicle," which Shakespeare as we know was well acquainted with. There the mystery of the French panegyrist whom Hall had before him, in all probability supplied a motive for the chronicler's vicious invective. Thus Hall, after quoting the substance of Henry VI's letter to the Princes of Christendom, justifying his own severity, inveighs against the credence that was put in "the sayings of such prophane prophesiers and craftie imaginers as this pevishe painted* Puzel was."

Whereupon he proceeds: "Yet notwithstanding this

*It is possible, however, that much of this may be due, in the case of Holinshed's "Chronicle," to his editors and continuators. Nearly all that is most unpleasant in his account of Jeanne was added in the second edition.

*As the Shakespearian scholar will be aware, the word painted does not imply the use of cosmetics, but means "pretended" or "having only the semblance of". Cf. for example "Richard III," Act iv, sc. 4.

"I call'd thee then poor shadow, painted queen."

lawful processe, this due examination and publike sentence, John Bouchet and diverse Frenche writers affirme her to be a sainte in heaven. But because it is no poynte in our faith, no man is bound to believe his judgment, although he were an Archedeken. But Paulus Emilius, a famous writer, rehersyng that the citizens of Orleance, had buylded in the honour of her, an Image or an Idole, saith that Pius bishop of Rome† and Anthony bishop of Florence, muche merveiled and greatly wondered at her actes and doynge. With whiche saying I can very well agree that she was more to be merveiled at, as a false prophetesse and seducer of the people, than to be honored or worshipped as a sainte sent from God into the realme of Fraunce."

Neither is Hall content to leave the matter there; he labors the point on the basis that the three distinctive qualities of a good woman are "shamefastnesse," pity and womanly behavior, and he proceeds: "If these qualities be of necessity incident to a good woman, where was her shamefastnesse when she daily and nightly was conversant with common soldiers and men of warre, amongst whom small honestie, less virtue, and shamefastnesse least of all, is exercised or used? Where was her womanly pity when she taking unto her the heart of cruell beaste, slew man, woman and childe, where she might have the upper hande? Where was her womanly behavior, when she cladde herselfe in a mannes clothynge, and was conversant with every losell, giving occasion to all men to judge and speake evill of her and her doynge. Then these thynges being thus plainly true, all men must nedes confesse that the cause ceasyng the effect also ceaseth; so that if these morall vertues lackyng, she was no good woman, then it must nedes consequently folowe, that the woman was no sainte."*

The utter falsehood of these allegations is of course now well known. The publication of the proceedings in the two trials, that before Cauchon in 1431 and the procès de rehabilitation in 1450-56, has in every way done justice to Jeanne's character for modesty and gentleness. But it must be remembered that no Englishman in Shakespeare's day could have come by the real facts. He might well believe that the eulogiums of the Maid by the French Chroniclers, even if he had access to their writings, were as one-sided as the denunciations of Hall, Holinshed and their English contemporaries. Even so honest an historian as Stow gravely retails the legend of Jeanne's simulated pregnancy, the most baseless of all the calumnies invented by her foes. It was not until

†This was Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, Pope Pius II. He speaks somewhat hesitatingly in one or two places, but he also says that she was "inspired from on high as the event shows," Divino afflata spiritu sicut res gestæ demonstrant. See Ayroles, "Vraie Jeanne d'Arc." iv. pp. 247-257.

He means St. Antoninus of Florence. In a passage in his "Chronicle" the saint declares that it seemed from her deeds that Jeanne was guided by the spirit of God. There was nothing unseemly or superstitious discovered in her.

the publication of a translation of de Serres' "History of France," by Edward Grimestone in 1607, that the ordinary English reader had any opportunity of acquainting himself with the facts as they were recounted by the countrymen of the Maid. The effect of this publication was immediate and decisive. In 1611, five years before Shakespeare's death, appeared the "History of Greate Britaine," by John Speed, which Englishmen, we may say, at once recognized as the most important historical work up to that date produced on British soil in the vernacular. Speed's great folio was the link between the old and the new. In it we may discern the dawn of modern historical criticism, and a certain transparent honesty of purpose at once lent weight to the writer's opinion of John Rastell, already mentioned, whose testimony in any case is too slight and too negative to be of real importance. Speed was the first Englishman to show anything like impartiality in his judgment of the Maid.* Without venturing to pronounce a final verdict, he displays a readiness to accept the French estimate of Jeanne and to treat her alleged heavenly mission with all seriousness. De Serres' description of her as "continuing in her first speech so stedfastly uttering nothing but that which was modest, chaste, and holy, that honor and faith was given unto her sayings," is quoted and adopted as if it were Speed's own view. Moreover, the historian goes so far as to suggest that "to some it may seem more honorable to our nation that they were not to be expelled (from France) by a human power, but by a divine, extraordinarily revealing itself." Still whatever share Shakespeare may have had in the drama "I King Henry VI," Speed's "History" came too late to influence the setting of what must have been in any case his earliest play.

If I may state my own opinion of this obscure question, I am tempted to believe that "I King Henry VI," as we have it, is a maimed and degraded perversion of what Shakespeare in 1591 (then but a tyro play-wright and new to London) conceived on somewhat different lines. The crudeness, grossness and exaggeration of the delineation of the Pucelle in the act, seems to me to accord ill with the presentment of the same character in the earlier portion of the play. I could easily believe that in Shakespeare's original conception the question of the Maid's supernatural inspiration had been left unsolved and presented as a problem not wholly dissimilar to that later problem of Hamlet's madness. However closely we examine the text of the first acts, I can find nothing which suggests that the dramatist was treating the Pucelle as a mere study in the workings of religious hypocrisy. On the other hand, it seems in every way likely that a subtle conception of Jeanne as a patriot and a visionary would have found little favor with Shakespeare's fellow actors. This, they would have urged upon him, were not at all the stuff to find favor with the groundlings, especially at a period when the national spirit of the country had been worked up to fever pitch in the enthusiasm excited by the Armada and its sequels; and so, as I conceive, Shakespeare, in 1591, being as yet too inexperienced to make effective protest, a fifth act would have been clouted on to the four earlier ones at the cost of the utter defacement of the dramatist's original conception. Jeanne, the enemy of England, should be made to appear as a shameless courtesan, sold body and soul to the devil, and thunders of applause would greet the coarse jests that insinuated undue familiarity between her and the Dauphin, her Master. It is, I venture to think, not unworthy of notice in this connection that while the first edition of Holinshed's "Chronicle," printed in 1577, is extremely moderate in tone as regards the Pucelle and abstains almost entirely from violent denunciation, the second edition, which appeared ten years later, at a time when national feeling was running high, is swelled out in this section to more than double its bulk and breathes nothing but fierce invective against the shamelessness and hypocrisies of this "damnable sorceress, suborned by Sathan," "this foul accursed minister of Hell."

*Polydore Vergil, who shows some sympathy for Jeanne, a sympathy for which he was rebuked by later chroniclers, and who declares her execution to have been an outrage, was not an Englishman. He had long been resident in England, but he wrote in Latin (c. 1534), and no translation of his work had been published in Shakespeare's time.

HERBERT THURSTON.

A Link with the Oxford Movement

On Sunday, April 18, prayers were asked throughout England for the repost of the soul of one of the "grand old men" of the English hierarchy, Bishop Wilkinson, of the northern Diocese of Hexham and Newcastle. He died on Saturday morning at Ushaw College in his eighty-fifth year. He had been ill since Christmas. His death breaks one of the few remaining links with the days of the "Second Spring" of Catholicity in England. He was one of the many converts who entered the Church in the twelve months after Newman's conversion. "I simply owe everything to Newman," he wrote, "to the 'Tracts for the Times,' and to the Puseyite movement generally." Bishop Wilkinson was a typical northern Englishman, born among the hills of Durham, where he passed most of his life. He was one of the five sons of George Hutton Wilkinson of Harperley Park, a successful and wealthy lawyer, who was for some time Recorder of Newcastle. Two of the sons became clergymen of the Established Church, another was a general in the army, and a fourth was an officer in the Royal Navy. Thomas Wilkinson, the second son and the future Catholic bishop, was born at Harperley Park, Durham, on April 5, 1825. He was educated at Harrow, and then, having decided to enter the ministry of the Church of England, became a student of the University of Durham, then mainly an organization for training clergymen for the northern dioceses of the Establishment.

These were the days of the Oxford movement. There was a stirring of men's hearts and minds such as there had not been in England for three hundred years. The old theories of Protestantism and the Reformation were falling to pieces. Men were asking themselves where was the Catholic Church of the Creed, and trying to find a way of satisfying themselves that the English Church, in which they had been born and baptized, was a branch of it, with secure links joining it not only to the Primitive Church of the Fathers, but to the Church of early days in England itself. No pious and thoughtful student in Durham could fail to think of that past, for Durham is the city of St. Cuthbert. Traditions of his miracles and his preaching still live among the country folk of the dales and hills around the magnificent cathedral, and in its Lady Chapel is the tomb of St. Bede, the historian and doctor of the Saxon Church. Young Thomas Wilkinson began to study the burning question of the moment and to doubt of his position. One day alone in the chapel he knelt by the tomb of Bede and prayed his first conditional prayer to a saint: "If you are a saint in heaven," he said, "and if you can hear men, and if the Roman Catholic religion is the true religion, help me to embrace it." His prayer was heard, but there were still two years before he saw his duty clearly and made the final step. He took his M.A. degree at Durham in 1844, and then went to St. Saviour's, Leeds, where, attached to the parish church, there was a small house of study built and founded by Dr. Pusey. The Rector of St. Saviour's presided over a community of half a dozen young men, all preparing for Anglican orders, and living under a rule drawn up by Pusey, a rule full of Catholic practices of piety. Then came news that first one, then another of the Oxford men had "gone over to Rome," and at last in October, 1845, that Newman himself had been received into the Church by Father Dominic the Passionist. Newman's conversion led to many more, and Thomas Wilkinson at Leeds was for months passing through the final trials that so often precede such a great change. He went to Oxford one day in 1846 to discuss the whole question with Pusey. The Anglican leader failed to solve his difficulties. He went back to Leeds, left St. Saviour's, sought out the Catholic priest, put himself under instruction and was received into the Church with two of his friends.

Then the work of his life began. He went to Oscott, where on December 23d, 1848, he was ordained a priest by Newman, and said his first Mass on Christmas Eve. In a letter written in November, 1900, he says: "After fifty-two years of priesthood I can only say that I hardly as yet realize the great mercy God has extended to me, in bringing me out of the darkness of Puseyite Protestantism into the glorious light of the One True Faith, and making me a loyal and loving subject of my Lord the Pope."

From Oscott, early in 1849, the young priest was sent to evangelize his native Durham. His first mission was at the village of Wolsingham, among the hills of the upper valley of the Wear, and not far from his old home at Harperley. A stable served as a school for thirty-five children. The hay-loft above it was his church. It was a reminder of the stable of Bethlehem. Here he worked for twelve years, and built at last schools and a fine church dedicated to the martyr St. Thomas of Canterbury, and with a congregation largely composed of his converts. He had a rugged, unadorned eloquence that came home to the plain spoken northern folk—farmers, herdsmen and miners, whom he told that he preached to them the faith of their fathers, the religion of Bede and Cuthbert. From Wolsingham he sent at his own expense six of his young men to serve in the Pontifical Army. He had already twice visited Rome, and zealous devotion to the Holy See was one of his characteristics. In 1861 he was transferred to the mission of Crook, where he spent fifteen years. In 1876 he had a severe illness and his health seemed to be permanently broken down. He had to resign his work at Crook and go to live for awhile in retirement on the estate of Thistleflat, a property he had inherited from his father. But as soon as the doctors would allow him he would go Sunday after Sunday to say Mass and preach, now in one, now in another, of the country churches in the county. He had been made a Canon at the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle in 1865. On the death of Bishop Bewick in 1886 he was chosen Vicar Capitular by his colleagues. His health was now completely restored, and Bishop Bewick's successor, Bishop O'Callaghan, appointed him his Vicar General and took him with him to Rome on his first visit ad limina. In July, 1888, Canon Wilkinson was made Coadjutor Bishop of Newcastle, and, on Dr. O'Callaghan resigning the see through ill health, he succeeded him in Christmas week, 1889.

One of his first acts was to organize and conduct a pilgrimage to St. Cuthbert's ruined Abbey of Lindisfarne on Holy Island, the cradle of Christianity for northern England. There, for the first time since the Reformation, Mass was said under the open sky, in the roofless church, the temporary altar being erected on the foundations of the old high altar. Beside the Bishop's throne stood a Papal Zouave in the gray uniform, the survivor of the little band he had sent to Rome from Wolsingham thirty years before. With his work as Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle he coupled the presidency of Ushaw College, which is the great Catholic centre for both lay and ecclesiastical studies in the north. Without departing from its old traditions he introduced into the college some of the best methods of his old school of Harrow. Last year he presided at the centenary celebrations at Ushaw. It was the last great act of his life, and the college chapel which he redecored and beautified for this occasion will be his monument.

Four years ago Canon Collins of Newcastle was chosen his coadjutor and consecrated by Archbishop Bourne. He will succeed him. More than sixty years of priesthood, and twenty years in the episcopate sum up the record of Bishop Wilkinson's life. He did a great work for the building up of the Catholic Church in the north, the part of England where, in the days of the Reformation, noble and peasant united in more than one brave fight for the old Faith, the land of St. Cuthbert and St. Bede, and of the "Pilgrimage of Grace," consecrated by the blood of countless martyrs, of most of whose names only Heaven keeps the record.

The Real Luther*

II—(Concluded)

All scholars acknowledged that Denifle was an authority, who in his superlative command of his specialized and chosen field, stood without a peer. His mastery of Scholasticism and Mysticism was unimpeachable. His admitted supremacy in the field of medievalism made him a last court of appeal. His historical rectitude was inflexible and unwavering. His stupendous knowledge of ancient and medieval manuscripts gave him a superiority that no one questioned, and was fittingly acknowledged by the academic honors and diplomas heaped upon him by universities and learned societies throughout Europe. Now he stakes the prestige of his reputation, the enormous acquirements of his knowledge, to prove that Luther either misled his followers or misunderstood himself, that his knowledge of Scholasticism is a mere caricature, that in the deeper science of Mysticism he is a blundering tyro, and that he, as well as his champions, was perpetuating a huge falsehood. That falsehood he would demolish, not merely refute.

In his eyes the ailment was beyond the reach of tonics and palliatives. Inveterate disease demands drastic remedy. Putrescent tumors and gangrened sores, to be cured radically, call for the surgeon's scalpel or mordant caustic, and not dulling sedatives or stupefying opiates. He proposes to attack this centuries ailment. In his warfare he will be open and aboveboard; no surprise, no strategy. He enters the field, as he himself tells us, "with an open visor and scientific ammunition"; he "was compelled to attack violently in order to compel Protestant theologians to a declaration"; his "object was to pierce the Reformer to the very heart." "Los-von-Rom" is met by "Los-von-Luther." It was as Harnack says "a declaration of war." Preciousness of language, sentimentality of thought, rhetorical rant were to be met with triphammer ruggedness of speech, punctilious regard for truth and the encyclopedic resourcefulness of Denifle. Nor was he perturbed when he saw himself confronted by the intellectual mind of Germany. Harnack (whose "Monasticism; Its Ideals and History" is beaten to a veritable pulp) and Seeberg, of Berlin; Hausleiter, of Greifswald; Loesch, of Vienna; Walther, of Rostock; Kolde and Fester, of Erlangen; Köhler, of Giessen; Kawerau, of Breslau; Hausrath, of Heidelberg; Baumann, of Göttingen—all assailed the vehement Dominican, only to provoke renewed scourgings, and make their arguments shrivel up under a more concentrated corrosive criticism.

We admit that this tone of raging violence and misanthropic bitterness may detract from the literary merit of the book, may even impair its general usefulness and popularity. But it certainly does not deprive it of its inherent worth. The shell may be unsightly, but the kernel is nutritious. The value of the diamond is only secondarily in its setting. The act of Our Lord driving the money changers out of the Temple was hardly characterized by our most approved modern philanthropic methods, nor can His denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees be sounded by the plummet of Chesterfieldian verbal nicety. "Absolute, peremptory facts are bullies," says the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, "and those who keep company with them are apt to get a bullying habit of mind." The object of reading history is truth, not the cultivation of style. There is more than a substratum of truth in Augustine Birrell's epigram on historians: "unless they have good styles they are so hard to read, and if they have good styles they are so apt to lie." True, Denifle softened the irascible tone in the second edition, he even eliminated an entire chapter dealing with some speculative physiognomic reflections. The inclusion or exclusion of both, however, in no way affect the main thesis. Its truth remains serenely radiant.

It is a credit to German scholarship, that though it had a rude awakening and winced under many a smart thrust and was routed in its own defense, it nevertheless did not hesitate to pay its tribute to the marvelous care, almost faultless accuracy and supreme command of his materials, with which the work was done. The editors of the great Weimar edition of Luther's complete work ("Kritische Gesamtausgabe") in which Denifle picked sufficient flaws to shake confidence in all its past volumes, and to cast doubt on future additions should, according to Professor Merkle, "have thanked the Dominican for doing so much of their colossal work in so short a time." Professor Kawerau, admittedly the greatest of Protestant Lutheran specialists, who is a frequent sufferer from his animadversions, admits the results of Denifle's critical researches, "a fact that is a lasting credit to his character and knowledge," and frankly confesses his indebtedness for the "fulness of most valuable information gleaned from his incomparable familiarity with ancient and medieval literature," and goes still further by declaring that the "superbly erudite Denifle reveals himself on almost every page, and that in many details our Luther researches will profit by the acquisition of many valuable contributions." To Professor Köhler "Denifle's book proves how much we have yet to learn, and shames us by a series of most pregnant observations." To the Deutsche Literaturzeitung "Denifle's work in its dogmatic historical appraisement of Luther takes such a step in advance that Protestant theologians cannot fail to acknowledge it, as soon as they have mastered the irritation caused by the violent tone of the Tyrolese." And what must be our thoughts, when a critic of "Die Reformation," in the Literary Supplement, calls the work "an evidence of Denifle's astounding erudition," and with a candor that fairly takes our breath away, confesses: "There is no doubt that Denifle has proved that Luther was in error when he claims that the early theologians almost without exception understood Justitia Dei (Rom. I, 17) in the sense of divine wrath, and had no conception of Justification!"

While the second volume of Denifle's great work was still in preparation, and while on his way to England to receive the honorary doctorate from Cambridge University, which by the way, in the formula of its proposed presentation, singled out his Luther study as especially worthy of commendation, he died suddenly on June 10, 1905, at Munich, in his sixty-first year. He was buried on the twelfth; his degree was to be conferred on the fourteenth of the same month.

The second volume, just published, comes from the hands of his co-laborer and fellow Dominican, Weiss, an experienced scholar, who has not only edited the second edition of the first volume, but has enriched the literature of the subject by an original work—"Lutherpsychologie als Schlüssel zur Lutherlegende," which has already seen its second edition.

The tone of the present volume is less aggressive in attack, more tranquil in tone, in part brilliantly written. The immense collection of Denifle was too bulky and voluminous to sift or assimilate, but it is promised in a huge supplementary volume giving a contemporary survey of the moral, intellectual and social conditions that led to the Reformation. New material he did not seek, for the reason that the material already on hand was too unwieldy to admit of proper compilation or condensation. Reaffirming the dictum of Denifle, that no theologian or historian is qualified to write about Luther unless he is intimately acquainted and thoroughly familiar with the life, thought and genius of the Middle Ages, Scholasticism and Mysticism, he proceeds to the development of the thesis to which he devotes the volume: that the Reformation is not the outcome of one individual or nation, but the resultant product of the anti-ecclesiastical spirit and destructive teachings of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Students of Gairdner's "Lollardy and the Reformation in England" just published, will be struck by the author's genesis of the Reformation in Germany. The analogy is most striking; the diagnosis almost identical; the symptoms and causes not dissimilar; the ground covered practically the same, with only a slight change of conditions, and these more national and racial than theological or historical. Luther's was no creative mind. The element of constructiveness was lacking in him, a lack seldom noticed, for Melanchthon, his alter ego, had it in an eminent degree. Not a doctrine can be ascribed to Luther, the source of which cannot be traced elsewhere. Does not Barge, in his two volumes "Life of Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt," at this very moment, charge Luther with stealing his clients' innovations and doctrines? Lutheranism in its essential parts was in existence before Luther. The reform movement made him, not he the reform movement. Weiss answers this question with an outlay of historical knowledge, a luminous power of exposition, that will no doubt make this second a fit companion to Denifle's more exhaustive first volume, and the whole work one that must for the future be reckoned with in writing the history of Luther and Lutheranism.

Workingmen's Retreats in Belgium

Readers of René Bazin's novel, "The Coming Harvest" (Scribner's), were without doubt surprised at the outcome of the plot. To bring a militant socialist, who had passed through all the degrees of illusion and disillusion, to find a remedy for his unhappiness and discontent in the religious quiet of a retreat was certainly a variant of the ordinary ending of novels. It was thus that Gilbert Cloquet was converted, and the purpose of the novelist has since been declared to have been to make known the Jesuit Houses of Retreat, and thus raise up others elsewhere to spread the immense good they have been doing for many years in Belgium. The power for good, Bazin has described so vividly, had merited a very eulogistic letter of Pius X, who wrote in 1904 to R. P. Criquelon, Superior of Xhovémont, that in his great work of restoring all things in Christ he trusted greatly to the Exercises of St. Ignatius made by workingmen and their employers. And the Holy Father added that, in his view, no method of securing the salvation of souls would compare with this of retreats. This letter voiced the feelings of the Belgian Episcopate, which had been frequently expressed before. Bishop Waffelaert of Bruges, Bishop du Rousseaux of Tournai, and Bishop Heylen of Namur, had especially taken the work under their protection and forwarded it by every means in their power. Even more eloquent are the 80,000 men and 66,000 women of the working class, who since 1891 have passed through the Houses of Retreat at Fayt-les-Manage, Ghent, Arlon, Lierre, Liège and Alken. And not less so the 17,000 members of the employing or capital class, who have made retreats since 1865 at Tronchiennes. When to these is added the really remarkable number of those who have made retreats in other houses than those just mentioned, one is prepared for the fact that at present in Belgium there are more than 10,000 men and 14,000 or 15,000 women and girls of the working class who yearly pass three days in making the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius in twenty-two houses set apart for this purpose. Bazin had reason to call his book "The Coming Harvest," in presence of such an army of Apostles.

This fruitful work was begun, in 1890, among the miners of Hainaut, saturated with socialism, whose revolutionary spirit showed itself so strongly in the strikes of 1886. In that year P. Lechien got together, with the aid of a social studies' club, some fifteen employers and forty-two workmen. The next year there were 127 workingmen—glass-workers, miners and foundry-hands—and among them were twenty-seven Knights of Labor, which is the Belgian expression of the most advanced Socialism. The opposition that accompanies every good work was not wanting. The Socialist enemies of the retreat massed in such force that the retreatants entered the college through files of police; Socialist newspapers threatened a strike, and announced angrily that they awaited only the end of the retreat to undo what the Jesuits had done. But it was rather God and "the men of a new sort and all of one kind," as one of them put it, with whom they had to deal. The next year saw the opening of "The House of Our Lady of Work" at Fayt-les-Manage, the first house set aside exclusively for the purpose of retreats, and since then it has entertained more than 25,000 workmen who have left their factories and their mines and gone there to meditate and pray for three days. The calm holy peace that pervades the place is the greatest possible contrast to the clanging foundries and roaring furnaces. Even more so is one struck by the serious groups of men reading the "Imitation of Christ" together in the shaded walks, or weeping alone in the chapel. Since the organized beginning at Fayt other houses of retreat have been opened in different parts of the country, so that now there is at least one in the immediate vicinity of every industrial center.

One of the heads of the Socialist body remarked that nothing was to be feared from Catholic action. "There was," he said, "a void between the preachers of the Word and the people; there were no middlemen to fill this void, and so no results could be possible." The partial truth that these remarks contain was emphasized by Bishop Rutten of Liège in a letter to the Clergy, in which he insisted on the necessity of co-operation to bring back efficaciously the indifferent and the straggling. To assure this lay co-operation, the help of these lay apostles, is the purpose of the retreats. The work of persuasion that present social conditions, and often his vocation itself, make difficult or impossible for a priest, is easy for workingman among workingmen. He speaks their language, lives their lives, has the same hopes and difficulties. He may go, by right of bearing the same burden, where and in a way that the priest may find at times impossible. The houses of retreat hoped to form these lay workers to assist the priest in building up the moral life of our Lord's Church; and they have succeeded beyond all expectation. In a word there is now, in very many parishes of Belgium, a body of lay apostles who work under and with their priest with a success that would, I think, astonish us if it were fully known. Success demands exact organization

Political Situation in Italy

ROME, APRIL 7.

The results have justified my horoscope of the political situation of the Italian ministry, which the Radicals claimed to have beaten. It took only a week to convince the most incredulous that the Prime Minister is as much master of the present chamber as he was of the former one; and that a dozen more rabid Socialists have little influence on the chamber's policy, which remains as before with perhaps an added touch of democracy. The debate on the reply to the King's speech bordered closely on incivility. It was clear from the opening speeches that the Socialists were trying to bring up the question of anti-Clericalism and trap the government into a statement thereon. But the game was spoiled by a Catholic Deputy, Cameroni, in a brilliant speech, which won the applause of all the Constitutionalists. There was much excitement, and abuse was hurled by the Extreme Left against the Catholics who it is well known intend to stand up against the Socialists all along the line. The Socialists strove to play the bully, and mistook insolence for strength. Even his opponents had to admit the adroitness of the reply of the President of the Council. He performed a flank movement on the Socialists, and asked for a vote of confidence, and his majority was greater than he could have hoped for. A second vote on the import and export of grain gave him even a greater majority, and to-day he goes to Cavour, Turin, to spend the holidays with his family.

Before going, however, he fulfilled two important duties. First he announced the eighteen new Senators who in Italy are the free choice of the King. In this also he was in most happy vein. His strength permitted him to be generous; and for the first time in Italian politics we had the experience of a President of the Council advancing to Senatorial rank five men opposed to him in politics. A significant omission from the list is that of the name of the masonic Syndic of Rome, a supporter of the bloc, Nathan, who felt sure of election to the Senate. It may be the beginning of a new era in the relations between the Quirinal and the Capitol. In any case the Quirinal can hardly have been flattered at the way in which the Syndic, formerly Grand-Master of the Freemasons, tolerated the insults recently hurled at the monarchy in the Capitol. But it is much too soon to risk a conclusion in dealing with such matters. At all events the fact itself has greatly pleased all real lovers of liberty. Another incident was the sudden and unexpected resignation of the Minister of War, Casana of Turin, the first civil minister to hold such a position in the new Kingdom of Italy. The cause of his resignation seems to have been a difference of view from that of the President of the Council and the Treasurer of State as to the military budget. It is likely also there is on foot a much needed reform of the army corps. Casana is succeeded by General Spingardi, a full-blooded Piedmontese. The position he is called to fill is by no means an easy one. Time will say whether he improves it. In politics prophecy is difficult.

The school question in Canada is a matter of concern at the Vatican just now. Between 1890 and 1897 the Catholics of Manitoba claimed for their province the right to have separate schools as guaranteed them by the Constitution. In their struggle they were ably led by Mgr. Begin, at present Archbishop of Quebec; but the fight was lost, although Leo XIII, in the Encyclical "Affari Vos," addressed to the Canadian Bishops, condemned the Government school regulations which made the schools nominally neutral, but really atheistic. Official promises made to Rome had not been kept, and in 1905 the question took on a new phase in the Province of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which has by law a right to Catholic schools. But Government opportunism prevailed over Catholic rights, and once more the neutral school system has conquered. The fault does not lie with the episcopate. As I write, a new struggle on the school question has arisen at Keewatun on the occasion of its being annexed by the province of Manitoba. The Catholics are asking whether they are to retain their schools, or whether these are to be neutralized. Public opinion is greatly excited; and it is not easy to account for the attitude of a section of the Catholic press, which merely relates the occurrence, and says nothing further about it. Perhaps the Virus liberale has infected them. Certainly the attitude of the Bishops has not changed; and on the eve of the convening of the first National Canadian Council they cannot fail to take up arms for the defence of the Christian freedom of a people hitherto sincerely Christian, but now a prey to the wiles and snares of an underhand Liberalism. L'EREMITE.

Centenary of St. Anselm

LONDON, APRIL 21, 1909.

This day eight hundred years ago, St. Anselm went to his reward. If ever there was a man who might be taken as the ideal type of a Catholic prelate, it was Anselm of Aosta. A monk and an abbot, he chose for himself the life of the evangelical counsels, which the men of the Reformation denounced as superstitious follies. When he left his abbey of Bec to become Archbishop of Canterbury in the days of William Rufus, he was the fearless champion of the rights of the Church and of the Holy See against those very claims of State supremacy which were in later years the keynote of the English Reformation, and are to-day primary principles of the Established Church of England. He was one of the founders of scholastic theology, and the two devotions of his life were to the Sacramental Presence of Our Lord in the Holy Eucharist, and to the Blessed Mother of God, the feast of whose Immaculate Conception he was the first to celebrate solemnly in the West. Is it not strange, then, to hear of the memory of such a man being commemorated this morning by a solemn service at Canterbury Cathedral, presided over by Dr. Davidson, the Protestant Primate of the State Church? One wonders what has become of the old fashioned British common-sense when such a violation of all consistency is possible. There is to be a "choral communion" in St. Anselm's chapel. This means in plain English that there is to be a celebration, with the chanting of anthems, of the "Lord's Supper" as directed in the Book of Common Prayer, with its rubrics warning all against the very doctrine of the Sacramental Presence which St. Anselm regarded as a central fact of Christianity. It will take place in the chapel of his cathedral, which he dedicated to Sts. Peter and Paul in testimony of his devotion to the Holy See. The chapel came to be called by his name because his relics were for centuries enshrined beneath its altar, till the men of the Reformation destroyed both altar and shrine. Then there is to be an address on St. Anselm by Dr. Davidson. What will he say? He holds possession of St. Anselm's Cathedral of Canterbury in virtue only of that very State supremacy against which the saint's whole episcopate was a living and continuous protest and which he regarded as a criminal and sacrilegious usurpation. In the light of history this Canterbury celebration is only reasonable and fitting if we start with the assumption that there is no real difference between black and white, no contradiction between yea and nay.

Far different was the celebration at which I have just been present in Westminster Cathedral. There we felt that there were no contradictions, no fictions, but the great reality. The central rite was the same Holy Sacrifice that Anselm offered day by day. In the presiding prelate we recognized the rightful successor of St. Anselm, like him Primate of the Catholic Church in England, not by the warrant of the State, but by the authority of the Holy See.

Outside the Cathedral on the great piers that support the arch of the main entrance, there are large medallions carved in stone of the sainted archbishops of the Church in England. The medallion of St. Anselm was beautifully decorated. It was encircled with a laurel wreath and garlands of laurel on the pillar shafts on either side of it. Above was a white tablet with the inscription in red letters, "ST. ANSELM, A. D. 1109." Below the medallion the arms of the See of Canterbury were worked in flowers, the white pallium on a purple shield. Then there was a mass of green foliage and flowers of the papal colors—white and yellow.

St. Anselm's first great battle was over the reception of the pallium, the badge of his authority as archbishop. The Red King tried to persuade the Pope to send it to him to be conferred by Royal authority on an archbishop of his own choice. St. Urban sent it direct to Anselm, who received it from the hands of the Papal Legate at Canterbury on the day of his first great triumph. Strangely enough the Protestant Archbishops of Canterbury still use the old Catholic arms of the See, the pallium, the badge of authority derived from Rome, the consecrated badge received from the successors of St. Peter by every archbishop till the Reformation. But to-day we felt the difference between traditional sham and living reality, as at the beginning of the High Mass the procession made its way through the kneeling crowds in the vast cathedral. After the long array of acolytes, clergy, canons and bishops came the Primate of Catholic England, and over his vestments hung the white pallium with its black crosses, the same visible sign of his authority from Rome that Anselm received at the high altar of Canterbury from the hands of the Legate more than eight hundred years ago.

Eight of the bishops of England were present with their Metropolitan in the sanctuary of the cathedral to-day. They were the Bishops of Southwark, Birmingham, Liverpool, Salford, Shrewsbury, Northampton, Plymouth and Portsmouth. The Bishops of Menevia and of Middlesbrough are in Rome, where they went to represent the English episcopate at the beatification of Blessed Joan of Arc. The other bishops are at Ushaw College to-day, assisting at the funeral of Bishop Wilkinson of Hexham and Newcastle.

The Archbishop was the celebrant of the High Mass. The sermon was preached by Mgr Moyes, from the text "An obedient man shall speak of victories." "In the long roll of our Archbishops," he said, "who governed the Church in this land during the thousand years from the coming of St. Augustine to the Reformation, St.

Anselm was one of the holiest, the most learned and the most brave—the one whom God raised up in the hour of need to be the dauntless champion of Church liberty and of Papal authority in England. In that illustrious succession we have scholars like Lanfranc and saints like Edmund Rich and defenders of the Church like Thomas à Becket. But in Anselm we have combined the glory of all three, and he stands forth in the vista of our Catholic past as the saintly religious, the great intellectual thinker, and the valiant archbishop, who, amid the dangers and difficulties of his day, fought and won the battle of the Church's freedom."

Then he told the story of Anselm's life, of his two conflicts, with William Rufus over the question of the pallium and with Henry I over that of investitures. He read from Eadmer's "Chronicle" the speech of Anselm at the Conference of Rockingham, when his more timid colleagues would have bowed to the pretensions of Rufus, and the Archbishop, "with kindling countenance and deep earnest voice" said to them: "Seeing that you, who are the pastors of the Christian flock, and you who are called the chiefs of the people, are unwilling to give to me, your father, any counsel except according to the pleasure of one man, I will have recourse to the Chief Pastor, to the Lord of all, to the Angel of Great Counsel, and in this cause, which is that of Him and of His Church, I will follow the counsel which I shall receive from Him. He says to the most blessed Peter, Prince of the Apostles, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and to thee will I give the key of the Kingdom of Heaven,' and to all the Apostles in common, 'He that heareth you, heareth Me, and he that despiseth you despiseth Me,' and 'He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of My eye.' Even as we receive these things as said primarily to Blessed Peter and in him to the other Apostles, so we hold them to apply primarily to the successor of St. Peter and through him to the other Bishops who take the place of the Apostles. They do not apply to any emperor, to any king, to any duke, to any count. But in what we owe subjection and service to earthly princes the same Angel of Great Counsel teaches us and instructs up when he says, 'Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. These are the words and these are the counsels of God. These I stand by, these I accept, and from these I will never depart. Wherefore know all of you that in the things that are of God I will render obedience to the successor of St. Peter; and in those things which rightly pertain to the earthly dignity of my lord the King I will render him faithfully counsel and help to the best of my knowledge and power."

"Here," continued Mgr Moyes, "we have a remarkably clear statement of the Catholic doctrine of the Two Powers, of the independence of the Spiritual Power and of the Divine Institution and right of the Papacy. These were the principles for which Anselm fought. Had England at a later crisis been faithful to his teaching we should be keeping this centenary to-day in his own cathedral of Canterbury."

He went on to tell of his triumph, and then to point out a practical lesson. If we are to convert England, he argued, it will be by living ourselves lives worthy of the saints, and cultivating in our own souls the interior life of union with God. Anselm became Archbishop in his sixtieth year, and most of those years, before he came to Canterbury, he had spent in the Abbey of Bec, growing in holiness, in self-conquest, in union with God. Thence came his strength. Ours, too, must come from a vigorous Catholic life. We have the same means of grace he had. For us past and present are one continuous reality—"we need no petty pageantry to call up the part of our Church, for it lives on in the realities of the present, in our doctrines, our liturgy, our worship, our union with the See of Peter. Our Catholic past is vitally and inseparably with us in our Catholic present, and with us not in the hollowness of any mere make-believe stage scenery or apparel, but in the palpitating reality of our Catholic life centering in the August Sacrifice of our Altars—the sacrifice of the Lamb slain before the beginning of the world."

It was a sermon worthy of the great occasion. After the Mass a special message from the Holy Father was read, giving his blessing to all present. In the afternoon the celebration of the centenary was concluded with solemn Vespers, Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament and the Te Deum. A.

Corsica's Undeveloped Resources

With her zone of mountains gracefully standing out against the sky, her infinite horizons, her beautiful effects of light, Corsica, backed by the blue waves of the Tyrrhenian Sea, is one of the most charming islands in the Mediterranean. Endowed with a fertile soil and a climate like that of northern Europe on the hills, and that of Algeria in the plains, inhabited by an energetic race, hard-working, clever and enterprising, it would seem that the people of the country ought to be happy; yet, during all her history, with the exception of a few short periods, are but a long series of sorrows and lamentations.

Without going as far back as the Carthaginian and Roman epochs, we know she was traversed by the barbarian hordes, especially the Vandals at the time of the fall of the Empire. Afterwards she was invaded by the Saracens. The head of a Moor which figures in the middle of her ancient flag is probably in memory of her struggles against the Saracen. We know Pisa gave Corsica one of the few bright periods in her history. The beginnings of the Genoese dominion were also flourishing, but for reasons of which we shall not speak here, Corsica, after some time found that yoke oppressive and rebelled against the Serene Republic, in the same way and in the same century that the American colonists rose against England. Corsica fought against Genoa from 1729 to 1768 to gain her independence. The name of General Paoli predominates during the second part of that period, but Paoli was doomed to failure in the struggle, with his feeble contingents, badly armed, isolated and reduced to their own resources. Those heroes fought boldly for their freedom, and by their noble failure were worthy to join hands with their conquerors.

Since that time, Corsica has remained French, and has given her loyal heart to her new governors. Unceasingly she has given France proofs of her devotion and shed her blood on every field of battle where her flag has floated. Corsica has enriched France with men of the greatest valor in all branches of human activity, she gave her even an emperor, the greatest genius of modern times, and a dynasty. However, Corsica still complains, and now-a-days the Corsican newspapers, as well as several important ones on the continent, declare she is justified in complaining that she is forsaken by France. The "Isle of Beauty," as some writers say, seems to be the "unfortunate island."

The French government itself has grown anxious about the situation. Last September, M. Clémenceau addressed a report to the President of the Republic, treating of the economical, financial and administrative situation of Corsica. In consequence the Cabinet Council named a Commission to inquire into means for assuring the better working of public services and developing the economical resources of the island. A sub-commission was sent to Corsica, and the reports should have been handed in after a delay of three months. In October, 1908, the sub-commission visited the island and heard the grievances of the prominent men, the general counsellors, the mayors of the principal towns, the representatives of Bastia's chamber of commerce, the presidents of the syndicates of initiative, etc. It was agreed that the chief causes which prevent the economical growth of the island are: malaria, the insufficiency of ways of transport, the demands of the steamship company which undertakes the passenger service, the ignorance of those charged with the new agricultural works, and the difficulty of sending out the agricultural products. The insalubrity of the eastern coast is the result of negligence, as that plain should be of unmatched fertility, and was not always unhealthy. Formerly there were in that region important towns such as Aleria and Mariana. In Italy the fens of Tuscany have been drained, and money is spent in abundance for the cultivation of Sardinia. In France "les Dombes" and "la Sologne" have been purified. Why is not the same thing done for Corsica? A little has been done, but the principal part is still undone.

Owing to the small postal subsidies, which are only 550,000 francs ($111,000), there is only a single steamship company (Frassinetti and Co.) of Marseilles, engaged in the passenger traffic. With the exception of two, all the trips of the boats of this company are very long, and the traders are dissatisfied because the cost of land transport is again increased by the shipping and unloading charges in the ports. However, the company has built new steamers, which are quite comfortable.

The railway, chartered in 1889, extends from Bastia to Ajaccio, with branch lines to Calvi. From every side come requests for the completion of the line in order to establish communication with the north of the island. For the past few weeks a motor-car service has been in operation. We owe this to the initiative of the Mayor of Bonifacio and of an important merchant in Bastia.

As M. Clémenceau says, "Corsica is essentially an agricultural country and could furnish all sorts of produce: wheat, wine and oranges; there are vast forests of chestnuts, beeches and oaks (and we may add the pine on the central plateau, and the olive-trees half way up the hills). In short, all the productions of all the zones from the coast to the highest mountain." Agricultural schools should be established on several points of the island to keep up with modern progress. The merchant service should have better ways of transporting the products of the soil which are perishable, and the tolls in Marseilles should be reduced.

But the principal hindrance to the economical progress of Corsica is a moral one. Corsica is stricken by a mania for politics. All her energies are turned in that direction. Works of private initiative and general interest are forgotten; men look only to the government in order to obtain for themselves all it can give. They hope for all from the senator or deputy who must work for them alone. The different Republican Cabinets which have succeeded each other have only increased this deplorable state of affairs. The Corsicans are slaves of a government which has no regard for their religion or prosperity.

Unequal School Appropriations

The results of a special investigation instituted by the Commission of Industrial Education in the State of Massachusetts during last year, suggest some practical conclusions. It was learned through the Commission's inquiries that of the 49,201 pupils in the four highest grades in the thirty-six largest cities, more than 11,000 expect to leave school during the grammar course or at its end. The parents of such pupils in four of the manufacturing centres of the state were asked personally whether they favored the opening of local industrial schools. More than nine in every ten of 6,829 family heads, representing nearly 10,000 children of industrial school age, answered affirmatively.

There has been for years a growing opposition among "the plain people" to the heavy increase in school appropriations because of the tendency to extravagant expenditure in high school departments. A multiplying of courses, and, in consequence, of professorships, makes our high school programs read more like the announcement of a flourishing university, and the expense account is fattened accordingly.

Meantime the children of the people who pay the bulk of the school-tax find it difficult to devote the eight years to school work which present day programs assign to the grammar grades. In old days there was a disposition to give to those who otherwise would not have the opportunity, that thorough common-school training recognized as needed in a democratic country like our own. The cultural training of higher faculties was left to those whose aspirations led them to seek it, and whose means made the seeking possible. School taxes, in consequence, did not bear so heavily upon the poorer classes, and the return for the expense was worth the while, since the public schools taught what the public wanted.

Might it not be well for us to profit by the homely common-sense attitude of earlier days and to lessen the burden of taxation resting upon the poor by cutting the appropriation for public-school purposes? The immense sums expended in favor of departments whose advantages because of economic conditions, the majority of the people cannot enjoy, might well be spared. And if, as sometimes is argued, the American people will never agree to any suggestion of parsimony in reference to its public school system, might not at least a greater sense of justice be manifested towards them in appreciation of their stand?

Why not dispose the school appropriations with especial intent to build up the grammar departments, multiply grammar schools and perfect their equipment to the last degree? Then, too, as the report quoted above shows, there is a growing sentiment on the part of the people in favor of manual and industrial training in grade schools. Why not foster a sentiment undoubtedly healthy and give to the poor the benefit of the heavy burden of tax they carry by developing the facilities for such training? The children of the poor will thus receive a juster meed of consideration, and the advantages held out to them during the few years of school training their poverty allows, will tend to form in them qualities of skilled artisanship such as are the pride of the working classes in other lands.

Impartiality with Bias

The selections on the beatification of Jeanne d'Arc in the Literary Digest of May 1, contain a few garbled extracts from an article of Rev. M. Kenny, S.J., in the Brooklyn Eagle, to which paper by the way credit is not given. Torn from the context, the phrases suggest the idea that their author was surprised or shocked at the whole beatification process. Not to destroy this impression a longer passage from the same article is attributed to "a writer in the Freemen's Journal," though that paper in copying Father Kenny's article had made proper acknowledgement. The Digest makes no citation to indicate the true attitude of the Church towards the Maid from the beginning, or to show that the court which condemned her without any authorization of the Church, had also denied her appeal to Church and Pope. But having impressed its readers with due sense of its impartiality in citing apparently two Catholic authorities, the road is open to the enemy's camp. The Protestant press and Protestant authors generally have paid generous tribute to the Blessed Maid of France, but the Digest prefers to glean from the Christian Observer a paragraph, of which this is the characteristic note: "The same Catholic Church whose ecclesiastical court condemned her to death has beatified her and canonized her as a saint. . . . How then can the witch and heretic of 500 years ago be a saint to-day?" and so on. Many non-Catholic papers contain the answer to this calumny, but the Digest chooses to print it is unchallenged. The Springfield Republican is allowed to depict France's reverence for Blessed Jeanne, but over against this citation is set up a print of her beautiful statue at Rouen with this inscription supplied by the Digest: "Expressing possibly the moment of abjuration," thus conveying the impression that the oft-refuted "abjuration" is an accepted historical fact. "The devil can cite Scripture to his purpose": the Digest's gleaner cites newspapers.

Austria a Triple Monarchy?

Hungarians, Slavs and Germans in the dual Monarchy are debating the question whether Bosnia-Herzegovina is to become a province of the united monarchy or of one of its parts. The Hungarians think the new territory ought to be annexed to the Kingdom of Hungary. The Slavs in Croatia and Slavonia advocate the formation of a separate Slav Kingdom consisting of those two countries and Bosnia. Thus the dual Monarchy would be changed to a triple Monarchy. The Germans in Austria are divided. Some favor the triple Monarchy; others would prefer to see Bosnia a province of the entire empire, in the same position which Alsace-Lorraine holds in the German Empire: they want Bosnia to be an Austrian "Reichsland." In what way the question will finally be settled, it is impossible to tell, but to judge its merits, it will be well to bear in mind the following considerations.

As to the "historical rights" to Bosnia, claimed by several parties, one must recall a few items of history. In the second half of the sixth century the Slav tribes settled in the northeastern territories of the Balkan peninsula. They were called Serbs in the eastern portion of the occupied districts and Croats in the western. Bosnia occupies a central position. When, in 1054, the Greek Church fell away from Rome and Servia with the adjoining part of Bosnia followed, the Croats and the other half of Bosnia remained Roman Catholics, though several sects made fearful inroads among them and at times broke up the connection with the Apostolic See.

After the settlement of the country, Bosnia was for some centuries in a relation of varying dependence to the Greek Empire of Constantinople, and to Croatia or Servia. In 1102, Bosnia was conquered by Koloman, King of Hungary, and became a province, though it always enjoyed a certain degree of independence and never gave up the struggle for complete freedom. During short intervals these endeavors were crowned with success. King Stephen Turtko, whose realm included Croatia and Servia and the whole country as far as the Adriatic, was the most powerful Slav ruler during the Middle-Ages. He died in 1392. A line of six Bosnian kings followed him, but they soon fell again into subjection to Hungary. In the fifteenth century the Turks took possession of the south, in the sixteenth of the north of Bosnia, and kept it until 1878. Only for the short period between 1718 and 1739 northern Bosnia was under Austria. Herzegovina had been successively under Constantinople, Croatia, Servia, and at times under Hungary. Since 1325 it has been united with Bosnia and shared the fate of that country. In 1878 Austria undertook the administration of the revolutionized provinces, which since that date have made giant strides on the road of civilization and Christianity. (See "The Catholic Encyclopedia," under "Bosnia" and "Bogomili.")

Can any "historical rights" be deduced from these facts? Hardly. The country has been under foreign rulers as long as there has been a Bosnia. If the question is asked who has been her greatest benefactor there can be but one answer: The Austrian Monarchy.

The just and prudent determination of Bosnia's legal status should contribute not only to the domestic peace of Austria, but to the tranquillity of Europe as well.

Czech Movement in Austria

On the language question which has been agitating the country, the Czech politicians are ready to yield in some points. One of their foremost members of Parliament says in the Hlas: "It is indeed time for us to adopt new methods. If we go to Vienna at all, we must not play the rôle of lookers-on, much less of eternal fault-finders and disturbers. If we wish to secure for our people benefits, political, national and economic, we must either work with the central government and not become mere obstructionists, or we should proclaim that no Czech ought to accept any position in the central government at all." Some weeks ago the Czech representatives refused to discuss the language laws in the common Parliament, because they said these laws concerned Bohemia alone. Now the Pozor, one of the most ardent exponents of the Czech position, says: "It would be a mistake if Parliament were prevented from debating the language laws. Debate will afford a good opportunity to study the language question for all countries within the empire. It will then be seen that it is impossible to legislate for Bohemia alone without taking in the other countries. We shall also find out what stand the Germans will take when the funeral bell is sounded to official German in other parts of Austria."

A Service to Real Charity

The Right Reverend Bishop of Trenton has issued a circular letter to his clergy, warning them against professional beggars and members of charity organizations, who go about appealing for money in the cause of religion. He states that men and women, clothed as priests, brothers and sisters, travel about, imposing upon a charitable public. He insists that the clergy should warn their people against such impostors, and against itinerant peddlers and agents who have not the sanction of the rector of the locality in which sales are demanded. All charitable appeals from outside the diocese, His Lordship says, must have the sanction of the Ordinary of the respective institutions for which they are made, and those engaged in the work must present proper letters, setting forth the character and the need of the charitable object for which they intend to collect. The Right Reverend Bishop is, in all this, only repeating what other prelates have done, from time to time, in order to protect not only Catholics, but many charitable non-Catholics from imposture and fraud. No one can accuse the bishops or clergy of any of our prosperous dioceses of refusing aid to deserving applicants or of preventing solicitors from their dioceses from access to their congregations. On the contrary, through the recommendation of our Church authorities, extraordinary amounts of money are obtained for churches and institutions in needy dioceses, and this fact is too frequently overlooked when statisticians express surprise at what they deem the small amounts given to foreign missions by Catholics in America, in comparison with Catholics in older countries.

Bishop McFaul has done a service to the cause of real charity by his letter, and it will no doubt stimulate the generosity of well disposed Catholics, to know that what they give will be turned to the best account.

What the Pope Did Not Say

Pius X did not say in a recent audience that woman is inferior to man. Neither did he say that women should not, under any circumstances, have the franchise. Much less did he say that her duties are confined strictly within the household. On the contrary, he declared that she was man's companion, helpmeet, and consolation, and this implies equality, if not identity, of gifts and of rights. He believes, and says that woman, acting as companion to man, must be under his authority, but under an authority of love and affection, not of despotism. It surely does not imply inferiority of nature or of character, or of personal gifts and rights, to submit to another's authority; otherwise officials of a state or of any society would need to possess natural or personal gifts and rights different from those who acknowledged their authority. Pius X would safeguard Catholic women of Italy, whom he was addressing, from the baneful principles of Socialism, which create confusion between equality and identity of rights. Woman, according to him, has a great social mission; a place in every charitable cause; work to do for the sick, the suffering, and the criminal; a responsibility for the protection of women and children. What broader or higher mission could one ambition?

Church and State in Switzerland

The movement which aims at the separation of Church and State in Switzerland, has up to the present affected two cantons, Geneva and Basle, the former on the French boundary, the latter on that of Germany. The proximity of France to Geneva has manifestly influenced the religio-political views of the Genevese electorate, but although the result has been a separation of the political and religious powers in Geneva, it has not degenerated into illegal persecution. In Geneva the Catholic Church has stood for the principle of religious equality ever since her rights were snatched from her by the State, the professed protector and financial stay of the Old-Catholics. Under the new state of things the condition of this sect, which for the first time must support itself, is to say the least, precarious. Even with State support, it was rapidly disappearing. In the seventies of the last century, there existed a complete circle of Old-Catholic townships grouped about Geneva City as a centre. At present only three such townships exist, and the disappearance of those is only a question of time. Protestants must now collect from private sources a fund for the support of their religious foundations. There is not much doubt of their succeeding in doing so in Geneva. The great majority of the property owners are Protestant, and the rich old Genevese families are possessed of a spirit of enthusiastic zeal for Calvinism. The Catholics, on the other hand, although numerically nearly equal to the Protestants, are for the most part in straitened circumstances, and are the descendants of immigrants attracted to Geneva by the opportunities for labor. Experience must soon tell whether Protestantism, deprived of financial support from the government, will really take on new life as many of its zealous partisans prophesy. This much, at any rate, is certain, that the future is bright for the Catholic Church in the city of Calvin, and in the canton of which it is the capital.

In Basle the Catholics declare that they do not countenance the principle of separation of Church and State, because the Church is an indispensable support for the State. Upon this principle they believe they can succeed in claiming yearly 40,000 francs. The government's proposal to effect a solution of the question through a constitutional amendment was unanimously approved. If now this new condition of affairs is agreed to by the people—and agreement is pretty certain—the position of the Catholics will be improved in every way and the Church in Basle will gain in strength and numbers.

OFFICIAL

SECOND NOTICE OF CONCURSUS.

April 28, 1909.

TO THE REVEREND CLERGY OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF NEW YORK:

The irremovable rectorship of the parish of St. Mary, Grand street, Manhattan, having become vacant on April 19, 1909, by the death of the Rev. Nicholas J. Hughes, a concursus to fill this vacant charge will be held in accordance with the prescriptions of the Council of Trent and the Third Council of Baltimore, on Thursday, May 13, 1909, at 10 A. M., in Cathedral College, 462 Madison avenue, New York City. Those only are eligible who have exercised the sacred ministry in this diocese for ten years, and have passed three years in successful parochial administration. The names of all candidates must be sent to the Chancellor, 23 East Fifty-first street, New York City, on or before Monday, May 10, 1909.

† JOHN,

Archbishop of New York.

P. J. HAYES. Chancellor.

LITERATURE

Ma Vocation Sociale. ALBERT DE MUN
Paris: P. Lethellieux.

In this charming book of reminiscences Count Albert de Mun relates how he and a few companions founded the great French system of Catholic workingmen's clubs, l'Œuvre des Cercles Catholiques d'Ouvriers. De Mun is a many-sided man, of great and varied gifts. He has been elected to sit as one of the Forty Immortals in the French Academy because of the witchery of his style; he is known as perhaps the most ideally perfect of French living orators; in his management of the workingmen's clubs he has shown his splendid organizing ability; his defense of the soundest Catholic principles in the French Chamber has been so fearlessly maintained against the sneers of the anti-clerical party and the remonstrances of halfhearted and unsound Catholics that he has won the respect of the former and the reluctant admiration of the latter; and, underlying all these outward manifestations of multiform capacity, there is the strong manly faith and deep religious fervor which reveals itself in spite of the author in almost every page of this intensely interesting work. When in December, 1871, Albert de Mun, with eight companions, began in a very humble way their apostolate among workingmen, he was still in the army. The writer of this notice preserves a very vivid recollection of a speech he heard at Lyons in December, 1872, just one year after the scheme had been launched. The speaker was introduced as "Monsieur le Capitaine Comte Albert de Mun." He was in full cavalry uniform, classically handsome of face and figure, and so young looking that the writer put him down in his mind as twenty-five, though he now sees from "Ma Vocation Sociale" that its author was then thirty-one. The voice was pure and penetrating, the enunciation limpid, the gesture expressive, the features, and especially the sparkling eyes, portraying every emotion; the diction chaste and strong, the manner easy and perfectly natural. The fervently Catholic audience was then filled with hope of restoration of all things good. This was nineteen months after the Frankfort Treaty between France and Germany had been signed; the huge indemnity of one thousand million dollars was already almost paid off, and soon the last German soldier would evacuate France; great religious undertakings were being set on foot, and among these none were more popular than Count de Mun's Cercles d'Ouvriers. So, when he concluded his captivating speech by the historic Crusaders' cry, "Dieu le veut!" the enthusiasm of his hearers knew no bounds.

The book before us relates the early developments of this great movement from 1871 to 1875. In this latter year the Œuvre comprised, all over France, 130 committees, 150 cercles, and 18,000 members, 15,000 of whom were workingmen. This was the rich fruit of three years spent in exhorting and organizing by Captain de Mun and his noble associates. Though he does not say so himself, he was everywhere acclaimed as the soul of this magnificent enterprise. In 1876 he resigned his commission in the cuirassiers—his enemies used to call him "le Révérend Père cuirassier"—to enter the Chamber of Deputies and begin that grand parliamentary career, which has become part and parcel of French history. L'Œuvre des Cercles Catholiques d'Ouvriers still goes on, though more and more hampered by persecution and undermined by socialist propagandism. At the Paris Exposition Universelle, of 1900, where the Œuvre was awarded un grand prix, it could point proudly to its 448 cercles and professional associations, with their 60,000 members, 138 agricultural syndicates, comprising 42,500 adherents, and 77 syndicats de l'aiguille, grouping together some nine thousand workmen.

"Ma Vocation Sociale" shows how the author's travels up and down the country from north to south and across it from west to east brought him into sympathetic contact with all sorts and conditions of men, making him tolerant towards persons, yet leaving his principles and convictions unshaken. Thus it not only reveals his own winsome and forceful character, but it incidentally throws a flood of light on the many-hued character of that fascinating and complex entity, the people of France. The book abounds in pen-portraits of famous men, drawn with admirable skill, with keen and warm appreciation of the sublimest virtue and with merciful, almost tender, depreciation of the time-server and the unpractical idealist. His extremely interesting interview with Mgr Dupanloup (pp. 42-46) afforded him painful evidence of how little support he could expect from that quarter. Frederic Le Play (p. 51), the great sociologist, who had proved, by house to house visitation of farmers in various parts of France, that the revolutionary dogmas of 1789 were false and that a return must be made to the Ten Commandments, did not satisfy Albert de Mun's thirst for Catholic activity. When the Englishman, Henry Blount, son of Sir Edward Blount, one of the pioneers of French railways, joined the small band of Count de Mun's followers in 1871, the latter was delighted to welcome him as a valiant co-worker in the task of social regeneration (p. 71). One of the most touching passages in the book is the author's description of that blind and tireless apostle, Mgr de Ségur, whose face is limned with startling accuracy and whose saintly death is told in a few soul-piercing words (p. 102). Of his own transcendent gift of speech, Count de Mun has very little to say; but he says it with true simplicity. One of the reasons why, he tells us, he entered parliament, was in order the more vigorously to wield, in defense of the Church, "the weapon which God had given men" (p. 274). The story of his first public utterance (pp. 62-63) betrays the secret of his power: "je me donnais tout entier"; it was a complete surrender of self. This scene also proves that, in his case at least, the orator was born, not made; for he was then thirty, and that was his maiden speech. But he had written and learnt it by heart, and, unlike many a budding orator whose early success has led him to rely on a fatal facility for improvisation, Albert de Mun tells us of the constant labor which has ever since been his permanent preparation for speaking in public. Perhaps the most striking page of this whole work, and one that may well become classic, is that (p. 257) in which he gives his view of how a truly serious speech should be composed. Composition he calls "the great suffering which those know well who have striven to infuse into other souls something of their own."

Marotz. JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This powerful story of Sicilian life is certainly, "drenched," though it be, "with Catholicity," not for virgins and children; there being many things in it which they, and the unlearned, too, may wrest unto their own perdition. The saving sense of humor, so closely associated with religion, is there, but why should the clowns of the book be a parish priest and a superior-ess? The novel abounds in lacunae. Why Marotz should have entered a novitiate is just a little less surprising than why she should have left it, and her subsequent and rapid choice of a husband causes the reader to gasp in respectful astonishment. There is, in a word, a want of inevitability in the heroine's progress. The most painful and unconvincing passage in this remarkable story is the sudden change of the boy Piccolo from an angel to a debauchee. It is cruel and shocking. Still more incredible are Marotz's psychological ideas. Surely a rudimentary knowledge of the Immaculate Conception would have made her errors impossible. The dialogue throughout is marvelously good; and the characterization, despite the nebulousity of Marotz herself, is splendid. The description of novice-life in chapters xxiii-xxiv would alone give the book a reason for existence. The author knows Catholicity from the inside, and expresses himself in English as it ought to be written.

F. J. F.

The Beginning of the Gospel Story. A Historico-Critical Inquiry into the Sources and Structure of the Gospel according to Mark. With Expository Notes upon the Text, for English Readers. New Haven, Conn. Yale University Press.

Dr. Bacon, the Buckingham Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in Yale University, endeavors to give the intelligent layman the results of the Higher Criticism as applied to the writing of the evangelists. In the field of Old Testament study we have become familiar with the method applied by the Graf-Kuenen school to historical tradition. For practical purposes, the critical aspect of the Old Testament is reduced to three historical cross-sections, represented respectively by the prophetic, the legal, and the hagiographical books. Not that these three literary groups refer exclusively to these respective periods; but the critics are of opinion that their historical picture can be reconstructed by means of these documents with fair accuracy. After thus reconstructing history out of its coeval literature, they explain and, in a way, reconstruct the sacred books so as to make them fit in with their historical results. Similar methods are now applied to the New Testament writings. The method followed is that of the so-called "pragmatic values." These pragmatic values are based by the critics on the contention that the biblical writers in reporting the Gospel tradition about them, were always influenced by etiological, and frequently apologetic motives; that they framed their accounts to confirm the faith of believers, or convince the unconverted, rather than to satisfy the curiosity of the historian.

Professor Bacon has studied the Gospel of St. Mark in the light of these principles. He agrees with the modern view that in Mark we have the oldest canonical gospel, an outline of Christ's career already stereotyped at the time when Matthew and Luke were written. The author yields to the rule "results, not processes," imposed by the demands of the reading public; as to the reasons for his conclusions he refers us to technical journals such as The American Journal of Theology, the Journal of Biblical Literature, the Harvard Theological Review, and the Zeitschrift für neutestamentliche Wissenschaft. It is to be regretted, however, that Dr. Bacon has not considered it necessary to explain the cogency of the critical argument to the satisfaction of his readers. The "intelligent layman" will be startled by the partition of the text of St. Mark's Gospel among its reputed literary sources. According to the Professor, the second gospel is a compilation of material derived from three principal sources: some verses trace back their origin to the compiler, or the evangelist, or again the redactor, denoted by the symbol R; a second set of sections is supposed to be derived from an early and simple narrative which is Petrine, both by tradition and from its intrinsic characteristics, and which is denoted by the symbol P; a third aggregate of verses is traced back to an ancient source from which Matthew and Luke are said to derive the portions peculiar to these gospels, and which is denoted by the symbol Q. The evangelist has not always used the same form or recension of this third source; sometimes he follows the form employed by Matthew, at other times he utilizes the recension followed by Luke; this difference is indicated by the symbols Q_{MT} and Q_{LK}. Where evidence is wanting connecting the Markan text with Matthew and Luke, and with R and P, the symbol X denotes an unknown source. Passages employed only indirectly or in a modified form are enclosed in parentheses; thus R(Q) means work of the editor on the basis of Q.

Professor Bacon arranges his page in such a clear way that the reader will catch at a glance the supposed origin of every verse of the Gospel. But the longer one reads, the more one wonders how a man of Dr. Bacon's intelligence can present his readers in sober earnest with such a number of so-called critical results on such a slender basis of evidence. He deserves the gratitude of the reading public for the clear and concise form in which he synthesizes the results of Higher Criticism as applied to the Gospels, showing unwittingly, but conclusively, the weakness of the foundation on which the Biblical critics are building.

Die Heilige Schrift. Das Alte Testament. AUSTIN ARNDT, S.J. 2 Vols. XXXI, 950 and 1026 pages, 8vo. Regensburg, Rome, New York, Cincinnati: Frederick Pustet.

We reviewed Father Arndt's translation of the New Testament in AMERICA for April 24, 1909. The first volume of his translation of the Old Testament contains the Pentateuch and historical books; in the second volume are the psalms, the sapiential and prophetic books. The introduction to the two volumes of the Old Testament is twofold, a general introduction to Biblical study and a special to the Old Testament.

In the general introduction to the study of the Bible, Father Arndt has shown he is an accurate and a reliable scholar. He begins with the question of inspiration, which he treats entirely from the standpoint of the Church. This is as it should be. For, without the Church, we do not know what books make the Bible up, nor who is the author of the Bible. Taking the Church as a fact and the encyclical "Providentissimus Deus" as an authentic and an authoritative document, Father

Arndt analyses the nature of inspiration after the way of analysis of Leo XIII; and repudiates emphatically the compatibility of false statement of any sort with inspiration. A special chapter is given by Father Arndt to a thorough yet hurried overhauling of the actual question of historicity and inspiration. Following Leo XIII, Father Arndt will not allow an inspired misstatement of fact even in the hypothesis of the use of profane sources by the sacred writer.

In the chapter on interpretation, is given a concise explanation of the decrees of the Councils of Trent and the Vatican on the power of the Church to interpret authentically the meaning of any and every statement of Holy Writ. The section on accommodation is clear and full and brief.

In his introduction to the Pentateuch, Father Arndt upholds the traditional opinions of Catholic exegetes about the Mosaic authorship of the five books of the Torah. He explains, in popular style, the views of the "critics" in the matter of the priestly code, the Elohist and Jahvist documents; shows how uncritical some of these views are; ends by saying: "To support their views in any wise soever, the enemies of revelation must turn all the history of Israel upside down."

The translation of Father Arndt is based on Allioli's translation of the Vulgate, which is rendered more accurate and clear. The style of this new German Bible is free, simple and attractive. The Vulgate is not slavishly followed. For instance, in the psalms, time and again Father Arndt translates the Hebrew text, where the old Itala or the Vulgate has departed from the original. Whereas our Douay translates the Itala of Psalm XVII, "The Lord ruleth me," Father Arndt preserves the pastoral form and beauty of the psalm and goes back to the Hebrew, "The Lord is my Shepherd." Students will be glad that Father Arndt has marked each psalm with two numbers,—that of the Vulgate and that of the Hebrew text. The poetical books would have been rendered very much more attractive and appreciable had the translator kept to the poetic form. Father Fillion has arranged the Vulgate in such form without changing the text at all.

The notes of Father Arndt are copious, not overwhelming, brief, full and meaty. Almost every page has a reference to the Hebrew or other original text. No long disquisitions are given on money, weights and measures; a pithy and striking equivalent is set down in terms of marks, litres and metres. The Fathers are not quoted; their explanations are given in brief form, fit for the general reader. The traditional division into chapters and verses is retained; every chapter is introduced by a brief and full analysis of its contents.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Reviews and Magazines.

The principal articles in La Civiltà Cattolica for April 3, 1909, are (1) "Precocious Delinquency," a study of increasing criminality among the young in Italy and France. Detailed statistics are given and discussed, and an effort is made to trace the sources of the appalling evil. (2) "Darwinism After Fifty Years" (1858-1908). In this article, which deserves translation, Evolution is described as a thing of the past; i. e., science has cast it aside and no serious scientist admits it now. The great Agassiz here in America, had prophesied that the Darwinian hypothesis, which was then an infatuation, and always an error would be found buried by the twentieth century. This article contains the demonstration of the truth of that prophecy. (3) "The Vatican New Art Gallery" tells us of the circumstances that brought about the setting up of new Pinakotheca and describes its treasures in detail. (4) "Lagrima Nuove" is the continuation of a very interesting story, well told. (5) The article, "Moral Education in Japan," was written by the great Orientalist and missionary, Father Jos. Dahlmann, S.J.

The place of honor in the May Catholic World is given to Cardinal Gibbons' paper on the "Christian Ideal of the Home." In working out the solution of the problems facing society to-day one wonders why the influence of good home training is so little studied. The home after all is the first school, and the best preparation for worthy citizenship. "Modern industrial conditions," says His Eminence, "have loosened the ties which should bind parent and child with hoops of steel;" all the more reason then, to heed well the lessons of the Home of Nazareth. "Mothers and fathers," he writes, "are doubly bound to seek the realization among us of the Christian ideal of the home. They are bound on the one hand by their Christian faith and the example of Christ; and on the other they owe a duty to the State. Thus shall they rear up for their country not scourges of society, but loyal, law-abiding citizens."

"The source of life was sound," says Katherine Brégy, when in her article she bids us turn to the "wholesome and unstudied sanity of pre-Reformation standards." In the England of Catholic discipline "the old sweet intimacy with spiritual things, fruit alike of meditation and of the sacraments" created a spiritual intuition which only centuries of unbelief can quite eradicate.

"With improvements in the conditions of the tenants, with the fear of eviction and of the penalization of improvements removed, it is easy to understand that the old cringing spirit, the bowing and scraping to the landlords, has gradually disappeared, and that there is in Ireland to-day a manly, upright, self-reliant rural population"—such is the key-note on which P. J. Lennox develops his theme: "Ireland a Land of Industrial Promise."

The friar of the Marches of Ancona of long ago little thought that his simple chronicle of current traditions was to be the source from which twentieth century folk might draw the significance of true religion. "The lesson for all time which the 'Fiorretti' teaches," says Father Cuthbert, "is that true religion is the surrender of oneself to the love of Christ, and that we are truly Christian in so far as the thought of Christ dominates our lives and the Gospel is our rule."—

Richard L. Mangan, S.J., writes an exposé of "Haeckel and his Methods" in which he proclaims "the whole head and front of Haeckel's offending to be, that what he puts forth as modest, imperfect hypotheses when writing for experts, he states as historic facts when writing for the general public."

In Scribner's Magazine for May, General Sherman's "Letters Home," and J. Laurence Laughlin's paper on "Socialism a Philosophy of Failure" are particularly good. The letters supplement the General's memoirs of the stirring period from the autumn of 1863 to his stay in Savannah in 1865. The frequent reference to his eldest son, who had been taken away by death after a brief attack of typhoid, shows a touch of tenderness not commonly associated with the grizzled old warrior.

Professor Laughlin, though not devoid of sympathy with many purposes of Socialism, affirms its failure as a philosophy of helpfulness. He bases his arguments upon economic principles, however, rather than upon fundamental Christian truths. Socialists, he claims, propose impossible material means to bring about a falsely conceived ideal condition. To coin idealism out of materialism, this is the radical weakness of socialism from an economic standpoint. The argument from this point of view is strong and luminous.

In The Bookman for May, Frederic Tabor Cooper discusses the place that will be ultimately assigned to Mr. Crawford in the history of fiction. This, he writes, is somewhat difficult to predict. Few novelists of the present day have been more widely read or have had a more salutary influence in fostering a taste for what is clean and pure and high-minded in literature and life. Excepting as a conservative force, however, it is doubtful whether he has influenced the development of the modern novel in any important degree. Recently an English reviewer spoke of him as approaching most nearly to Trollope and Mrs. Oliphant. In purpose and ideals, as well as in the uniformly readable quality of his works, he suggests a certain kinship with William Black, yet of the two Mr. Crawford is undeniably the finer artist, as well as the better story-teller, with a far better chance of being remembered by a later generation. One thing seems certain, that he will be conceded a higher word of praise than he has hitherto received.

In Les Etudes, March 20, "Mgr. D'Hulst and the spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius" is a careful study of the influence exerted by the exercises on the original and naturally independent mind of the late distinguished preacher, lecturer and President of the Catholic Institute. "A masterpiece of apocryphal literature: Solomon's Psalms," gives the history of the discovery of this new apocryphal book and sets forth the merit and beauty of its contents. "Three French Physicists" sketches the merits of Gabriel Lippmann, the perfecter of color photography, one of the three French scientists to whom the Nobel prize for most important discoveries has been awarded.

"A great Bourgeois of the XIX century, Edmond Rousse," reviews the memoirs of a man who, as he lived eighty-three years in the nineteenth century, saw much that was historically interesting and jotted down his impressions. These memoirs seem to be quite valuable.

"The beginnings of Freemasonry in France," an article by Père Dudon, examines the recent work of M. Gustave Bord, who traces the beginnings of the sect to the seventeenth century.

"In Madura—Brahmins and Pariahs" is a review from unedited documents of the progress of Christianity through the preaching of the famous Father de Nobili, and an indirect refutation of those who criticise as sterile the labors of the missionaries. "En Sorbonne" examines a strangely technical and absolutely original study of Virgil, by Father Roiron, S.J., presented by him and accepted for the degree of "docteur ès lettres." "Bulletin of Teaching and Education" points out some of the many causes that are sapping the foundation of society in France. The "Review of Books and Bibliographical Notes" is unusually full of light and interest.

AMERICA, the new Catholic weekly, * * * starts well. * * * We wish it success. There is plenty of room at the top for such weeklies. From its first issue we reproduce the article "Catholics and Socialism." This consideration of Socialism is one of the best we have seen, and we hope our readers will give it careful attention.—Sacred Heart Review.

THE DRAMA

The decadent character of many of this season's plays has aroused a vigorous protest on the part of the press and public. The managers reply in a truly commercial spirit, that they give the public what it wants. This is a very short skirt to cover the very long dereliction. A pander can always find a clientèle, and there is no vice that cannot put up a like plea. The managers naturally look to 'business results, but there is no reason why clean business cannot be good business. Barrie's "What Every Woman Knows," now having a long run at the Empire theatre, amply demonstrates that financial success is not bound up with the decadent or the obscene. It has proved the most successful play of the season and is at the same time the most wholesome. It is a fresh spring amid a waste of bitter waters.

There are a few of the season's plays harmless enough even under puritanical scrutiny, but they are, as a rule, dramatically very weak in the legs. "The Gentleman from Mississippi" has pleased its thousands; it is an old-fashioned type and celebrates an honest man in politics, an incorruptible patriot in the United States Senate. It is neither novel in theme nor strong in method, but is clean and amusing, with an obviously excellent moral. "The Man from Home" is to be ranked in the same class, honest and obvious. Dramatically, it is stereotyped in theme and manner, but acceptable to the average public who have evinced their pleasure by giving it a long run. "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," with Miss Robson in the title rôle, is enjoying popularity at the Hudson theater. It has some carrying power and on the whole interests. Unfortunately, it is marred by the injection of the "New Thought" fad, though the essential movement of the play would not suffer in the least from the excision of the "new idea" factor. Just wish a thing with might and main and you get it! Such is the dominant psychological motif. Its ultimate postulate is pantheism, though this is not, of course, palpable over the footlights. Here you have the opposite of materialistic fatalism, the self-determinism of humanity, the apotheosis of man into God. This apart, "The Dawn of a Tomorrow" has sufficient dramatic force to interest and to hold. "The Third Degree" may be called a police melodrama for the purpose of exposing the iniquity of that species of mental torture which the police are in the habit of putting a prisoner through in order to obtain a confession of guilt. Its first act is flat and incredible; its last, as is usual with Mr. Klein, its author, an anti-climax. The second and third acts are vivid and moving. The play is indeed effective in arousing indignation against a barbarous method still employed in a civilized community against prisoners. So far it serves its purpose well. But why does Mr. Klein persist in a fourth act which invariably with him leads to a most irritating anti-climax? When a dramatic story is ended, say "Amen" and be done with it. A true drama never requires an epilogue.

"The Battle," with William Lackaye in the title rôle, is a dramatic picture of Socialism and Corporationism in conflict, or rather the strong individual who is in the final analysis the soul of the corporation, though it is generally supposed the latter is pure body without any admixture of spirit. The strong individual gets the better of it in the end, while on his part he learns a thing or two that has never before entered into his calculations. He has learned what is a good thing to learn, that a man must do his own loving; i. e., not by proxy, a method which satisfies most philanthropically disposed people. "The Battle" has force, though marred by exaggerations. Its lesson is worth the while, viz., the danger of an unscrupulous individualism, whose egoism leads finally to moral shipwreck. "The Devil," one of the early plays of the season, an adaptation from an Hungarian original, is all that its name signifies. Satan is protagonist and victor. Its motive is an old and frequent one in the present drama, viz., marital infidelity. Usually the Devil plays his part invisibly; here he appears incarnate, and the play is woven out of his very palpable machinations to entrap his victims, with a bit of sinister hypnotism thrown in. He succeeds and the curtain goes down on his Satanic Majesty rubbing his hands with diabolical satisfaction and exclaiming "Good Work! Good work!" A visible devil is superfluous and his presence as a persona dramatis, after the first flush of novelty, stales. He becomes a bore, and his too obvious tactics are simply too obvious.

Mr. Sothern and Mr. Mantell, who since the death of Mr. Mansfield are the only interpreters of the classical drama on our stage, have been playing in their respective repertoires in New York to well filled houses. It is gratifying to see the public respond so readily to the legitimate. Mr. Mantell shows a strong preference for the Shakespearian play, and should be credited with a laudable effort to interpret the heroic. Unfortunately he does not altogether rise to the situation. Macbeth and Lear are roles for supreme actors only, and Mr. Mantell has not the dramatic stature. Indeed Shakespeare requires a whole company of excellent actors and to interpret him inferiorly is to bungle him. Mr. Sothern wisely chooses the romantic drama as the preponderant in his repertory. He is always intelligent and in his romantic rôles, such as Francois Villon, interprets with spirit and fire. It is perhaps out of filial piety that he still includes Lord Dundreary in his repertory. The truth is, Lord Dundreary is a dismal relic of an inane type of humor long since, and better, forgotten. All in all, however, Mr. Sothern stands head and shoulders eminent in his profession. Though by no means a great actor, his intelligence, his energy, and his general artistic appreciation have achieved many notable and gratifying successes.

On the whole, the dramatic season has not been notable for many new plays of sterling character. With the exception of "What Every Woman Knows," it has been weak and, when not nondescript, notorious in the presentation of decadent material. Public protest against the salacious character of some of its productions may prove effective as it has roused the managers to a half-hearted defence, which poorly disguises an apology.

PERSONAL

Miss Ruth Johnston, daughter of the late Richard Malcolm Johnston, has placed on exhibition at the Maryland Institute a collection of pen sketches and water colors which the Baltimore Sun critic says has not been rivaled in many years. Miss Johnston is a native of Georgia. She began her studies as a special student of the Maryland Institute, and later entered the Art Students' League of New York. Last summer she made a tour of some of the little French-Canadian villages on the St. Lawrence, Ste Anne de Beupré, L'Ange Guardian, Grande Rivière and St. Joachim, which are among the reproductions in water colors.

Bishop John N. Stariha, of Lead, South Dakota, has resigned his see on account of ill-health, and will retire to his old home in Austria. He was consecrated first bishop of the diocese Oct. 28, 1902, and is 69 years old.

Rev. Dr. Louis A. Lambert, the venerable editor of the New York Freeman's Journal and pastor of Scottsville N. Y., celebrated his sacerdotal golden jubilee on April 29. The proper date was Feb. 11 last, but the delay of the commemoration served rather to increase than diminish the local and general manifestations of the great esteem in which Father Lambert is held. AMERICA gladly offers the venerable jubilarian its heartiest congratulations.

Archbishop Gregorio Aguirre, of Burgos, has been nominated by the King of Spain to be Patriarch of the West Indies and Archbishop of Toledo in succession to the late Cardinal Sancha y Hervas. He is seventy-four years old.

SCIENCE

Is space perfectly transparent? Does the light of a star, traveling at the rate of eleven million miles for centuries and possibly for milleniums, passing over distances that stagger the imagination and bewilder the intellect, does this light pay no toll and suffer no diminution other than imposed by the optical law of the inverse square of the distance? The answer to this question cannot but profoundly modify our ideas of the distances of the stars and the size of the visible universe. For, if there are losses on the way, stars are farther away, or they are brighter, or they are larger than our measurements would seem to show. It is with good reason, therefore, that astronomers should take up this question with great earnestness and strive most energetically towards its solution.

There are at least two general causes that might diminish the light of a star. The first of these is its interception by intervening bodies, the innumerable shooting stars and meteors that are continually entering our atmosphere and ending or modifying their interplanetary roving, the various meteor swarms that the earth encounters periodically at definite points in its orbit, the many comets that course through our solar system and scatter the pulverized products of their disintegration all along their trajectories, the sun's corona which extends to unknown dimensions, the radical light which is believed to be matter reaching from the sun as far as the earth, and the Gegenschein or counterglow which is probably its extension to an unknown distance beyond: all these and many other facts more than insinuate that throughout our solar system and the universe at large there must be countless bodies of all sizes, from the massive planets through the smaller asteroids to the meteors, down to particles of dust, to the very molecules of matter and chemical ions, which the sun's light scatters more than its gravity attracts. These are all opaque bodies and must intercept light. Even if there were but one grain of sand to a cubic mile, or one to a hundred or a thousand cubic miles, space is so large than even infinitesimal size becomes formidable when multiplied by infinite number, and myriads upon myriads of opaque bodies on the long road traversed by a beam of starlight must at least partially diminish its intensity. There is, therefore, sufficient evidence that there must be a loss of starlight in space, and astronomers generally accept this as a fact.

Again, if opaque bodies in proportion to their size intercept all light, translucent and transparent bodies exert a selective absorption, they exact toll in specie upon certain colors or wavelengths. That such absorption also must exist either upon the celestial bodies themselves or in the interplanetary or interstellar spaces, is evidenced by our own atmosphere, by the sun's chromosphere, the atmosphere of some planets, and by the gaseous emanations of comets and nebulae. The consequence of this absorption must be a modification of a star's spectrum, and when very great, even of its visible color.

The second general cause which might partially at least extinguish the light of a star, would be the want of perfect elasticity of the luminiferous ether. Should the ether itself appropriate part of the energy given to it to carry, should it tamper with the wave length or the frequency, and degrade a certain percentage of light to the useless form of heat, should it, as it were, become fatigued, there would be a further exacting imposed upon the slender ray of light as it wends its weary way from the confines of space to the telescope or the photographic plate. These being the a-priori considerations, what is the fact in reality? Is there actually a loss of light in space, and if so, what fraction is thus lost?

As to the first cause, a partial extinction of all rays or of some of them only, Professor J. C. Kapteyn, of Groningen, Holland, calls attention in the Astrophysical Journal of January, to the fact that as we descend the scale of stellar brightness the stars increase in number, that is, as the stars are more faint they are more numerous, until we reach a certain magnitude, after which they begin to thin out perceptibly. This thinning-out, which is equal in all directions, is either real or apparent. If real, then our sun must hold an exceptional position either near the centre of the stellar universe or near the place of maximum density. If apparent, then light suffers absorption, and the thinning-out of stars equally in all directions is its natural consequence. He considers the latter alternative the more probable one, and proposes the provisional value of a loss of 16 thousandths of a magnitude for a distance of 33 light-years, or a parallax of one-tenth of a second. This would make a star appear to be one whole magnitude fainter for every additional distance of about 2,000 light-years. What this means in miles may be found by multiplying the 2,000 by the length of a light-year, which is about 63,000 astronomical units, that is, 63,000 times 93,000,000 miles.

Prof. Kapteyn is also of the opinion that certain classes of stars show some absorption lines or bands in their spectra, and in the comparison of two such classes he found that the one in which the absorption was greater, was in reality farther away. The data at hand are, however, too meager as yet to enable us to draw a safe conclusion. If such absorption really exists it must totally eclipse the light of the stars at a certain distance, so that we are, as it were, in a fog and shall never, in spite of increased optical means, be able to see the limit that the Infinite and Almighty Creator has set to His visible creation.

In regard to ether fatigue, Prof. Peter Lebedew, of Moscow, in the Astrophysical Journal for March, very vigorously combats its physical possibility and says that the assumption that there is absolutely no dispersion in pure ether forms the basis of all our electro-magnetic theories, and that, therefore, it is not permissible, as Tikhoff and Nordmann have done to propose such a dispersion even as a provisional hypothesis to satisfy certain observations. He then explains these observations on purely physical grounds, and ends by saying that we must regard space as entirely free from our demonstrable dispersion of light.

SOCIOLOGY

The fact that the secular papers have published a sympathetic article on Catholic Sisterhoods marks the contrast between the sentiment of to-day and of the not very distant period when the press was filled with "harrowing tales, found to be without foundation" of alleged nuns, especially of one "notorious character who had never been in a convent." Mr. Has-kin's summary of the history, growth and labors of our Sisterhoods is a detailed development of his opening paragraph:

"There are 56,000 devoted Catholic women in the United States engaged in that beautiful work which finds expression in the labors of such organizations as the Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Mercy and Little Sisters of the Poor. They have over 600 colleges and academies for women, 700 institutions of charity and 3,000 parochial schools; they have a million orphans, patients, strays, waifs and aged people to care for, 70,000 girls in their colleges and academies and 800,000 children in their parochial schools."

He adds that some American Episcopalians and one Lutheran body "have found it advantageous to follow the example of Catholics."

Energetic measures have been taken in Ireland within the last two years against the ravages of the "White Plague." The National Health Crusade, under the presidency of the Countess of Aberdeen, sent lecturers and distributed literature everywhere, and established nurses and dispensaries in many districts. They also enrolled in the movement the schools and institutions of the country, and they have now opened a Tuberculosis Exhibition in Dublin. Dr. Philip, of Manchester, said that frequent tribute was paid at the Washington International Congress last year to the efficiency of the Irish organizations, and he asked their aid in initiating similar work in London. An objection, which has been made in New Orleans and other cities where the anti-tuberculosis campaign has been specially vigorous, was also raised in Dublin, that this constant agitation of the subject tended to create a panic; but Mr. W. H. Murphy replied: "Let us have a panic by all means; 'tis better than consumption." The reports declared that the progress of the disease was arrested and that there were good hopes of its speedy extinction.

Usually the Holy Father gives no audiences on the last three days of Holy Week. This year he made an exception in favor of a deputation of German workingmen whom he received on Holy Saturday. In their address they said that their fellow workingmen were happy to appear at least through representatives before the Father of Christendom. "The great progress of our times create special dangers for us," they said, "and we need guidance. We shall ever be grateful to Pope Leo XIII for his immortal encyclical 'Rerum Novarum,' in which he points out the remedies against the social evils of our day. We have profited by his doctrine. We expect the State to help us in our needs but we know that we have also to help ourselves. We have formed societies according to his instructions which are federated and number 400,000 members. Each has a priest as director. In these societies, besides legitimate efforts to redress grievances we purpose, too, to combat the dangers of Socialism. For this purpose many Catholic workingmen have affiliated with the Christian Workingmen's Societies, which consist of both Catholics and Protestants." The Holy Father listened with the greatest interest, especially when the speaker entered into the details of their organization. After expressing his joy at their coming, he said: "It gives me great pleasure to hear that you have profited so well by the excellent teachings of Pope Leo XIII, my predecessor, and that you have organized according to his directions. You have also my full approval in your combining with non-Catholics for the purpose of preserving in your nation the tenets of Christianity. Another cause of great joy for me is that your priests unite so actively with you in your societies."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—An attempt to blow up the New Orleans Cathedral by a dynamite bomb, on April 25, has excited wide indignation not only in that city but throughout the State. This handsome and spacious edifice is one of historic interest and perhaps the oldest cathedral in the United States, having been built in its present form more than a century ago. The explosion damaged or destroyed the fine organ, frescoes and stained glass windows, but fortunately inflicted no permanent structural injury. The ladies of the city have guaranteed to make good the loss, and such is the feeling aroused at the sacrilegious nature of the crime that the Mayor of New Orleans, the District Council of the Knights of Columbus, and the Governor of Louisiana have offered rewards for the discovery of the miscreants.

—A favorite idea of Pope Pius is the introduction of a catechism for the whole Church or at least for such peoples as speak a common tongue. On April 4, the Holy Father received in audience the representative of the firm of Frederic Pustet, Marchese Antenotti, who presented to His Holiness the Italian translation of the larger catechism of Father Deharbe, S.J. The Pope said he considered this catechism the best handbook now in use, and heartily recommended it to the catechists of Italy.

—Catholic societies in Austria are inaugurating a pilgrimage to Rome on the occasion of the canonization of Blessed Clemens Maria Hoffbauer, the Redemptorist, which will take place on May 20. Blessed Hoffbauer spent the last twelve years of his life in Vienna, and was called by Pope Pius VII an ornament to the clergy and a column of the Church.

On Wednesday in Holy Week the Pope received in audience 350 Austrian "Mittelschüler," i.e., high school and college students. "You spend your Easter vacation in journeying to Rome to see her treasures and monuments," said the Holy Father, "but strengthen your Faith by prayer at the tombs of the martyrs and by the reception of the Sacraments. I welcome and bless you all, your studies, your dear parents and teachers, and I implore God to bless your Emperor who for sixty years has given an example of Catholic Faith and has ruled over his peoples as a true prince of peace."

—America is not the only nor the first country in which Catholics of foreign nationalities have their separate churches with clergy of their own race. In Rome, many were built centuries ago, and towards the end of the sixteenth century the numerous German colony in Naples, made up of tradesmen, printers, goldsmiths, woodcarvers and other artisans, obtained the exclusive use of a church which they called "Santa Maria dell' Anima," in imitation of the famous national German Church in Rome. With the approbation of the archbishop a confraternity was formed for the support of the church, which by royal sanction became a chartered society. To it belonged the Tedeschi, i. e., immigrated Germans, and the Giannizzeri, Italian-born children of Germans. Among the charitable foundations connected with the Church one especially worthy of mention, provides for the payment of certain sums, to enable poor German girls to marry. When the ancient structure was condemned by the city to make room for modern improvements, the present building was erected and consecrated in 1900. The Rector today in charge of the Neapolitan Anima, Rev. M. Toll, D.D., has just issued a history of the Church in most attractive form.

—On May 21 Bishop Fabiano Landi, of Tuscany, Italy, who is engaged on the missions in China, will sail from San Francisco to continue his work there. He will be accompanied by the Rev. Antonius Murphy, O.F.M., who is the first American to volunteer for this mission, and who was ordained in Boston on April 30, in the Church of the Italian Franciscans. His native town is Canton, Mass., a singular coincidence.

—Lord Strathcona has sent a check to Archbishop Bruchesi, of Montreal, for the benefit of the Home for Incurables at Cotes des Neiges.

—An international congress of the St. Vincent de Paul Society was held in Rome the third week in April. Nearly every country was represented. The delegates were received by the Holy Father, to whom they were introduced by Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli, protector of the society. The President General, M. Paul Calon, then read an address of filial homage, calling attention to the fact that the delegation comprised not only Italians, French, Belgians, Dutch, English and Swiss, but representatives from the conferences in the United States, Canada, South America and Australia. The annual growth, he said, was about 200 conferences, and the amount distributed 14,000,000 francs.

—The Little Sisters of the Assumption, the servants and nurses of the poor, whose work is well known in New York, are the latest victims of persecution by the French Government. Their mother-house at Gruelle (Paris) and all its branches throughout France are shortly to be confiscated. At Gruelle the workingmen have clubbed together to look after the nuns when they are sent adrift. On Low Sunday 600 of these workingmen made their Easter communion in the sisters' chapel at Gruelle.

—Assistance for the Syrian Maronite congregation in New York, of which the Rev. Francis Wakim is rector, has been given by the cathedral parish. Father Richard O'Hughes lectured for them on April 23 and Mgr Lavelle, V.G., added a brief address in which he expressed the hope that in the near future they would have a fine church of their own.

—The new Bishop of Cleveland, the Right Rev. John Farrelly, was consecrated in the chapel of the American College, Rome, on May 1, by Cardinal Gotti, assisted by Bishop Kennedy, rector of the American College, and Bishop Morris, coadjutor of Little Rock, Ark. Practically all the members of the American colony in Rome were present, with a number of ecclesiastics of high rank. The new bishop was the recipient of several beautiful gifts. Bishop Kennedy presented him with a work of art, Monsignor Morris with a pastoral staff, and the students of the American College with a solid silver service. A fine pectoral cross was the gift of the Cleveland students at the college, and a rich rochet was given by the Most Rev. W. O'Connell, Archbishop of Boston.

—The Mexican Catholic daily, El Tiempo, has an extended account of the ascetic life and adventurous missionary labors of Mgr Mora, lately promoted to the Archiepiscopal See of Mexico. It is a story of exciting interest. When Bishop of Tehuantepec in the Southeastern extremity of the Mexican republic, he was wont to travel on foot, or riding a mule, often unaccompanied, through pathless wilds of brush and desert, treading ravines and climbing mountain precipices. He penetrated the remotest Indian settlements, wherever a soul was to be found, unmindful of oppressive heat, poisonous insects and the wild beasts of the forest. Making it a rule never to carry with him provisions, he traveled in the most primitive fashion, living after the manner of the natives. In consequence he often went without food whole days together, but he made converts and strengthened Christianity everywhere. Stories of his adventures, miraculous escapes, and, above all, of his heroic toil, were told among the peasantry from Tehuantepec to Mexico, and hence at his recent inauguration as Archbishop of the metropolitan see, the citizens turned out en masse and gave him a reception of unprecedented enthusiasm; all of which augurs well for the future prospects of Catholicity in Mexico.

PLATFORM AND PULPIT

The Rose-Dickie Debate

A series of three debates between Mayor David S. Rose, of Milwaukee, and President Samuel Dickie, of Albion College, Michigan, on the subject of Prohibition, is attracting wide attention in the middle west. They are both forcible speakers, and each is regarded as a champion by the partisans of his side. Each speaker is endeavoring to prove that the Catholic Church favors his side of the argument.

At the Chicago debate, April 30, Mr. Dickie brought out the following points. Employers of all kinds have learned by experience that the moderate drinker is not to be trusted. In confirmation of this the U. S. Department of Labor has found that 90 per cent. of railways, 79 per cent. of manufactories, 88 per cent. of trades and 72 per cent. of agriculturists discriminate against employees who use intoxicants as a beverage. Public sentiment favors prohibition, and most churches put a black mark on the liquor traffic; the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore urged Catholics to get out of the saloon business. Finally Mr. Dickie maintained that the saloon, by its constant manipulation of politics, had become a danger and a menace to the whole country.

Mayor Rose argued that prohibitionists are illusionists and sensationalists. He stated that New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Michigan, Iowa and Nebraska had adopted prohibition, and afterwards wiped it off the statute books. In New York, Indiana and Wisconsin, prohibitory laws had been passed and found unconstitutional. The only two States that have clung to the fantasy for any time are Maine and Kansas, and in Maine the record of prohibition is a record of hypocrisy and contempt for law. Mr. Rose then quoted from a speech of Rt. Rev. Mgr. Franz Goller, pastor of SS. Peter and Paul's Church of St. Louis: "The Pope certainly does believe in temperance, that is, moderation in all things, but not absolute prohibition. That is not the spirit of freedom, but of autocratic government. The Holy Father himself takes a glass of wine, and believes that men should be allowed to use their own judgment in what they should eat and what they should drink, and not have other men decide such matters for them." The following extract from an interview with Cardinal Gibbons, which appeared in the Baltimore News was also read. "As a citizen and a churchman who loves his native city I am profoundly impressed with the sense of its temporal and moral welfare. Liquor would be sold here quite as abundantly under prohibition laws as under well-regulated license. The consequence will be that liquor will be dispensed contrary to law instead of being revenue, which is so much needed for the government of this community. When a law is flagrantly and habitually violated it brings legislation into contempt. It creates a spirit of deception and hypocrisy, and compels men to do insidiously and by stealth, what they would otherwise do openly and above board. You cannot legislate men by civil action into the performance of good and righteous deeds."

Mr. Rose closed his side of the debate by saying that the true solution of the liquor question lay not in prohibition, but in the strict enforcement of sane and reasonable legislation for its proper regulation.

F. CASSILLY, S.J.

On Monday evening, April 26, the Rev. Emmanuel de la Morinière, S.J., professor of philosophy in Spring Hill College, Mobile, Alabama, lectured in the hall of Fordham University on King Lear. He was introduced by Rev. Father Quinn, S.J., rector of the University. The lecturer more than sustained the reputation for histrionic and oratorical skill which he brings with him from the South. His delivery is vividly dramatic without being at all theatrical. The chief merit of his lecture, however, was its wide and deep generalizations on the life and works of Shakespeare, provoking thought and impelling the hearer to verify for himself this new light on the myriad-minded poet. Father Quinn voiced the feelings of the audience when he thanked the reverend lecturer for this instructive and suggestive lecture.

Preaching at the recent dedication of the St. Austin's Chapel in Austin, Texas, the Rev. M. J. Kirwin, rector of Galveston Cathedral, pointed out a marked resemblance between the conditions St. Austin found in England and those which prevail to-day in Austin, Texas, where under the shadow of the university, the Paulist Fathers have built St. Austin's Chapel. "The Paulist Fathers," he said, "have also journeyed from afar to preach here the same message, and King Ethelbert's answer to St. Austin summarizes the attitude of the university to this Catholic Chapel. 'Since you have come as strangers from so great a distance, and as I take it, are anxious to have us also share in what you conceive to be both excellent and true, we will not interfere with you, but receive you rather in kindly hospitality. Moreover, we make no objection to your winning as many converts as you can to your creed.'

"Many earnest Catholics deprecate the establishment of Catholic chapels near State universities. The atmosphere of too many of our State universities is agnostic; the Catholic student, imbued with the critical spirit of his age, deeply impressed by the religious and social difficulties which are raised in the lecture hall, and which he is not prepared to solve, too often makes shipwreck of faith and morals. We have our own educational institutions to which we constantly urge Catholic parents to send their children. But when we have done our best, we find that Catholic students do attend such universities and the problem of their spiritual needs confronts us. It is an old problem. The local bishop had to look after the Gregorys and Basils in the pagan universities of Athens and Antioch, as the German bishops are doing now for Catholic students in secular institutions and as Rt. Rev. Bishop Gallagher has done in entrusting to the Paulist Fathers the spiritual guidance of the Catholics of Texas University."

"The only church which is dealing with the spiritual development of her little children in the right manner is the Catholic Church." This assertion was made recently by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, a Presbyterian minister in Philadelphia, during a sermon on "Children's Vision." "One fact is certain," continued Mr. Talmage, "the Catholics train their children for the Church, and the result is that they are going ahead by leaps and bounds. The coming universal creed is the Catholic creed, unless we, as a church, shall have the brains of the Catholic priests and put the chief emphasis of our spiritual work into moulding our children under twelve years of age for God."

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

It is in the Protestant universities and colleges that Catholic books are most needed. An attendant at the Valparaiso University, Ind., where there are three hundred students, writes me for information on free will, persecution, etc. There are infidel teachers everywhere, and the Protestants are mighty glad when the Catholics can answer them. In fact, they pray and hope that the Catholics may be able to stop the mouth of these infidel masters. One Protestant called the professor a coward for daring to attack, because they had not the proper books of reference to answer him.

Could you make a list of twenty-five or fifty of the most necessary books on the existence of God and the folly of subjectivism, the superiority of the Christian philosophy, especially the solidity of the Thomistic system; the just rules of Christian social systems which the Catholic Church established in the middle ages, and even in the regenerated Roman Empire; her modern efforts to stand between the socialist and the monopolies; the progress and the refinement that the Catholic Church establishes everywhere; the contrast between the artistic Germany of the Catholic times and the degraded Germany of Luther?

The refinement of the Celtic and the Latin races is due to their purity, and it is the same in our Teutonic people who remained faithful to Christian modesty. That alone would offset the continual boast of the ascendancy of the Protestant or infidel races and their inventions which are more ours than theirs. Means ought to be found to introduce "The Catholic Encyclopedia" into every university of the land, besides such books in English as describe the prosperity of Catholic Belgium, Bavaria, etc. If we can offer authoritative statements of our doctrines, and our achievements, many schools and libraries might place such books on their shelves. But it is the quality that must be looked after because they may be willing to buy fifty volumes asked by their readers, and not five hundred. If lists could be prepared, they would be taken up by one hundred seats of learning, or libraries where they would do much good.

Respectfully yours,

JULIUS E. DE VOS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

In going over my historical data for the article on the Greek Catholic Church in America, I find a curious coincidence which may be of interest to you in regard to your new publication, and which I give briefly as follows:

In 1885 Father Ivan Volanski was sent to the United States by Archbishop (afterwards Cardinal) Sembratovich, Metropolitan of Lemberg, as the first Greek Catholic missionary priest. In 1886 he built the first Catholic Church at Shenandoah, Pennsylvania, and founded parishes in several other places where churches were afterwards built. Finding his Ruthenian people without any reading matter in their own language, he sent to Galicia for Russian type, and in the latter part of 1886 obtained a few fonts of Russian type from the printing office of Shevchenka, in Lemberg. Then he commenced the publication in Little Russian (Ruthenian) of a Catholic paper, issued every two weeks, at Shenandoah, Pa., under the name of AMERICA. This paper lived until about 1890. Thus the first Catholic paper or review, which I know of, bearing the name America was published by a priest of the Greek rite.

The above fact may be interesting for you to know, especially in view of the hard struggles for the poor and uneducated Ruthenian Greek Catholics to make their way in this country, hampered as they were by lack of English, a different rite, Slavic nationality and the direst poverty.

Yours sincerely,

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

We have received the first number of the AMERICA. We like it. It is a brave paper—full of sublime assurance and boundless ambition. It says it will be the greatest Catholic paper in the United States; and we believe it will. It says it will occupy a sphere all its own and all to itself. We think it will. It has undertaken a task never before essayed by a Catholic paper in America, and while it fully realizes the vastness of the undertaking, it proclaims its ability to successfully prosecute it. We hate editorial humility. It is always insincere. We do not think there ever was so much self-assertion and contempt of rivals expressed in so short a space as St. Thomas, the least selfish of the saints, gives us in the dozen lines of the "Prologus" to his "Summa." Therefore, we heartily welcome this most pretentious of Catholic publications, and wish it boundless prosperity. We would say more: if all succeeding numbers are as good as the first it will be a credit and encouragement to us all.—The Western Watchman.

It is a scholarly periodical, and just popular enough to interest the vast mass of the people as well as those who have had the benefit of a more liberal education.—The Catholic Telegraph.

AMERICA will be on this continent, a Catholic weekly of the very highest class. The articles are the work of some of the ablest writers in the country. The quality of the paper and the typographical appearance of the new weekly place it in the very first rank.—Catholic Record.

The new Catholic weekly, AMERICA, which takes the place of the venerable monthly Messenger, is at hand, and is quite in keeping with promises made.—Catholic Union and Times.

It is time that Catholics should turn with confidence and pride to a reliable, interesting, commanding Catholic Review of the week such as AMERICA. We hope that the Catholics with persistent zeal will not only subscribe for AMERICA and read it regularly, but that they will make a concerted and successful attempt to ask for AMERICA at the news stands, book stores and in railway trains and thus help to spread the usefulness of this magazine.—Toledo Record.

It replaces The Messenger, which was always a joy to handle on the first day of every month. AMERICA will come weekly, freighted with well-expressed Catholic thought on every subject of the day worth a thought, in religion, science, literature, art and politics.—New York Freeman's Journal.

The new Catholic weekly review, entitled AMERICA, which displaces The Messenger, the eminent Catholic monthly, has made its appearance, and fulfills all the expectations which its preliminary prospectus called into being. It is a methodically arranged publication, comprehensive in contents and moderate and dignified, but quietly authoritative, in its editorial pronouncements on current questions.—Catholic Standard and Times.

Neat in appearance, clear of type, and convenient in size, it will fill a much needed want at every fireside in America. There is no one interested in Catholic work but will greet it warmly, for we all realize the necessity of such a medium for the expression of Catholic desires; an organ which will be a vehicle for the expression of the trained intellect, and lofty Catholic thought, as well as to combat the many fallacies of the day. This AMERICA will do. The inaugural number is, in itself, sufficient evidence of that.—Irish American.

In the field of American Roman Catholic journalism a new weekly review, AMERICA, published in New York, has appeared. With the coming of the new review passes the monthly Messenger, the well known magazine, which has been merged with the new weekly publication. Many of the former editors of the Messenger are on the staff of AMERICA. The new journal is an adaptation of its predecessor to meet the needs of the times, which needs are felt to be too urgent to be satisfied by a monthly periodical.—Boston Herald.

The first number of AMERICA, the new Catholic review published in New York under the direction of the Jesuits, gives evidence in its comprehensiveness, its actuality, its broad interest and scholarship, its temperate and courteous tone, that it will serve admirably to take the place of an exponent of Catholic thought in this country such as the Tablet takes in England. The announcement of its projection raised high expectations in all those who are interested in the worthy expression of the Catholic point of view and in the elevation of the tone of Catholic journalism, and it is much to say that the reality has surpassed expectations. Every thoughtful Catholic will welcome AMERICA, and every Catholic editor in the country will wish it the success it deserves. Such a national review, covering a field and taking a place that cannot be filled by any local journal, will serve only to strengthen the cause in which all of us are spending energies and sowing hopes. AMERICA is able to take its place with the best secular reviews and supplies a mouthpiece for the Catholics of America such as they have never had before.—Catholic Universe.

It is a dignified, finely printed and well-written weekly, the equal of any high-class secular periodical in the land.—The Catholic News.

AMERICA, intrinsically, comes up to to our expectation. We regard it as the beginning of a Higher Catholic Journalism in this country. It combines all the essentials and features of a review and a news-journal, faithfully mirroring the whole Church and bringing us in contact with Catholic thought and activity all over the world.—The Record, Louisville.

To have so many of these momentous questions and needs of the time adequately dealt with from week to week in a single periodical, by writers of high scholarship and dialectical skill, can not fail to redound to the good of religion and the uplifting of Catholic journalism. We wish the new venture abundant success.—Southern Messenger.

The articles are the work of some of the ablest writers in the country. The quality of the paper and the typographical appearance of the new weekly place it in the very first rank.—The Catholic Record.

If AMERICA can hold to the high note of excellence it has taken in its first number and sustain the pitch for the future, then, we do not hesitate to say that, as a Catholic weekly it will not be surpassed by any review in Europe or America.

The journal throughout is a serious, concise review, dealing only in current, timely subjects, and the contributions which it bids fair to make to the cause of Catholic truth ought to constitute a great force for enlightenment on this continent.—Winnipeg Catholic.

CHRONICLE

The President and Porto Rico.—President Taft's message to Congress, May 10, is a detailed exposition of Porto Rico's economic and political conditions outlined in AMERICA, May 1. Under the Foraker Act, May 1, 1900, the Porto Rico legislature consists of the Executive Council of eleven members (not less than five natives) appointed by the President, and the House of Delegates, which is elective. All the present Delegates belong to the Unionist or Anti-American party, under the leadership of Munoz-Rivera, an ambitious editor, who aims at absolute control of all administration. To this end he drew up certain bills, and insisted that they be passed by the Council unamended; otherwise the House would refuse supplies. These bills demanded: 1. County government which put internal control in his hands; 2. Manual training schools of a nature at variance with the constitution; 3. Agricultural banks; and 4. Selection of assessors by the largest taxpayers. The dangers obviously inherent in the third and fourth proposition are made certain by the fifth: a bill to increase the elective municipal judges from 26 to 66. The elected judges were already "a political instrument in the hands of the central committee," that is, of the Unionist editor; and the Executive Council declined to strengthen that instrument. Then the Delegates refused to vote supplies for the coming year, producing a political dead-lock. Though the Executive seems empowered to make appropriations, in practice the legislature has done so, and as the Washington deputation of Delegates has remained obstinate, Mr. Taft recommends an amendment to the Foraker Act providing (as in the Philippines and Hawaii) that when the legislature adjourns without voting the necessary supplies, the Auditor shall draw a sum equal to the previous appropriation. When this amendment is enacted adjustments of the organic laws should be considered by Congress.

Mr. Taft states that since Porto Rico freely passed over to us, she has been "the favorite daughter of the United States"; that we have turned over to her all her revenues and even contributed from the U. S. treasury; that her school attendance has quadrupled and her imports, exports and land values have trebled in the interval; that the government has treated one-fourth of the population, conquering a prevalent and dangerous disease; that of the 2,891 civil servants, 2,548 are natives, and Porto Rico never enjoyed such prosperity, opportunity and liberty. The Executive has surely never retarded just legislation, but rather our extension to her people of political power has been too fast for their good. The change recommended will secure more responsible exercise of power, though unconvincing "to those controlling the House of Delegates."

This evidently means the editor who has been posing as dictator of Porto Rico. Special correspondence from Porto Rico to AMERICA declares that this ambitious politician and his delegates are a disturbing and injurious element in religious matters as well as in politics and economics.

The Peace Conference.—As might be expected the peace conference held in Chicago last week passes into history noted rather for the discussion it provoked than for the definite results it achieved. Civilization will have made wondrous changes in the world before aught of practical effect will be accepted by the nations to remove the curse of war from humanity. No nation will consent to arbitration which, as the Chicago platform puts it, "may involve the national life and independence." A broad exception truly and one that could be applied to almost any dispute that may arise. Nevertheless the congress will have its good effects. Its spirit manifested in former similar assemblies achieved much in ameliorating the hardships and in limiting the causes of war. Probably it is because of its understanding the insurmountable obstacles which lie in the way of universal peace that the congress was satisfied with an indorsement of the principle of obligatory arbitration. The final resolution adopted failed to prescribe any method for curbing the growth of armaments, merely urging the appointment of special commissioners to report a plan under which the ruinous competition prevailing in armaments can be arrested.

Maximum and Minimum Rate.—In the tariff discussion the strangest feature that confronts us is the unjust criticism provoked by the one detail of the bill acceptable to law-makers both Democratic and Republican alike. It is no doubt misinformation which causes people generally to mistrust the maximum and minimum clause. Many seem to suppose that it is devised to increase in some way the rates of duty on ordinary articles in the interest of trusts and rich manufacturers. Such an idea were truly a misunderstanding of a plan approved by every public man of prominence since the days of Blaine and before.

Contrary to the opinion of many there is nothing in the clause which would provoke a tariff war with any foreign country; absolutely the opposite is true. Its purpose is not to regulate imports, but to increase foreign trade. It is reciprocity pure and simple. The whole aim of the maximum and minimum clause is not to secure special favors for America at all, but merely to prevent discrimination against her. Any nation which charges American products neither more nor less than it charges the same products from other nations is entitled under its authority to ship goods into the United States at our minimum rates.

Senator Lodge's Stand.—The distinguished representative from Massachusetts is the first member of the Senate "stand-patters," so-called, who has ventured to come out boldly with a denial of any revision downward pledge binding him or his party. Speaking in the Senate on Saturday last, he protested: "Nobody ever pledged me to revise the tariff downward or to revise it upward. What we are pledged to is a revision, and I suppose we are here to revise in view of the interests of the whole country. If it is wise to reduce rates, then reduce them; if it is wiser to give greater protection, we should do that; and if it is wise to keep them as they are, then that should be done. That has been the attitude of the committee on finance, and without possessing infallibility we have adopted that line of action."

Back to Rome.—A large representation of the former students of the North American College will sail from here next Thursday to assist in the celebration on June 15 of the golden jubilee of that institution. Mgr. Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, is to be a passenger on the same steamer. The Alumni Association, under whose auspices the coming celebration will be held, numbers students from nearly all the dioceses in the United States, including Archbishop Farley of New York, Archbishop Moeller of Cincinnati, and Archbishop O'Connell of Boston, and a score of Bishops and Monsignori. The alumni have prepared a golden jubilee souvenir concerning the college and those closely allied to it, which has been suitably illuminated and engrossed for presentation to the Pope with a jubilee gift of a purse of gold. The first rector of the college was the present venerable Bishop McCloskey of Louisville, Ky., whose age will prevent his attendance. As a factor in the progress of the Church in the United States during the past half century, it would be difficult to measure what the American College has accomplished.

Pennsylvania Sets An Example.—The temptation to kidnap children of wealthy families will cease to allure those seeking for easily won ransom money if Pennsylvania's example be generally followed. The wicked pair who recently planned the stealing of young Whitla in Sharon, Pennsylvania, were found guilty after a brief trial and on Monday last the man was sentenced to a life term in the penitentiary, his companion receiving a sentence of twenty-five years with a fine of five thousand dollars and costs in addition to the sentence.

English Royal Accession Declaration.—The Earl of Crewe, replying to the Duke of Norfolk in the British House of Lords on April 30th, said a great majority of people desired to see enacted some new formula which would make the position of the Sovereign on the solemn occasion of his first meeting Parliament perfectly clear, but at the same time would be entirely devoid of those expressions which were so offensive to many millions of his subjects, and which must be most painful to any Sovereign to utter. "Experience, I am sorry to say, has shown how difficult it is to find a formula of the kind, because within that large class (representing the great majority of the people) there exists a great diversity of opinion as to how far the formula ought to go in the direction of stating that the Sovereign repudiates and does not accept the Roman Catholic faith.

Before there can be any real hope of arriving at the formula many different shades of opinion have to be consulted, and I cannot pretend that so far the result has been very encouraging. At the same time, speaking for myself, I do not despair that some such formula may in process of time be discovered, but I regret to be obliged to say that there is no prospect of our being able to propose any legislation this session."

The Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Denbigh, speaking on behalf of the Roman Catholic community, expressed profound disappointment at the statement. Bigotry dies hard.

Lunacy Laws in France.—Medical researches during the last century into the causes of lunacy have convinced the profession that in the main lunacy is a result of lesion, and that as a disease it submits to treatment. The régime of severity—strait jackets and cold douches—has given way to methods of kindness and careful dieting at least on the Statute Books of America and the United Kingdom. In France, however, the old laws enacted under Louis-Philippe (1838) are still in force. The new lunacy laws, which are being considered by the French Senate, aim at remedying this state of things. The "Projet-Dubief," as the scheme is called, contains one or two innovations on the practice in English speaking countries. Thus it aims at establishing compulsory institutions for the treatment of abnormal children, i. e., children who are weak minded and backward in development; and it seeks to justify this invasion of the home by the plea that whereas it is often a pedagogical error to remove a normal child from home influences, it is a benefit in the case of the abnormal child to be protected from the spoiling effects of paternal and maternal caresses. The whole question is one of too great delicacy for discussion, and the operation of such a law might easily work injustice.

On the other hand we have nothing but welcome for the scheme outlined in Article 2, under the heading Colonies familiales. The colonization of the mentally deranged was tried as far back as 1826 in France, at Bicêtre, where they were employed at farm work and various trades on the lines that are obligatory in all the asylums of the United Kingdom. But the new scheme goes further, and aims at boarding out those who are harmless and melancholic, who suffer from merely intermittent attacks, or who suffer from that most incurable of mental affections, known as general paralysis.

It is curious to note that at Gheel in Belgium this treatment has been employed since the seventh century. In that century St. Dymphna, an Irish maiden, was martyred there, and her tomb was the scene of many cures, mostly from mental affliction. So great was her fame that from all over the country the mentally deranged were brought to be cured at her shrine, and she herself was known as the "Patroness of the Insane." Gheel became and continues to be a sort of out-of-doors

Bloomington. In due time legislation stepped in to control the situation. Houses were licensed to receive only two patients at a time, both to be of the same sex. Since 1882 four doctors minister to the wants of the locality. There is also a resident commission of inspection, and a special infirmary for the temporary reception of excited or epileptic cases. Naturally, violent patients or those subject to homicidal or suicidal tendencies are unfitted for such a system of almost unrestrained liberty; but provided due caution is exercised in the choice of those for whom this method of treatment is intended, its humaneness will commend itself to everyone. It is hardly to be expected that many villages will be found ready to imitate the example of Gheel, but it ought not to be impossible to establish colonies familiales for epileptics, alcoholics, and the more harmless forms of derangement in connection with the various larger asylums throughout the country.

Labor Struggle in France.—The officials who in the late postal troubles made concessions subversive of discipline and thus allowed the rank and file to come to the opinion that they could dictate terms at will, are awake to the result of their action; a situation faces them so serious that it would be difficult to exaggerate its gravity. Clemenceau realized that the apparent peace secured meant only the postponement of the real struggle. For that struggle now at hand the government has been preparing every hour since the strikers returned to work. Their preparations are now so well in hand that they feel confident they shall be able to meet the emergency which they expect speedily to arise without a ruinous collapse of public functions similar to that which occurred in March. They believe it to be imperative to settle once for all the point that the employees of the great public service, even though they have certain admitted grievances, should not be allowed to paralyze the business of the country by combining in dictation to the government itself.

The New Sultan.—Mohammed V girded on the ancient sword of his ancestors on Monday last and was thus formally installed as sovereign of the Ottoman Empire. The picturesque ceremony which, as reports tell us, was remarkable for a novel blending of Western features with immemorial Oriental traditions, corresponds to a coronation in other monarchies. The ancient scimitar of the founder of the Empire, which has been worn by thirty-four of Mohammed's successors, had been taken early in the morning from the treasure house to the Mosque Ayoub, the sacred edifice into which none but the faithful may enter, and there the new Sultan went through the brief, ancient ceremony of girding it upon him. The day passed peacefully and without sign of disturbance.

Up to the present time the sum of $7,500,000 has been found in the treasure boxes of the imperial palace at Yildiz recently occupied by the deposed Abdul Hamid. Furthermore, papers were discovered indicating that the late Sultan has on deposit in foreign countries upwards of $15,000,000. It is understood that the cabinet takes the stand that all these foreign deposits, as well as the treasure at Yildiz, are the property of the State, to be secured either by legal action or through authorization from Abdul Hamid himself.

French Teachers and the Doumergue Law.—

Finding that neutrality in the schools is not sufficient to pervert the French nation, the Government is endeavoring by what is known as the Doumergue Law to make the schools positively irreligious. The law claims that the Government is responsible for the teaching given in the schools, and that parents who object to the teaching given may not remove their children from the school but must state their grievances to the Government for investigation. The teachers are unanimous in denouncing the law as slavery. Hitherto complaints against teachers were argued in the courts; the new law makes the prefect the judge as to whether neutrality is observed or not; and the teachers feel that henceforth they must teach what the prefect approves of, or run the risk of dismissal. In the past there have been very few complaints of violated neutrality, but knowing the irreligious animus of the great mass of prefects, Catholic parents may be certain that the faith of their children is in greater peril than before.

Honor to Father Delany.—In educational matters Father Delany's name is one to conjure with in Ireland. His evidence before the Royal Commission a few years ago on the University question went far towards influencing the finding of the Commissioners and securing from Parliament the long-hoped-for Catholic University of Ireland. On the occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of his entrance into the Society of Jesus, a committee was formed to organize a memorial testifying the country's appreciation of his lifelong devotion to the cause of education. A sum of $5,000 has been collected, and at Father Delany's wish it has been devoted to establishing a scholarship at the new University.

Newfoundland.—The latest news from Newfoundland is that the general election of last Saturday resulted in the overwhelming defeat of Sir Robert Bond. Practically complete returns show that Sir Edward Morris will have twenty-six members of the Legislature, while Sir Robert will have only ten. The campaign was the most exciting during the past forty years. Towards the end of last month the publication of the alleged connection of Sir Robert Bond, ex-Premier, with a plot to force confederation with Canada, had aroused the whole island and the political feeling was intense. It culminated on April 30, when Sir Robert attempted to land at Western Bay to address a meeting there. A crowd of voters in sympathy with the Morris party warned him not to leave the steamer; but he persisted and was pushed over the wharf, fifteen feet high, into the sea. He saved himself from drowning by seizing the gunwale of a small boat nearby. The exposure of what is called the Bond Confederation plot then resulted in the ex-Premier making the counter charge that Sir Edward Morris, the present Premier, is in the pay of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who are said to be supplying the money for his electoral campaign. Walter Baine Grieve, a leading merchant and shipowner of St. John's, has been placed under arrest and accused of criminally libelling Sir Edward Morris, who is also suing the Bond newspaper organ in St. John's for $50,000 for seconding the charges alleged to have been made by Grieve.

Prison Farm For Canada.—On May 7, in the House of Commons at Ottawa, Mr. E. N. Lewis, M.P. for West Huron, gave notice of a resolution to set apart ten thousand acres in northern Ontario and ten thousand more in northern Quebec, contiguous to each other, as a prison farm, where all offenders and criminals, except those convicted of the most heinous crimes, may be imprisoned on indeterminate sentences at hard labor and kept there either at farming or making roads or metal for roads, or any other employment that will not interfere with free labor, until the inspector certifies that the prisoner is able and willing to earn his own living and it is proper to give him a chance to do so. The motive for this resolution is that the tramp evil is fast becoming a nuisance to Canada, and that the present system of herding together all prisoners within stone walls, where they cannot have proper occupations or any occupation without interfering with organized labor, tends to make more vicious those who might otherwise be reclaimed.

The Editor of the Sillon.—M. Marc Sanglier, the editor of the Sillon, is one of those Catholics who are wise in their own eyes and who know more than anyone else. He is aggressive against the persecutors of the Church, but more so against the Catholics who now suffer persecution. The Bishops have interdicted his journal. If he is a deluded man, and not merely desirous of going to Parliament both by the votes of Catholics and by those of the Bloc, the lesson he has lately received from the Bloc itself ought to bring him to his senses. Lately M. Sanglier, having been defeated as candidate for Sceaux, appealed to the Blocards, to whom he had truckled, and declared that M. Buisson, socialist deputy of Paris, had promised him the republican votes. The ungrateful socialist Huguenot deputy in a letter to the public has given M. Sanglier an answer that ought to cure his folly. The gist of it is that M. Sanglier is entirely wrong in thinking that conciliation is possible between the Republic, as the Bloc understands it, and the Church. The Bishops were right in telling him so.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The First Plenary Council of Canada

The annual Conference of the Archbishops of Canada, attended by all except Archbishop Langevin, of Manitoba, who was unavoidably absent, was held in the archiepiscopal residence in the Capital of the Dominion, during the month of April. Amongst the most notable of the affairs under consideration at its several sessions was the fixing of a date for the First Canadian Plenary Council. This event, of the highest importance to the Catholics of Canada, will have its solemn opening on Friday, the nineteenth of September of the current year, in the historic Basilica of Quebec, which is the primatial See of British North America.

There, two hundred and thirty-nine years before, the illustrious Laval founded that episcopacy, which has been ever since remarkable for its unswerving loyalty to the See of Rome; there Plessius fought the battle of civil and religious liberty after the British conquest had changed the political conditions of the French colonies; and there shall now meet a distinguished body of men, to deliberate not only upon religious questions, but on such social and economic problems as have a bearing upon the Church.

Of course, the secular papers have indulged in a variety of speculations as to the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Council. But it is absolutely certain that nothing definite in this regard has been made public. A scheme or draft of the proceedings to be followed has been for sometime past in preparation, and beyond doubt its scope will be both wide and varied, embracing such vital matters as education in its several branches, Catholic literature, the observance of festivals, with legislation, disciplinary or otherwise, which shall affect the general welfare of the Church.

It is safe to predict, that as in the case of other councils, this solemn hierarchical assemblage will be of immense service to the cause of religion, promoting new activities, and, as it were, solidifying the old. It will be a source of strength and of spiritual progress to the vast territory included in this empire of the West, wherein the constant influx of new and varied elements, by emigration from so many parts of the Old World, offer ever changing and complex conditions, which are commensurate with the steady growth of the Church.

Those taking part in the deliberations of this august assembly will include the Archbishops and Bishops, accompanied by a theologian or theologians, chosen from the clergy of their respective dioceses; also the Abbots and other heads of religious Orders. The council is convoked by the Most Rev. Donatus Sbarretti, Archbishop of Ephesus and Delegate Apostolic, who will also preside over its sessions.

The Anti-Duelling League

The anti-duelling movement, which has already done so much good in Europe, owes its success to the zeal and energy of Don Alfonso of Bourbon, Infante of Spain. In the year 1900, Marquis Antonio Tacoli and Count Joseph Ledochowski forfeited their military careers rather than fight duels which their religion forbade. This happened in Catholic Austria. Thereupon Don Alfonso wrote, 26 Aug., 1900, to Marquis Tacoli, proposing the organization of an anti-duelling league. On November 20, he wrote to Prince Löwenstein, begging him to take up the work in Germany; and soon after M. Du Bourg was enlisted to plead the cause in France. In the course of time Austria, Italy and Spain were approached. In a letter dated February 2, 1903, to Baron Sigismund Bischoffshausen, Don Alfonso sets forth the scope of the laws he would advocate, suggests the establishment of tribunals of honor, and that committees of ladies be asked to cooperate.

In January, 1901, a beginning was made in Germany, and on October 19th a meeting was held at Cipria and arrangements made for setting up a tribunal of honor. In September, 1903, a larger meeting was held at Frankfurt, in 1904 at Darmstadt, in 1905 at Cologne, in 1906 at Hanover. In 1907, when Prince Löwenstein, the president of the German branch, entered a monastery in Holland, he had established twenty committees, numbering three thousand members, including more than two hundred university professors. The 1907 meeting was held at Munich.

In France, M. Du Bourg formed his first committee in March, 1901. Early in 1902 he got together his tribunal of honor. The public press supported him, but for various reasons progress was slow. In 1907 an anti-duelling law was introduced into the Senate, with the sympathy of the Minister of War. And at the last meeting of the International Associated Press at Bordeaux it was resolved that the anti-duelling movement would be discussed at their next meeting.

In Austria only twelve men of influence showed sympathy with Don Alfonso's views in the beginning, but in 1901 the number rose to three hundred and thirty, and in a short time to fifteen hundred. A committee was established at Vienna, and Baron Thlumecky drew up a bill concerning duelling, which went through Parliament, on July 27, 1902, and became law on December 4, that year. In 1907 an Austrian anti-duelling league was formed; and in 1908 Budapest had the honor of holding the first international congress of the anti-duelling league. In Italy the work of organizing was entrusted to Marquis Crispolti, and it grew rapidly. In 1907 King Victor Emmanuel III became a patron, and Casana, the late Minister of War, and Orlanda, Minister of Justice, gave every encouragement. Assistance took on a practical form in Palermo, where all the doctors pledged themselves not to assist at duels; the faculty at Messina and Siena followed their example. This was a body-blow to duelling, the laws of which require the presence of a doctor from start to finish. Duelling is of rare occurrence in Belgium, but its anti-duelling league numbers eight hundred members.

In Spain the movement was helped by the regrettable death in a duel at Seville, of Marquis de Pikman, on October 11, 1904. The event made a profound impression on the country, and in December of that year a bill was introduced making duelling a common law offense. In October, 1906, King Alfonso became president of the league in Spain, and in 1908 it numbered twelve thousand members.

The proceedings at the great international meeting at Budapest have been published in a pamphlet entitled "Compte rendu du 1er congrès international contre le duel, Budapest, 4-6 Juin 1908."

Among other decisions arrived at, it was resolved (1) that Budapest be the international centre of the league; (2) that an international emblem be agreed on; (3) that the medical faculties everywhere be asked not to lend their presence at duels; (4) that the press be used to further the aims of the league, and that it be asked not to publish accounts of duels; (5) that children and the young in general be taught the barbarism and absurdity of duels; (6) that military commanders be asked to discourage duelling among their officers.

The next international meeting will be held at Turin in 1911.

The Maid and the Church

In the Boston Evening Transcript for May 6, under cover of a panegyric of the recently beatified Maid of Orleans, a correspondent from Nantucket has some very bitter things to say about the Catholic Church. The language of sixteenth century controversy is out of place in an enlightened and liberal age, and, to say the least, it is quite ungenerous, while admitting that "no character in history better deserves the title of saint than the peerless Maid of Orleans," to abuse the Catholic Church, the only power in the world capable of bringing the Maid into universal honor. What has the Transcript to say for itself? Is it a religious journal subsidized in the interests of ultra-Protestantism; or is it willing, under the guise of a purveyor of news, to become an organ for the dissemination of misstatements about the Catholic Church?

The Nantucket sage declares that "as you study her (Joan of Arc's) history you feel that no soul could be less like the ideal ecclesiastical Saint." Has the writer devoted any of his leisure hours to the reading of the lives of the saints? He will find in that wonderful catalogue of the canonized not only the cultured and refined, but along with them the outcast and the beggar: Thomas More, the Chancellor of England, and Edmund

Campion, the pride of Oxford University, side by side with Mary of Egypt the penitent, and Benedict Joseph Labre the pauper; Domitilla, the niece of a Roman Emperor, and John Berchmans the son of a shoemaker; Elizabeth the princess of Hungary with Zita the maid-of-all-work. What church pattern has been cut into shape to serve for the "ideal ecclesiastical Saint?"

The reader is informed that "there is no evidence that she devoted herself to virginity." No evidence! There is scarcely a case in history where the evidence is so overwhelming. There is not only the unanimous testimony of her contemporaries to the spotlessness of her life, but there is also her own repeated and sworn declaration that by direction of her Voices she had consecrated her virginity to God.

The oracular pronouncement that "the stately Church of Rome can add no lustre to the peerless Maid of Orleans," is belied by the writer's opening sentence: "I think every lover of heroic deeds and saintly living, whatever his religious sympathies might be, would have rejoiced with the vast crowd that stood under the mighty dome of St. Peter's when the Catholic Church added Joan of Arc to the bead roll of her saints." And, it is only natural to ask when in ten thousand churches throughout Christendom the Hosannas and Alleluias are chanted in her honor, when her praises are recounted from ten thousand pulpits, and prayerful multitudes invoke her intercession, is there no lustre which the Church of Rome can add to the simple record of a life which but for the Church's initiative would have lain buried in the dusty tomes of the libraries of France?

Then comes the statement that "She never became a miracle-monger, never assumed supernatural authority." But was it less than a miracle for an unlettered peasant girl, unskilled in the arts of war, to lead to victory the broken remnants of the king's army, outnumbered and demoralized, against an enemy strongly intrenched and flushed with success? How can one say that "she never assumed supernatural authority?" when she constantly declared that the Voices of Heaven spoke to her and that God Himself had commissioned her to repel the English invaders of her country and place Charles again on the throne of his fathers?

The writer notes with "profound satisfaction that the Church has no relics of the Maid. No withered and ghostly (or is this a misprint for ghastly?) remnants of her martyred body to carry in solemn procession or employ in the creation of new miracles." Where has he ever beheld the withered and ghostly (or ghastly) remnants of a martyr carried in solemn procession? Is not this assertion the creation of a mind diseased? It is not so long since the reputed remains or "remnants" of John Paul Jones were brought in solemn state to this country from an unhonored grave in Europe. A short time ago the crumbling remains of Major L'Enfant, the architect of the Capitol and the designer of "the city of magnificent distances," were taken in stately procession from the rotunda of the Capitol to the National Cemetery at Arlington, to be there reinterred with pomp and ceremony among the distinguished dead. Who, without offending every patriotic sentiment would, when referring to these posthumous honors, speak of "withered and ghostly remnants"? Why should the sacred dust of the heroes and heroines of the Church be treated with less respect?

"She cannot be confined to one communion, however great," says the writer, "she is the priceless possession of that Universal Church of which Rome is but a fragment and a sect." It is something new to hear the Church of Rome styled a fragment and a sect. A fragment is a portion and a sect is something cut off. Vesuvius cannot be called a fragment of the lava or a portion of the ashes she emits in eruption; two hundred and fifty millions are not a sect and history has still to reveal when and by whom they have been cut off from the One True Church founded by Christ. "Go teach all nations" defines her mission and explains her powers. As Christ died for all men, so the Church preaches for all, and among the many means she uses to attract the world to the authenticity of her claim to be the mouth-piece of the Holy Ghost and the Pillar of Truth, is the solemn ceremonial of beatification by which she holds up before the world her confessors and martyrs for the veneration of all, Christians and pagans alike.

Catholic Social Activity in the Trentino

There lies, to the north of Italy, a territory of about 3,000 square miles, which is known as the Trentino, after its capital town, Trent, famous in history for the Ecumenical Council held there from 1545 to 1563. It comprises the Giudicarie, Val del Noce, Val dell'Avisio, Val Sugana, and the country around the towns of Trent and Rovereto. Politically the Trentino belongs to Austria; ethnologically it forms part of Italy, since all its 366,000 inhabitants are Italians and use the Italian language.

Within recent years activity in social matters has been so greatly developed by Catholics as to claim the attention of economists and sociologists. It is a land of hills and valleys, with a population very largely rural, engaged in the trade of vineyards and silk worms, and farm stock; but with only very niggardly results. It had no industries, no exports, and but the most primitive methods of transit.

Added to this it is a land of violent storms which often brought the poor husbandman to the verge of ruin. Of late, too, the usurer, and the money lender had increased the wretchedness of the people. Traders held up the markets and demanded their own prices for the very necessities of life. Thus conditions of life were wretched and the outlook without hope.

A parish priest, Rev. Lorenzo Guetti, saw this lamentable state of affairs, and putting his trust in God set about stemming the tide of misery. He saw that the first thing to do was to put the people in touch with the manufacturers directly, and thus avoid middleman's profits. For this purpose cooperation was necessary; and so he founded "La Famiglia Cooperativa"; joined to this he planned to have rural banks on the Raiffeisen system to back up the enterprise. The first "Famiglia Cooperativa" was opened on September 28, 1890, in the village of Sta Croce; and the first rural savings bank in 1893. He died in 1898, lamented by a whole people who bless his memory.

From 1890 to 1894 progress was slow; in 1895 there were only 37 such Famiglie; in 1896 the number fell to 33; but at the end of 1900 there were 136, and in 1907 their number rose to 244, with a membership of 31,500, representing so many domestic households. The associations are run on the lines of a limited liability company, and each member subscribes the sum of $2.50. A glance at the balance sheets for the years 1896 and 1906 will give an idea of the progress made.

Money in hand	$12,150	$475,000
Money loaned	67,250	750,000
Goods in hand	172,250	675,000
Real estate	15,250	330,000
Total working capital	267,500	1,840,000
Capital subscribed	37,750	313,925

This capital of $313,925 is backed by a guaranteed capital of $2,500,000. The associates were, of course, the direct gainers from the plan, and the 30,000 households belonging to them are no longer at the mercy of exorbitant prices for foodstuffs. Up to the year 1897-98 the savings effected in the purchase of wares have amounted to $259,000, and at that time the movement was only in its infancy; nowadays it amounts to more than $250,000 a year. Moreover the tradesmen must sell at the same prices as these cooperative stores or lose their customers.

Father Guetti was no less successful with his banking system. The first was established in 1893; at the end of 1907 there were 156, representing 18,000 shareholders. They appeal to a rural population because the directors and auditors give their services free; speculation is forbidden; and in the Trentino no one can become a shareholder unless he is known to be a good industrious and honest Catholic.

In 1896 the loans amounted to $58,400, an average of $43.00 per member; in 1906 the loans amounted to $1,841,750, an average of $111.00 per member. In 1896 the amount of savings deposited was $145,725; and in 1906, $4,053,250. Attempts have been made to unite the various trades in cooperative societies, but so far no great results have been obtained. About twenty wine-growers' associations have been formed, as well as an electric light company, a carpenters' union, a blacksmiths' union, and a few others.

In 1896, as a further safeguard for the future, the Rural Banks and the co-operative societies formed a Fédération, having an office in Trent. Among its objects are:

(1) To encourage thrift and economy among the agricultural classes and to foster the good work of the societies. (2) To work for progress, and bring about better legislation in matters concerning technical instruction. (3) To control expenses by periodic auditing. (4) To protect their own moral, material and legal rights. (5) To control investments and supplies. (6) To mutually work for each other's interests. The Fédération consists of a Cooperative Societies' Council with its president, and a Rural Bank Council with its president. They meet in General Congress and elect a Federal Council.

In 1896 this Fédération consisted of 87 societies and 27 banks; at the end of 1907 there were 243 co-operative societies, 155 rural banks, 8 trades unions, and 7 other associations in the Fédération, with a membership of 48,900 persons.

For sake of greater uniformity it was agreed that one and the same method of bookkeeping be adopted in the banks and in the stores; and for this purpose instruction classes were opened.

Between 1896 and 1906 the classes were attended by 621 pupils, of whom only 53 were rejected on examination as unqualified. The Fédération lays great stress on the auditing. Between 1896 and 1906, no less than 902 auditings took place, representing 3,935 days' work; in 1907 alone there were 167 auditings.

It issues its own periodical, "La Cooperazione Trentina," which appears quarterly and is very skillfully edited. The Fédération is quite a power, and the Austrian Government recognizes this and employs it when legally auditing the books of other societies. A central bank was created to invest the surplus capital of the rural banks and the savings of the Co-operative Societies. This is the Banca Cattolica Trentina (limited), founded in 1898. After ten years' life it has, beside its main buildings at Trent and Rovereto, twenty-one branches scattered all over the Trentino, and at the end of 1908 it had a deposit account of $5,250,000. And among other things it has built an electric mountain railway in the Val del Noce. This is the first railway built and worked exclusively by Italians, subject to Austria, without the assistance of Germans.

From the Banca Cattolica sprang the Banca Industriale, which opened in 1908 with a working capital of $250,000, and has already done great things for industry in the Trentino.

Then again the various cooperative stores found the necessity of having one great central store, buying goods at wholesale prices and selling to the branches at a small percentage. Hence in 1900 arose the Sindacato agricolo-industriale, and in a few years it had 260 associate societies. In 1904 it built magnificent stores and offices in Trent near the Railway Station. Its guaranteed capital is $92,250, with a paid-up capital of $18,750, and in 1907 it did a trade of more than $1,250,000 with its own branches in foodstuffs, cloth, domestic and agricultural utensils, machinery, etc. It began with only one salesman and one delivery boy; after eight years it has now twenty-four salesmen and twelve delivery men.

Even the pottery kilns have been united on a co-operative basis that bids to revolutionize the pottery trade. In one single valley this plan has brought the country people a gain of $50,000 in one year. Already there are more than ten of these cooperative kilns, and the number will go on increasing. In consequence of all this the Trentino is one of the most flourishing countries in the world, one of the most advanced in the field of cooperative organization as the result of Catholic activity. The clergy, knowing the needs of their people, entered heart and soul into the work; then the Catholic young men from the universities banded together and carried on a propaganda by means of conferences and lectures; the press, especially the daily Trentino and the popular weekly, Squilla, lent a hand. These are widely read papers, the Squilla having a circulation of 20,000 among 360,000 people. Another cause of success has been the integrity of the administration and firmness in the choice of employees. Socialism can make no headway in the Trentino. The people recognize the clergy and the Catholic party as their best friends; and on election day, 14th May, 1907, they sent to the Viennese Chamber the candidates chosen by the Catholic Party, which is officially known as the "Trentine Popular Party."

Their religion is all the more dear to the people since they owe the economic salvation of their country to their fellow Catholics.

Organization of Belgian Houses of Retreat

Organization is necessary in everything. Haphazard methods may accidentally produce success on one occasion or another, but they effectually prevent it if continued. This is especially true of religious effort of every sort where everything must tend to keep alive and fortify the motives of zeal which it is the purpose to render fruitful. If Our Lord thought three years not too long to form His Apostles for their missionary labors, we ought not to expect to form a body of apostles in one retreat or two, much less in the missions that are given to the faithful generally. Solitude and prayer in the retreat, the means used by Our Lord, are the means that we also must make use of. A few days of silence and prayer may really teach the soul more than years of prayer when one has all the distractions of life about him, when the world and life are too much with us to allow us to see them for what they really are.

This organization must include the gathering of recruits and the preparation and maintenance of Houses of Retreats. The first of these is naturally the most important. Very few men are so disposed as to fall in at once with the proposition made them to leave their families, work and friends and plunge at once into such a very new and very unknown thing as a retreat. Experience shows that if the man is too easily persuaded he derives very little fruit. Hurry is the arch enemy of this eminently spiritual work. Those who go out into the highways and byways a few days before the retreat is to begin to invite the first comer and press him to enter, even at the expense of some slight deception as to what is required of him—coloring the retreat and its real earnestness and purpose to prepare for zeal and sacrifice so that it seems not very different from an excursion or a reunion with a confession at the end—do the work serious and irreparable harm. No one is benefited, the work is harmed. Grace ordinarily works slowly and hardly comes except when desired. This desire to make a serious retreat is what is first to be implanted in the mind of the prospective visitor. And it is altogether in line with the zeal to sacrifice oneself for the furtherance of God's work that the retreatant should defray his expenses at least in part. He begins with a sacrifice and God blesses sacrifice. He appreciates more what has cost him something. He feels more the utter freedom of his action and so he returns more spontaneously. And experience has shown that when this initial sacrifice is left entirely to another the work is appreciably less successful and the results less lasting.

This may seem to add difficulties to those already existing. In the mining districts of Belgium everything discouraged effort—atheistic conferences, libraries of impious and blasphemous books, Sunday labor, hard drinking, gambling, societies for civil burial, a blasphemous press, the "red" Easter and Christmas, discouraged effort just as much as they clamored for the necessity of it. And they still exist to make it difficult. Only organization and the co-operation of the priest and his parishioners can make any headway. "Boards of men" and "Boards of women" act with and under the parish priest to recruit the retreatants and help to defray their expenses. These boards go out among the workers, meet them on a footing of equality, interest themselves in their homes and families, and when the proper subjects are found propose the retreat. But the workingman himself is the recruiting agent of most success. With one or two others of his parish he has been the first to pass a few days at the House of Retreats. On his return he is besieged by questioners and he is an apostle on the instant if the grace of God has touched him during the retreat. He returns the next year with others who have been gained by his encouragement and much more by his changed life. A few may bring a great many—some miners returned to Fayt with twenty-one men from their shifts in the coal pits of Hainaut—even partly paying their expenses to make the first step easier. Socialist leaders, too, have been invited, and open minded "indifferents," who have on occasion gone back to their work real apostles of Jesus Christ among the men they had hitherto helped to lead astray. But in every choice the necessity of having men who have influence and are leaders is kept in view. St. Ignatius destined his "Exercises" for them, and it is in reforming them that the purpose of that work is attained. In the more Catholic parts of Belgium, more, of course, is demanded of those who are sent to the retreats. None are taken under eighteen years of age, few over fifty-five, and all these are men who may return real leaders and helpers of the priest in his parish work. The retreats are not meant as a development of the "mission" in any way. They are a school for apostles and they search out earnest men to make apostles of them.

Much effort has gone to making the Houses of Retreat attractive. When once they have been established, all decoration as well as ornamentation is due to the generosity of the retreatants. The rooms are airy, light-some and scrupulously clean. Large gardens and cheerful recreation halls hung with popular engravings of scenes of the Holy Scriptures are everywhere. The cost of a retreat to a workingman is about ten francs, which cover the expense of his maintenance for three days. Railway-fare must be added to this. The problem of finding this money is a real one for the average wage earner. But again the Christian generosity of men and women who have the real betterment of their fellow-Catholics sincerely at heart has found a way. Often an employer counts the expenses of a retreat for his men as a part of his expenses or investment for the year; often, as at Tronchiennes, a committee gets together the groups of retreatants, and gathers enough to pay the expenses of their stay. In nearly every deanery there is a committee of patronesses of rank or position who ask alms from door to door to make the retreat possible for men and girls. The interest of five hundred francs assures the making of two retreats annually; seven francs of the ten is the average amount the workman is able to pay—conditions which would be much rarer in the United States, where our workmen are better paid.

The retreat is useless unless its fruits remain. It gives a determination to lead a life of apostolic virtue, not that life itself. Organization again enters to make the results sure. The parish priest gathers his retreatants in a "cenacle," which meets regularly for exercises of piety, and to learn from one another the practical results of their apostleship. When their number has grown to about twenty they become a Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, membership in which carries with it many indulgences. The soul of the Confraternity is a Council composed of a president, a secretary, a treasurer, and several counsellors, which meets the curé every month in a special session, and through it he acts. There are monthly publications, too, "The Cenacle in the Twentieth Century," "Manresa," "League of the Retreatants of Alken," to help out the living word. The Confraternity meets monthly, generally on the first Sunday, and when the exercises of piety are done with, there is an Apostolic session, when the interests of the parish are discussed and the work of the retreats pushed forward. General Communions are frequent. Every doubt as to the practical character of this feature of the work is set at rest by the more than four hundred Confraternities which flourish in the sphere of action of the House of Retreats of Fayt alone. The work of the Confraternities is completed by the "General Recollection" which takes place twice a year. Each parish of the district becomes in turn the centre of the "Recollection." On the Sunday set apart there is a general Communion in the home parish where the reunion is held with their banners and music, all wearing the Retreatants' button and singing their own hymns. Such a gathering will count as many as five hundred or six hundred men. One of the clergy encourages them to perseverance and then a lay speaker passes in review the more recent efforts and successes and difficulties of the work; after the discussion there are games, followed by Solemn Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. There are some fifty such Recollections yearly. These divisional meetings have given rise to Cantonal Federations, which combine the Confraternities of a Canton and give them the extent of action and power necessary to establish firmly the social action. Preparations are about complete to add a "Syndicate," to each Confraternity when the social side of the work will be more in view.

One might fill pages with instances of the returns to God and duty which the retreats have brought about. Here is one that is entirely accurate, and may be taken as an example of many others. "In my district," it is a committee member who writes, "there was a workman sadly in need of reform. He was an inveterate drunkard with all that drunkenness brings with it. His wife was the especial object of his cruelty; the Church had not known him for years. He was completely changed by the retreat. The morning after his return home from the House of Retreats one of his neighbors called on me and asked to be allowed to go with the next band of retreatants. "Why, my friend," I asked, "do you wish to go now?" "Well," he answered, "yesterday such a one came home from the retreat with tears in his eyes, and threw himself at the feet of his wife, whom he has cruelly beaten every day, and begged her pardon. I heard him say amid his sobs: 'My wife, God has bitterly reproached me for my fearful conduct towards you. Let us thank together the Sacred Heart for His goodness.' I heard all that and I saw all that. I am not much better than my neighbor. If the fathers have converted him, they can convert me." It is thus that profound changes of life are seen very frequently.

Now that a really apostolic generosity has begun the work among ourselves, it only remains that it be carried out in the same apostolic spirit.

Missions for Children

A movement intended to check the leakage in the Church in this country has recently been inaugurated, and although it is yet in its infancy is destined rapidly to become a great power for good. Hundreds, thousands of young men and women, leave the healthier and safer and saner life of the country, to seek employment in our large cities. It is found by those who have somewhat extensively investigated this question, that a large proportion of these join condemned societies for the supposed material advantages, and, of course, with a resultant fearful loss to the Church.

If the faith and morals of the young man or young woman who plunges into the vortex of city life are to be guarded and saved, it is evident that a strong and deep foundation of both must be laid in the earlier and more impressionable period of life. To help to accomplish this desirable end, a movement along the line of Children's Missions has been inaugurated in some of the Middle Western States. Such missions have already been given in Illinois, Missouri and Wisconsin, and they promise to be of immense practical value.

It is well understood that a side mission for children during the time of a mission for the grown people of a parish is, generally, but a poor affair. This is admitted by the most zealous of missionaries. The little people are more or less unavoidably pushed aside by reason of the larger demands from the older people of a parish. This would not be of much importance where there is a well equipped parochial school in which the children receive ample and regular catechetical instruction under pastoral supervision, and where sodalities, the League and other pious organizations exist and flourish.

In parishes, however, where no parochial schools exist—the "Catholic Directory" can reveal some startling facts in this regard—and where the religious instruction of a formal character, which the children receive, is given after a late High Mass and sermon, by a tired and still fasting pastor, it is, at very best, not all that could be desired. One can easily understand this. Even pastors are human and have but limited powers of endurance.

Experience often shows that even when instruction is given in the afternoon, in country parishes and smaller towns, it is but poorly attended. Children who can ride home in a farm wagon after Mass with their parents do not care—at least not many of them—to walk two or three miles, which they must do if they attend the afternoon Sunday school or catechism class.

Ours is an age of specializations. If you specialize in favor of any class you immediately arrest the attention of that class. Specialize in favor of children by summer missions, or doctrinal retreats, for them alone, and they are immediately drawn to you. It is said that in our day parents are very obedient to their children. Experience has shown that in these specialized missions the grown members of the family become alert and will do everything possible to help the little ones make them, and in but a few years it will be these little ones who are flocking into the cities. Deplore the fact as we may, it is a recognized fact that the greatest leakage arises among those coming from country parishes. It is to be hoped that this movement, which is certainly according to the mind of the great White Shepherd of Christendom, will become general throughout the United States.

Rev. A. Janssen, S.V.D.

The Rev. Arnold Janssen, a secular priest of the diocese of Münster, was born on the 5th of November, 1837, of deeply religious parents at Goch, in the Rhine province. After his classical studies at Gæsdonk, he entered the University of Bonn. He finished his theological studies at Münster and was ordained priest. His bishop entrusted to him the direction of the Apostleship of Prayer. To devote himself more exclusively to this and similar work, he retired to the Ursuline Convent in the City of Thomas à Kempis, where he started the Kleiner Herz-Jesu-Bote, or Little Messenger of the Sacred Heart. It was a small monthly publication, but it contained stirring articles on the need of prayer and appeals to the hearts of the faithful in behalf of foreign missions. At that time the old Franciscan Missionary Bishop Raimondi paid him a visit, and Father Janssen intimated to him the necessity of a German Mission House. "Found one yourself," was the Apostolic Vicar's short answer, and this word fell like a spark into his burning soul. He laid the matter before his readers and asked for contributions. A poor servant girl sent the savings of her life, 500 dollars! God blessed this offering wonderfully. Father Janssen resigned his position as Chaplain, and with four companions moved into a little inn he had purchased the year before at Steyl, and called it "St. Michael's Mission House"; the sign of the inn was replaced by a crucifix. It was in the dreary time of the Kulturkampf, and many prophesied failure for the undertaking, though practically all the bishops of Germany, Austria, and Holland were in favor of it. In spite of difficulties he went bravely ahead. "May the Heart of Jesus live in all hearts!" was his and his companion's daily invocation, and the Sacred Heart blessed them. Within a year, the house numbered four priests, and a fair number of pupils. Rev. J. B. Anzer and the Rev. F. Freinademetz were the first missionaries sent out to China in 1878. Applications became numerous and almost every year new additions had to be built.

In 1885 the young community adopted the name of "Society of the Divine Word." It consists of priests and brothers who work according to their state for the same common end—the spreading of the Gospel and civilization among the heathen. The course of studies for the priests lasts thirteen years. The brothers are trained and skilled in all sorts of trades to meet the practical requirements of the missions.

The Rules and Constitution of the Society were officially approved in 1905. In 1889 a central house for higher studies, where all the pupils of the different colleges of the Society are brought together, was established at Mödling near Vienna, Austria. A small college for the pursuit of special theological and philosophical studies was started in Rome as early as 1888. At present the Society of the Divine Word numbers in all about 500 priests, 700 brothers, and 1,100 students, preparing for the priesthood. It has missions in China, Japan, Africa and New Guinea; in Argentine, Chili and Brazil of South America, and in North America, a Negro Mission at Vicksburg, St. Joseph's Technical School and since February of this year, St. Mary's Mission House at Techny, Illinois. From the reports of his missionaries, the Very Rev. Founder saw the great advantage of female cooperation, especially in China, and after careful reflection in 1892 he started a small house for missionary sisters. This congregation, which later took the name of "Servants of the Holy Ghost," has since grown to astonishing proportions. It numbers no less than 450 missionary and thirty cloistered sisters, who work faithfully and successfully among the women and girls in all the missions of the Society. As soon as space would permit, Father Janssen opened his house for the giving of retreats, in which from 6,000 to 7,000 men take part every year. The sisters' mission house offers the same opportunity to women and girls. His desire to benefit souls also led him to do all in his power for the spreading of good literature. The Steyl House has a printing establishment which turns out hundreds of books, and publishes the monthlies, Stadt Gottes, and Steyler Missionsbote, the Catholic Missions in Dutch. In South America the Society publishes a German and Spanish weekly, in North America a German, English and Dutch St. Michael's Almanac, and a German and English Monthly: Amerikanisches Missionblatt and the Christian Family. The Mission press in China publishes a Chinese weekly.

Arnold Janssen has been called to his eternal reward. The members of his two Societies mourn his loss. He was an indefatigable worker, gifted with an unusual strength of body and soul. Last December he was stricken with partial paralysis, and after a seeming recovery passed away at one o'clock on the morning of January 15th. His intimate friend, Bishop Frehmanns of Roermond spoke touching words to the assembled priests and laymen who had come to pay the departed one the last honors. He was buried in the little chapel that crowns the top of the cemetery. There he sleeps and rests from his work, but the memory of his life will always remain with those who knew him. He was always a strict religious, a devout priest, a kind-hearted father.

May his humble soul rest in peace!

CORRESPONDENCE

Italian Views and News

ROME, APRIL 30.

In political circles the absence of our Ambassador from Constantinople just now is a puzzle. Curiously enough the same thing happened last year when the Sultan was obliged to grant the Constitution. The wise ones are saying that Marquis Imperiali's absence is due to orders from the Foreign Office, which is anxious to keep out of trouble. Despatches from Turkey are frequent and contradictory, but probably the Foreign Office knows all that is going on, though owing to the Ambassador's absence it does not or need not know it officially. In any case, the principle of non-interference so dear to European diplomacy is responsible for the massacre of 15,000 Armenian Christians.

Italian economists have been eagerly debating the wheat question, and the Deputies have been taking sides in the debate. Even the Government party is split into three camps on the matter, free-traders, protectionists and the undecided. Ought Italy have free-trade in corn, or is it not better to protect home-grown corn against Russian, Argentinian and American markets? The Socialists want all tariff removed, the Radicals want it removed temporarily, the Agricultural Deputies want it lowered temporarily, and the remaining Deputies are in favor of lowering the tax on corn for a time. The question affects revenue as well as home production. The debate brought out two facts (1) that Italy is unable to grow corn enough for its own consumption; (2) that speculators are responsible for the present high price of corn.

The opening of the annual exposition of Fine Arts at Venice is an event of international importance. This year the ceremony took place on April 24, and the Prince of Udine, the eldest son of the Duke of Genoa, represented the king. Bavaria, Belgium, Great Britain and Hungary sent contingents. One room of the exposition contained the works of American sculptors living in Paris, and another the great collection sent from New York. Unfortunately it contains no specimens by Duve-neck, Innes or Chase; nevertheless the "Mother and Son," by Cecilia Beaux; "Mrs Brice," by Sargent; the "Young Girl in Black," by Berry; the landscapes by Blakelock, Bunce, Martin, Wyant, Grott, Davis and Carlsen were warmly praised. The portraits by Miller, who makes his home in Paris, are examples of an unusual delicacy of observation.

On Sunday April 25, there took place at St. Peter's the Beatification of Ven. Eudes, founder of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary, and of the Order of Our Lady of Charity. The Congregation was instituted at Caen in 1643, dispersed in 1792, and reconstituted in 1826. An old Oratorian himself, his spirit and method are largely drawn from St. Philip Neri.

It has been computed that the influx of visitors to Rome during the recent beatifications benefited Roman trade to the amount of twenty-five millions of francs. However, as nearly all the hotels of Rome are owned by foreigners the Romans proper are not the gainers. As usual the cabmen tried to reap a harvest from the pilgrims, and in consequence the municipality has confiscated more than sixty drivers' licenses for overcharging.

Apropos of the Blessed Jeanne d'Arc celebrations, the Duke of Orleans, head of the House of France, has written a letter to the Duke of Alençon which is going the rounds of the press, and which claims the recent celebrations as gain for the Royalist cause. The Church, however, is above parties, and Pope Pius X made this clear in his address to the French Episcopate and pilgrims on the nineteenth and twentieth of April.

Extrema gaudii luctus occupat (weeping stands upon the skirts of laughter). On Sunday the twenty-fifth of April, Mgr. Sincero went from Rome to Naples to celebrate Mass on board the royal cruiser "Napoli" and bless the banner presented to the ship by the ladies of Naples. The commander of the vessel, Umberto Caqui, is a splendid type of sailor, and it was he who accompanied the Duke of Abruzzi on the occasion of the North Pole expedition. Hardly forty-eight hours after the ceremony at Naples, naval circles were in mourning over the loss of the Foca, a submarine, in the same Bay of Naples, caused by the bursting of a can of benzine. Ten lives were lost and all on board were injured.

Among the echoes of the first eight sittings of the new chamber there is one which at all costs is being interpreted as a political change of front on the part of the Vatican. I refer to the speech of the Catholic Deputy, Camerani, which would have been perfect had not its author allowed himself to be carried away by impulse once during its delivery. Fired by the cheap, but continued insults of the Extreme Left, he did not hesitate to make a public avowal of acceptance of the events that had made Rome the capital of Italy. That all the Catholics who had entered the chamber were of a like mind was well known, but no one expected such a public avowal without any precise demand for it. In consequence it was argued that the Vatican had entered on new relations with official Italy. But it should be observed that while Camerani owes his election to the suspension of the non-expedit, neither he nor his political co-religionists represents the Vatican on that account, nor does he represent the whole Catholic party, many of whom do not belong to the group that elected him. Hence his action and that of his friends can in no way implicate the Vatican, which continues in the line of conduct followed by it during the past forty years. The most that can be made of the incident is that it is a symptom of the state of things among a section of the Catholic party. But to see the Vatican at the back of it is to make a mountain out of a molehill. It only remained for some one to prophesy a tightening of the reins at the Vatican on the non-expedit question, but there are no grounds for such prophecy just yet. Rome is in no hurry, and will do what she thinks best. The prophet's trade is an uncertain one.

A new Dominican University will be opened in Rome next November. The Dominicans share with the Jesuits the glory of leading in the education of clerics who go to Rome to complete their studies. Up to 1870 they had the splendid convent of St. Maria della Minerva, near the Roman College, but after the occupation of Rome their convent was confiscated and has since been used by the public Board of Education. The Dominicans bought a new building and struggled to keep alive the ashes of their former university. For some months now they have been building in the most central part of the city, near the Via Nazionale and the railway station. There they hope not only to rival their former greatness, but to surpass it. The chairs of moral and dogmatic theology will be subdivided into theoretical and historical theology. Exegesis, after a preparatory course of Hebrew, Egypttian and Greek, will be treated under the heads of Methodology, Textual Criticism and History of Exegesis: Church history will have the assistance of lectures on paleography, diplomatics, and auxiliary sciences. The program is wide and varied, and to carry it through the cleverest men of the Order are to be employed. It has the encouragement of the Holy Father, and the scope of the work is so widely different from that carried on by other universities in Rome that there is no danger of undue competition. The Gregorian University, for instance, continues and promises to continue in the lead for the learning of its professors and the cosmopolitan character of its student body.

The reform of the Roman Curia goes on wisely. The High Court of the Rota is about to be completed by the addition of two auditors representing Austria and Spain. All hitherto existing difficulties have been overcome, and the day before yesterday Bolletino della S. Sede publishes the first decision of the new Court in an Italian case involving Jus patronatus which fully recognizes the rights of the lay patrons. Rumor has it that we may soon have an important papal document on a matter of special concern to priests.

The school question, so much debated in England, Belgium and Canada, has taken a serious form in Constantinople. The fault does not lie with the Young Turks or the Porte Government. The evil of the situation arises from the action of paid French agents who are trying to bring about laicization of the schools à la Française. Two years ago they hoped to lead Italy along the same road, and invented clerical scandals in schools, only to find themselves hoist with their own petard. Their game now is to keep the Mussulman children from the Catholic schools. The French lay schools in Constantinople are almost empty, and those of the religious congregations are flourishing. In consequence reports have been circulated that proselytism was going on. The gentlemen of the bloc consider that Catholic is synonymous with anti-French, and so they war against Christianity even among the Turks. This is clear from an article in the Temps, which labors to show that the congregational schools are a hindrance to French expansion—for French, read anti-religious). The congregations may be grateful that on Turkish soil they have more liberty than in their native land, and the esteem and friendship of the Turks will enable them to go on doing good work for God and fatherland. In any case none but the atheists approve of this latest move on the part of the irreligious government of France.

Wishing to make capital out of the beatification of Jeanne d'Arc, the bloc raised a cry that the whole affair was an anti-Republican manifesto planned by the Monarchists and the Vatican. The very facts of the case and the denial issued by the Vatican give the lie to such a charge as far as the Vatican is concerned. Party feeling rejects nothing to further its own ends; and if the rival factions that rend the French nation make use of the occasion for unworthy purposes, that is their own affair.

On good authority it is rumored that one of the effects of the beatification will be to unite all French Catholics in defense of their religion, as they have been so often advised by the popes. The disunion among Catholics is the strength of the bloc. The recent action of the Federation of Labor, and its declared hostility to all parliamentary government, have shown Catholics the necessity of sacrifice for the common good. The promised sinking of differences and union of forces seem too good to be true.

We have had another of Emperor William's periodic visits to Italy, reminding us of the feudal pomp that always accompanied the great Barbarossa. Preceded by his Chancellor the Emperor arrived at Venice on April 14, with a suite occupying eleven Pullman cars, an enormous quantity of luggage and a number of automobiles. The visit is of no political import, as the Imperial party is on its way to Corfú for a fortnight's holiday.

The King of England recently passed through Genoa to meet his yacht for a cruise in the Mediterranean. Rumor has it that he will meet the King of Italy at Naples before long, and it is thought the meeting may have political results.

Recent events at Constantinople go to prove that the Eastern question is still unsettled, and that the Balkan affair is by no means done with. Since the proclamation of the Constitution, the Turks have seen the prestige of their country diminishing. They have lost suzerainty over Bulgaria; all claim over Herzegovina; and Turkey has no weight in foreign affairs. In spite of the Young Turks the true Mussulman has no desire for parliamentary representation, and the days gone by are the days that are longed for. The Young Turks are objects of suspicion, and on the whole their action has been more daring than wise. When the Young Turks Committee suppressed the old Government party, it was only right that they should carry on the Government till a new party came into power. But that they should go on making laws after a Parliament and a Senate had been constituted was a mistake. The Parliament thus became nothing more or less than their secretary; the dissenting party thereupon took the opportunity of stirring up Mussulman fanaticism and of playing on the claims of an ill-paid army to precipitate a crisis. The present situation, far from being a counter-revolution, is merely an episode in a series of party campaigns and changes of ministers, that have made the past year eventful in Turkish history.

In talking the matter over some days ago with a Foreign diplomatist, he remarked very sadly: "Between the two parties it will fare badly for the Christians," and events have proved the truth of his prediction. It is to be hoped the European concert will quickly find a means of restoring order which seems beyond the power of the new regime. Masonic France, which has been very busy along the Bosphorus, is not likely to do much to assist Christians. Its action on the school question, as noted in a former letter, is a sign of the times. The Oriental volcano is active, and Italy is seriously troubled over it. Her interests there are very great, and during the recent scare Government bonds fell ten points, and are not showing signs of improvement.

Very slow progress has been made in rebuilding Messina, real activity being blocked by endless red-tape. The Socialists are busy in the neighborhood, and have gathered around them the lawless elements there, and are taking the opportunity of local discontent to help the Separatist party, which for the present is not very dangerous. Anxious to see how events were progressing, the King and Queen, as soon as parliament dissolved, set out for Sicily accompanied by the Minister of Marine, a bluff sailor who cares as much or as little for Catholics and priests as he does for the foam in the wake of his ship. Deeds rather than newspaper stories or comments will prove the value of this visit, and from time to time I shall report what is taking place.

Social Activity in Belgium

On the second Sunday of April the Belgian Socialists held their annual meeting in the "Maison du Peuple" in Brussels, with M. Demblon, deputy from Liège in the Chair. An account was first read of the work done by the party in Parliament, in which it was shown that the Socialists had put 378 interpellations to the Ministers and that they had made their chief attack against the government's colonial policy in annexing the Congo. In accordance with their program, several bills had been introduced, the principal one being a bill for universal suffrage, giving each man one vote. Interesting figures were presented, showing the increase of workingmen enrolled in socialist societies. In 1905 there were 31,181; in 1906, 42,491; in 1907, 55,840; while in 1908 there were 67,418. In spite of this uniform progress the leaders complained that the miners held aloof from the movement, and that only 10,000 out of 53,000 had joined the various organizations. The military question aroused a warm discussion. Mr. Vandervelde's resolutions were finally adopted by the assembled delegates, a concession granted to his position as the socialist leader in Parliament. These resolutions are as follows: (1) compulsory service for all able-bodied men; (2) active service of from three to six months for the infantry, and from six months to a year for the others; (3) the reduction of the total length of service to six from thirteen years; (4) the repeal of the law exempting teachers, seminarists and priests, with the privilege, however, of continuing their studies uninterruptedly and doing military training upon the completion of the course. M. Hubert, Minister of Commerce and Labor, announced that he would introduce an important bill in Parliament, providing an annual pension for miners, to be made up of the joint contributions of the workingmen, the employers and the State, the depository to be the State casse de retraite. The State would pay nine francs yearly, and the workingman and employer fifteen francs each. The importance of the bill cannot be overestimated, for if the principle of cooperation of employer and the State is applied to the pensions of miners, it will eventually be applied also to other workingmen, which, indeed, was one of the wishes most earnestly expressed in the recent socialist meeting at Brussels. It is easy to see what an important step this is toward the solution of some of the social grievances. W.

Easter Sunday saw the close of a series of Lenten conferences in the Cathedral of Ghent, given by Père Rutten, O.P., in which social works received no small consideration. It will be remembered that it was Père Rutten who, along with M. A. Verhægen, President of the Belgian Democratic League, was the organizer of what is known as the "Syndicats Chrétiens," or Christian Trades Unions. In August, 1904, there were 10,000 workingmen enlisted as members; by 1908 the members had increased to 36,000. Two causes are assigned for this rapid increase of membership. The first is the undeniable value of these Christian associations, for it is Christianity alone that can bring happiness to the workingman, since of all religions it alone preaches charity and justice as well as hope in a future life with its rewards and punishments. The Socialist "Syndicats" defend the workingmen's interests strenuously and perseveringly, but they blunder in waging war on religion, on the family, and on political institutions, all three essential for the well being of the laborer. The rapid growth of the "Syndicats Chrétiens" is likewise attributable to the devotedness and self sacrifice of the organizers of the movement. Père Rutten said recently: "In England and Germany the number of employees actually engaged in our social propaganda is very large. We are determined not to rest until we succeed in increasing the number of those who will be able to consecrate all their activity to the development of the Syndicats Chrétiens." Those who engage in the propaganda must be chosen from among the best in each profession with great care, in order to have the best assurances of progress and success. For some years there has existed in Europe an international board of the Syndicats Chrétiens. In July, 1908, an international congress was held in Zurich, Switzerland, representing eight different nations: Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria, Holland, Italy, Russia and Sweden. Three important conclusions were arrived at. (1) That foundations of the "Syndicats Chrétiens" should be recommended for all countries; (2) That a national federation be formed in each country; (3) That the latter should be under the direction of an international committee, residing at Cologne. M. Stegerwald was chosen as Secretary of the International Committee. D.

A Question of Efficiency?

BISHOP'S HOUSE, LEEDS, ENGLAND, APRIL 27, 1909.

In view of the Educational strife that exists in this country, a few extracts from a Report made by His Majesty's Inspectors on a Catholic Secondary School in Leeds may be of interest to your readers. I may say that, although Leeds has a population of 450,000 of which nearly 40,000 are Catholics, until a few years ago it possessed no Catholic Secondary School. For some time there has been a thoroughly good secondary school for girls, taught by the Notre Dame Sisters, at which girls are trained for the teaching profession. This school is recognized by the Government and receives aid both from Government and from the Local Authority. In addition, there is a Catholic secondary school for boys, started four years ago by the Jesuit Fathers, and it now numbers 150 pupils. Up to the present it has received only a lower grant from the Government. When it was proposed a few months ago that the Local Authority should recommend it to the Government for the higher grant, as fulfilling a necessary part in the secondary education of the city, aspersions were cast by certain bigoted members of the City Council on the teaching staff of the school. "I say," said one of these gentlemen, "that the school is not staffed in a proper manner for an elementary school. . . . It is a school which is not fulfilling its proper part in the secondary education of the city."

Accordingly, a request was made that the school should be thoroughly inspected by Government officials. The following are extracts taken from their Report, and published by a local paper: The Inspectors believe that the school is "a valuable addition to the educational establishments of the city," that the staff have "received an academic and technical training much longer than that usually enjoyed by teachers in secondary schools even of the first grade; that "the level of teaching ability is very high"; that the teachers "in every case appear to have fully profited by the facilities they have enjoyed." "In the treatment of the literary subjects of the curriculum especially, all the masters showed a degree of knowledge and intellectual power fully equal to that which one finds in secondary schools of the first grade, and much beyond that which is the usual standard in other secondary schools." In Latin, "the teaching throughout is of unusual merit." "Great freedom is allowed to the boys; this is a sign of the great control which the staff have over them, and the discipline is usually good." "Since the school started there has been a rapid increase in numbers, which shows that it meets a real want. The great majority of the pupils would probably, but for it, never have had any higher education, and it seems very free from any kind of social exclusiveness. Many of the pupils are doing really well, and, even those who make least progress generally, seemed to be interested in and to profit by their work."

The above Report, as may be supposed, has given great satisfaction to the Catholics of Leeds. For years they have felt the need of Secondary schools, the parents, who desired better education for their children, having to send them to Protestant schools. But the poverty of the Catholics generally, the huge burden of their elementary schools, until a few years ago when it was taken over by the State, and the missionary requirements of a rapidly increasing population, effectually prevented their undertaking the additional burden of secondary schools. Then come the Notre Dame Sisters who provided a school for girls—followed by the Jesuits, who have done the same for boys. That the Government is prepared to recognize and assist these institutions, is proof, in spite of the blatant outcry of Nonconformity, that the country at large wishes for definite religious teaching in the schools.

Absolution in the Russian Church

NEW YORK, APRIL 28, 1909.

TO THE EDITOR OF AMERICA:

I have your letter enclosing one from Mr. James V. Shields and a clipping from the New York Sun concerning the Russian Easter, with particular reference to a paragraph therein which reads, "The mere formality of saying 'I have sinned,' and dropping a coin in the collection box procures absolution," in regard to the practice of confession in the Russian church.

While there is an element of truth in what the Sun writer says, the paragraph is really a piece of smart writing rather than a statement of facts. In theory the Russian church is in accord with the Roman church on the subject of the Sacrament of Penance, or, as it is called in the Russian ritual, "the sacrament of confession." The exact formula of the prayers and absolution may be seen in English in Hapgood, "Orthodox Service Book," pp. 287-291; Bjerring, "Oriental Church," pp. 106-107; and in the original Slavonic in the Moscow "Trebnik," pp. 30-39. It will be noticed that the words of absolution are almost the same as those in the Roman church, and they have been given by me in The Messenger, October, 1904, p. 447.

In practice, however, there is considerable difference. The Russian penitent does not confess, strictly speaking. He is questioned by the priest, and to the various questions concerning the commandments and the seven deadly sins, he answers as the case may be, "I have sinned." The rubric in the ritual (Trebnik) says: "Then he shall question him diligently, point by point, and shall await his reply to every question." Then a note: "The priest doth not use the questions of olden days, which are still retained in the ritual, but interrogates the penitent discreetly; and at last when he hath questioned him concerning the seven deadly sins, he exhorteth him as follows." Here follows an exhortation which is the analogue of our act of contrition and firm purpose of amendment. The actual absolution is given by having the penitent kneel, and placing the end of the priest's stole upon his head, whilst repeating the words of absolution.

I have never been in Russia during Lent and cannot say what the forms are there in the large churches. But I have seen the confession and absolution several times in Russian churches in this country, and once or twice in Russia. An extended description of confession and Easter duties is given in Leroy-Beaulieu, "The Empire of the Tsars," vol. III, pp. 136-137.

The Easter Communion is required in Russia for civil purposes because many stations in life are only open to members of the Orthodox church. Hence they must prove that they are such members in good standing. The usual practice is, as soon as absolution has been given, to say the required prayers and then have the penitent's name inscribed in the church list or register, and then return to the church next morning in time for Mass and Communion. A small fee is paid for the registration and also for the sacrament itself, as the Russian priest usually gets fees for every church service whatsoever. There is no special significance attached to the fact that the fee is for confession. But it can easily be seen that there is the opportunity for careless priests and penitents to put the whole matter on a perfunctory basis, and that may be done on some occasions, as in Lent or just before Easter.

Yours truly,

ANDREW J. SHIPMAN.

A Place of Inspiring Memories

(Communicated.)

The Office of Works has marked with an authoritative memorial a spot in London that has many sacred associations for Catholics. In the pavement in the middle of the broad thoroughfare of Oxford street, near the Marble Arch, and at the junction of the street with the Edgware Road, a six-foot triangle has been let into the highway. Round it runs the inscription: "HERE STOOD TYBURN TREE, REMOVED 1759." In the middle of the triangle, on a metal plate, the famous gallows is shown in outline, and a tablet on the park railings a few yards away will call attention to the memorial. This spot was the ordinary place of execution for London from at least 1108 A. D. The permanent triangular gallows was erected in 1571. Blessed John Storey was the first victim upon it. Mr. Alfred Marks, in his "History of Tyburn Tree," speaks of the site as perhaps the most blood-stained spot in the world, and shows good reason for his calculations that here some 50,000 men and women were put to death. They were mostly condemned for criminal offences, often not very serious, but among them were a great number of our martyrs of the English persecution from the three Carthusian Priors and Blessed Richard Reynolds and Blessed John Hale, in 1535, down to the victims of the "Popish Plot" in 1681. The last of these was Dr. Oliver Plunkett, the saintly Primate of All Ireland, July 1, 1681. No wonder that for the Catholics of London Tyburn is an inspiring memory, and the spot a holy place. Close by, at Tyburn Convent, there is the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament all the year round, and perpetual prayer for the conversion of England.

"You are aware of the financial condition of the Holy See," writes His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate to the members of the Hierarchy in the United States. "Since the Pope has been completely despoiled of the revenues which formerly accrued to Him from His temporal dominions, and since, unfortunately, some of the Catholic Nations of Europe are distracted by a spirit hostile towards the Holy See, He, the Vicar of Christ, has been reduced to a state of extreme need. Hence, in order that Our Holy Father may meet the requirements of the general and vast administration of the Church throughout the world, it is expected that those of His children who are free from religious persecutions, and whom God in His goodness is blessing with wealth and prosperity, should in a special manner, in this hour of need, show their generosity in a more effective way."

Socialism in France

There can be no doubt that unified Socialism is marching to power in France. During the last three months, out of thirty partial elections they have gained five seats, all won from the Radicals, and in most electoral districts where they have failed to carry the election, they have increased their votes by the hundreds and the thousands. Moreover, in the Chamber in the face of a Government which pretends to combat it, unified Socialism constitutes a preponderating section; it succeeds in injecting its ideas into the official program, and often forces the Ministry to compromise. Finally, in the working centres it enlists partisans ever more numerous, more agitated, more threatening. It is vain to judge of its redoubtable power by the incongruous scenes lately witnessed at the Socialist Congress of St. Etienne, where the representatives were divided as to doctrines, persons and tactics. The Congress was composed of at least three factions: the intransigents, the moderates and the nondescript compromise party of Jaurès. Their dissensions were not apparent but real, not superficial but deep, and they treated one another in no parliamentary form. Yet the members of the St. Etienne Congress do not by any means represent the total sum of the Socialist party, which is for practical purposes a unit. What has united them, and therefore what has given them strength? Socialism draws support no doubt from the anti-blocard demonstrations, from the revolutionary forces and from the growing sentiment against the masters of the day that tyrannize the nation; and its leaders avail themselves of that moral decay in the masses which the Government has provoked, whether it intended or not, and which it cannot any longer control. But these causes do not account sufficiently for this sudden strength. The substantial and most powerful cause is summed up in the militant, energetic and indefatigable action of the Socialist party. They are determined not to wait to realize any even apparent union among themselves. They are united in this, that they are to rush into battle and to make propaganda, while each may keep his preferences, whether direct action, or parliamentary work, the stirring of the masses to revolt, or the insisting on social reform, etc. In every case they act with promptitude, with perseverance. Their action, moreover, is not mere impulse, but calculation and method. It seems impossible that it shall not succeed.

Political Tendencies in Rome

The monotony of events in Rome has been relieved by political excitement centering round a genuine Roman prince the young Duke Gaetani. He was a candidate at the recent elections, but the ballot-boxes and ballots got so mixed up that the election officers could not count the poll and the Chamber undid the Gordian knot by ordering a fresh election. On Sunday last the Duke was returned by a majority of 1,122 over his Conservative-Liberal opponent. The curious part of it is, that like his cousin, Prince Borghese, another of the old Roman nobility, his politics are tinged with Radicalism bordering almost on Socialism.

It is a sign of the times when old Roman families once devoted to the Vatican pass over to the opposite camp. Up to quite recently the Whites and Blacks were distinct parties in Rome, but owing to social and economic pressure the ranks of the Whites are being rapidly recruited from among the Blacks; yet it is curious to observe that the young hopefuls who go over do not stop short at Liberalism but take in Socialism also.

The Gaetani case reminds us that many of these old families owe everything to the Popes, and many of them count Popes and Cardinals among the founders of their families. Thus the house of Gaetani had two Popes and fifteen Cardinals. But loudly as they shout their socialistic speeches they are careful to forget the poor peasants dwelling in miserable caves on the broad acres of their family tenute, to the disgust of every visitor to our country who finds them oppressed and neglected beyond conception. Gaetani, however, goes to Parliament, and his cousin Borghese may have to seek re-election before very long: but Radical victories such as these do not carry much weight in the Chamber, and the Ministry continues to be and to feel itself in undisputed authority.

The new deputy, the Rev. R. Murri, grew somewhat weak-kneed on his entry and inscribed himself among the Radicals instead of among his friends the Socialists. His eclecticism makes him an object of political suspicion to many of the Radicals, and the party is likely to disown him, in which case he must either form a party by himself or join the Socialist group of which Podrecca, editor of the Asino, is an ornament. The fact is Murri is more of an excommunicatus-vitandus by the Radicals than by the Catholics.

Latest Phase of the Schell Struggle

The late Professor Hermann Schell of the University of Würzburg, who held a high reputation as a theologian, was accused of unsound doctrines, and in 1898 four of his books were put on the Index. Besides the general trend of what is now called Modernism they contained serious errors regarding the nature of God, the eternity of hell and the difference between venial and mortal sin. Personally the professor enjoyed a good name and was a brilliant teacher. His condemnation gave rise to a complete Schell literature. Professor Commer, of Vienna, however, showed conclusively that the step was just and even necessary. Unfortunately, the first edition of Commer's book was not free from violence and anger, which made it easy to attack him. Yet as a whole the book did immense good and the Holy Father wrote a letter of commendation to the author. In the second edition the flaws were eliminated.

But it was especially in a further reply to his critics that the Vienna professor seems to have finally settled the matter. It is directed against Professor Kiefl, of the Würzburg University who, while Commer's superior in handling the language, does not hesitate to use very doubtful means, making, for instance, evident misprints the object of the most serious charges. Through Cardinal Merry del Val, his Secretary of State, Pius X again congratulated Commer upon his success. Some years ago the press printed a retraction which Professor Schell signed before his bishop. One of his friends, Professor Hennemann, is of the opinion that this retraction was not sincere, since Schell did not acknowledge the right of his bishop to judge in matters of Faith and Morals.

The Vienna Vaterland thus sums up the situation: "The Schell question became the Schell struggle and this changed into the opposition to Papal decision under the pretext of shielding the personality of Schell. It is only a part of the ever young struggle of ill-conceived freedom against divine revelation and authority. It is the merit of Professor Commer that wider circles are enabled to distinguish clearly between the inspiring personality of Schell and the leader of a school which is estranged from, nay, dangerous to the Church."

Summer Soul Hunting

One of the stock cartoons of the Summer comics used to be a picture of his Satanic Majesty gloating over the free field he had during the dog-days with churches closed on all sides and ministers far away on vacation tours. An evolution of modern professional charity-work has changed a large section of this, and now the Summer has become the harvest time of the soul-hunting, social-uplifting proselytizer. It seems impossible for him to keep out of the so-called non-sectarian kindergartens, fresh-air funds, vacation centres and other schemes that present-day philanthropy has invented to make life more tolerable for the alleged "other half" of the world at large. He has found them fertile grounds for the cultivation of his evangelical microbes, and one of the most promising methods of propagation is what in the last few summers have been called "Vacation Bible Schools." These schools of Biblical lore have progressed so far as to have a "National Vacation Bible School Committee" of which the Rev. Robert G. Boville, No. 32 Bible House, this city, is the secretary. In a pamphlet that he has sent out to educational institutions, he says:

The National Vacation Bible School Committee consists of 100 prominent representatives from eight communions, sixteen cities, and thirty-three colleges and universities, organized to promote daily vacation school ministry to children in every city.

In the summer of 1908 fifty churches were opened for this daily ministry, under the auspices of Church Federations, City Mission Societies and individual churches, and 200 college men and women were employed in them, reaching about 15,000 children with Christian teaching and influence.

Two theological colleges, . . . sent three of their choice men into the field of service in 1908, and provided for them by means of social service scholarships ($150 each), covering three months' service. One well-known woman's college sent two of its students and provided supporting scholarships.

Crozer Theological Seminary . . . will send eight men in 1909, to conduct daily vacation Bible schools in Baptist churches, and will provide for them by means of scholarships.

* * * *

The daily vacation Bible school appeals to the children of foreigners, who are not reached by Sunday schools.

The children—let us get at the children—is the constant aim and cry of these zealous advocates for what Dr. Boville calls "daily religious education and social ministry to neglected children." This activity is exercised, let it be remembered, when the schools are closed for the season, not when their classes are in organized operation. It can be surmised easily also who "the children of foreigners" are. Any one who takes the trouble to do a little investigating will soon find it difficult to determine just where the vacation play and social uplifters end, and where the Bible teachers begin among the "boys and girls of congested city districts," but he will be soon convinced of the necessity of paying immediate attention to the warnings of the danger signals on all sides.

Was It a Blunder?

The recent decision of the Supreme Court practically nullifying the Hepburn Act is puzzling to many minds. The Court's decision seems to show beyond all doubt that Congress had power to prohibit ownership by railroads of stock in those subsidiary corporations, whose product it must transport over its own lines. Such legislation, the court indicates clearly, would be in line with good public policy, because it is manifestly impossible for a railroad to give all its patrons the same treatment if it has a pecuniary interest in one of them. Just here occurs the puzzle. According to common understanding the Hepburn Act was designed to prevent railroad companies from owning and operating coal mines and monopolizing the fuel supply. Apparently it was a matter in which, according to the Supreme Court's decision, the power of Congress is supreme. Why, then, nullify the act. The apparent puzzle is easily solved. The Supreme Court affirms the act to be not unconstitutional but defective. The act is nullified because it fails to state in proper language its real intent. In effect the judgment of the court just handed down intimates very pointedly that Congress may do what it attempted to do whenever it shall be so disposed, and shall be able to summon to its assistance the legal talent necessary to draw a valid act. No doubt Congress will make haste to correct a blunder that reflects upon its sincerity or intelligence. Obviously, if we are to have a government of law, the men who make the laws and attempt to enforce them should have some knowledge of law and of precedent.

Prussian Fairness to Catholics

Some Protestant papers are wont to speak of the "fairness" shown by the Prussian government in its appointments of Catholics to the higher offices in the kingdom. One little item may illustrate this "fairness." The province of Silesia has a population of about five millions, fifty-six per cent. of which is Catholic. It is divided into three districts, and these into sixty-three Kreise, roughly corresponding to counties in the United States. Since its organization in 1817, the province has never had a single Catholic District President, and at the present date only two of the Kreis Presidents are Catholics. To this the Germania adds: "We could mention scores of Catholic Kreise which never had a Catholic president since they came under Prussian sway." During the past ten years this unfairness to Catholics has been widely discussed in the Catholic press. It is conceded that Catholics may not fairly demand the appointment of their co-religionists, in proportion to their percentage, if the candidates put forward are educationally unqualified; but it is incredible that the millions of Prussian Catholics during a whole century should not have produced more candidates qualified for the highest offices than the few ministers and the sporadic provincial and High-Court presidents who are on record. These Catholics are born in the same country and of the same race as the Protestants; they enjoy the same advantages of Prussian education, and they pass the same severe examinations in gymnasium and university. Clearly there is something more in their exclusion from office than mere lack of educational qualifications.

Relics of Jeanne d'Arc

In spite of a widespread and zealously minute search in France for relics of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc but very few have been found of undoubted authenticity. After putting the holy maid to death her executioners took great pains that nothing should remain of their victim. The ashes and charred bones were gathered up and thrown into the Seine. The suit of armor called hers is probably only a copy of one she wore, and of the many letters purporting to be from her, only three are undoubtedly genuine. As she could neither read nor write, these were only signed by her and dictated to her secretary. The form of the letters, uncertain and sprawling, in the signature "Jehanne," shows that someone guided her hand in tracing them. The house in Domremy in which she was born, January 6, 1412, is held in great veneration. A congregation of nuns have had care of it, but recently the anti-clerical government officials seized it and took its custody away from them. According to press reports by cable the oriflamme of Jeanne d'Arc was given into the keeping of the clergy of the cathedral by the Mayor of Orleans. Forty-two bishops received the banner at the entrance of the cathedral to which it was escorted by the troops and garrison-bands in a torchlight procession. More than 100,000 persons witnessed the ceremony which was the opening of a three days' fête.

Here is a bit of edification which is all the more valuable in that it appears in a society paper, the main purpose of which is disedification. "The French Ambassador and Madame Jusserand will go abroad early in June. Madame Jusserand, by the way, has always set the pace for those who go in for a quiet, unostentatious existence. With a considerable fortune at her disposal, and an official position that gives her precedence over many more ambitious women, she nevertheless is utterly averse to display. Except on occasions of great ceremony, her gowns are invariably simple and inexpensive. She seldom wears jewels. At St. Paul's Catholic Church on Sundays, or downtown in the morning, her costume is one of plain dark cloth untrimmed."

LITERATURE

The Revelation to the Monk of Evesham. Rendered into modern English by VALERIAN PAGET. New York. The John McBride Co. $1.50.

Mr. Paget commends this book to his readers as a classical work of much importance—in fact, “as one of the most valuable and remarkable heirlooms of English literature.” It purports to narrate certain visions of Purgatory and Paradise granted to a monk who lived in the great Abbey of Evesham, in Worcestershire, towards the close of the twelfth century. The original MS., no longer extant, was written in 1196 and first printed on the Continent about the year 1482. It is difficult to determine whether the editor considers it a genuine record of actual happenings or adopts the verdict of an earlier editor who pronounced it to be “a Middle-Age work of religious fiction.” In either case, however, the literary world owes Mr. Paget a debt of gratitude not only for giving us a most fascinating book, but for his labor in translating the archaic English of those remote times into current language and paraphrase. Supposing the reality of the visions, Catholic readers may be tempted to wish that the book had found an editor rather more sympathetic with Catholic teaching and better informed on the history of the dogma of Purgatory. If Mr. Paget had consulted any standard Catholic theologian or been acquainted with two other English classics, Cardinal William Allen’s “Defense and Declaration of the Catholic Church’s Doctrine touching Purgatory” (A. D. 1565), and Father Richard Thimelby’s “Purgatory Surveyed” (A. D. 1663), we should hardly find him telling us, in his Introduction, that “it was not until 1438, at the Council of Florence, that it (the doctrine of Purgatory) was approved and incorporated in the Roman Catholic faith.” Some of his readers will also demur to various assertions in the following remark of Mr. Paget: “The Monk, had he lived to-day, would have ranked with the modernists, whose aims are the cleansing and reformation of the Church by consent from within rather than by compulsion from without, and the restoration and preservation of the most magnificent system of religious organization in the world.” But apart from a few blemishes of this sort which were, perhaps, unavoidable in the circumstances, Mr. Paget’s work is a distinct and valuable contribution to literature. We quite agree with his judgment that “for combined grandeur and sweetness of spiritual conception it is hard to find anywhere an equal to the concluding pages of the ‘Revelation,’ devoted to the description of paradise. Dante himself is not so direct or vivid.” W. T. K.

Le prime pagine del Pontificato di Papa Pio IX (The opening pages of the pontificate of Pope Pius IX), by R. BALLERINI, S.J. Rome. Civiltà Cattolica. In the sixties it was known that Father Ballerini was busy on a history of the pontificate of Pius IX, and that the proofs were being submitted to the great pontiff for correction or approval. The first volume was printed in 1867, but it was deemed wiser to postpone the publication until the passage of years should allow a more impartial judgment of personalities and events.

This work may almost be called an autobiography of Pius IX, so thoroughly is he identified with it. The editors have attached facsimiles of the original galley proofs, containing corrections in the Pope’s own handwriting. To give an example: the original galley of pages 34 and 35 has: “Having been ordained by Cardinal Annibale della Genga, afterwards Leo XII, John Mary Mastai-Ferretti said his first Mass in St. Anne’s Church on Easter Sunday, 1819.” The Pope inserted the name of the ordaining bishop as “Mgr. Caprano, Archbishop of Iconium,” and added that “his father and his uncle, Mgr. Paolino, at that time president of the civil tribunal at Montecitorio were present,” and so it appears in the final issue.

Apart from the fifth chapter which gives the sketch of the life of Pius IX previous to his pontificate the volume covers only the year 1846, but the pages throb with interest. The popular rejoicings at his election, the amnesty he granted, the reforms he planned, the difficulties with the liberals, the relations with foreign governments, the rising of northern Italy against the Austrians, the havoc wrought by secret societies: all this is treated with the directness and clearness which only insight into the processes at work can give a contemporary. The book contains a very precious appendix from the pen of Father Bresciani, but corrected by Pius IX, on the Pope’s flight to Gaeta and the amazement at Rome when the flight became known. History is the poorer for the volumes that were never written.

Catechetical Instruction—The Sacraments. RAINERI-HAGEN. New York: Benziger Brothers. 1908.

In fulfilling the duty incumbent upon him and insisted on by our Holy Father of explaining Christian doctrine, it is beyond all doubt useful for the pastor of souls to have at hand an orderly arrangement of the points to be touched on such as is to be found in the Roman Catechism. The volumes before us aim to give such a help in an English version of the second part of this catechism, supplemented by Raineri’s “Instructions” on the same, and the “Compendium of Christian Doctrine,” prescribed by Pius X. Father Hagen has done his work well, ably seconded by the publishers, and we are sorry that some few grammatical inaccuracies, which a more careful revision of the proof would have unearthed, have been allowed to mar the uniformly excellent translation. The sixth instruction, on the obligation imposed by baptism of dedicating oneself to God from youth, is especially rich in matter, though the language is much more suited to the elder members of the congregation than to the children to whom it is addressed. The instruction on sanctifying grace contains these words: “it should not be forgotten that grace may be diminished, as is done by venial sin,” which we can charitably interpret by supposing that the author wishes to refer to the relation between the amount of actual grace, and the dispositions of the one who receives the Sacrament. Again, we read in reference to adults who die before the deferred baptism can be administered, “the intention and resolution to receive baptism and do penance for their former ill-spent life will avail to grace and justification,” whereas the original speaks not of the intention to do penance, but of actual repentance, male actae vitae poenitentia, which at least hints at the kind of contrition necessary to supply for baptism of water. The clerical reader will doubtless find pleasure in the opportunity afforded him by these volumes of recalling his theology on the Sacraments, though in these days, we think the busy pastor of souls would be much more grateful had the editor not contented himself with mere translations but suggested illustrations suited to the tastes and interests of our times.

Ireland Under English Rule; or, A Plea for the Plaintiff, by THOMAS ADDIS EMMET, M.D., LL.D., Pres. of the Irish National Federation of America, Knight Commander, Order St. Gregory the Great. Second edition, revised and in large part rewritten. New York and London: G. P. Putnam’s Sons. 1909.

Those who are familiar with the first edition of Dr. Emmet’s plea will find as he states in his preface that it is essentially a new book. The brief introduction on early Irish History in the first volume has been but little changed, but most of the remainder has been rewritten or rearranged. The greater part of the second volume is entirely new. This is due to the fact that the author has come into possession of new material of great value. In the first edition the historical narrative was carried down only to the union of the English and Irish parliament in 1801, but now the history is traced from the later portion of the reign of Henry VIII to the present time,—the period during which the Irish people were strictly under English rule.

Dr. Emmet's book is a distinct contribution to a subject that has been very much written about, yet very much misunderstood, and that even most educated people are quite dubious over, so much has been said on both sides and with so much vehemence. As might have been expected from the man whose collection of documents to illustrate American history was probably one of the best ever made and whose collection of Americana now at the Lenox Library will be an enduring monument to his name, Dr. Emmet has not depended on second-hand authorities but has gone straight to sources. For this reason these two editions of his book will be a storehouse of information for all those who, for generations to come, want to know the right about the relations of England to Ireland. The Cambridge Modern History in its preface declared that history had been a conspiracy against the truth and that the historian of the present day found himself constantly baffled even by supposed historical authorities and under the necessity of going back to consult all the documents once more. Dr. Emmet has done this and the result is a story of awful shame for a great civilized country. Dr. Emmet has toned down something of the indignation over the scenes that he has to depict as compared with the first volume, but it is easy to understand that this must have been extremely difficult, for if ever surely here a historian would be tempted out of his attitude of calm judgment.

Those who think that the volumes treat only of the past, however, would be seriously mistaken for there is much that tells of Ireland's present and more or less inevitably its future. How startling it is to find, for instance, on page 71 of the second volume that Ireland has the lowest marriage rate in Europe. For the last ten years this has been five per thousand while in most of the European countries it is from seven to nine per thousand. The number of children in each family is still the largest in Europe but even this is now being affected by the fact that the women in Ireland are marrying older than before. Of all the females registered in Ireland in the census of 1901 between the ages of fifteen and forty-five years only one-third were married. Of those married only one-twelfth were under twenty-five and one-half under thirty-five. The figures show that the marriage age is constantly rising. Economic conditions are responsible for this and one explanation of it is to be found in the official reports for 1907, which show that in Ireland there had been an increase of grazing land and a decrease for agricultural purposes of 1,000,000 acres in the last ten years. Dr. Emmet's book deserves to be read by every Irishman and Irishman's son and by every fairminded person who is interested in genuine history.

Dromina, by JNO. AYSKOUGH. New York and London: T. P. Putnam & Sons.

Purchasers of "Dromina" will get full value for their money. Between the covers of this book, there are really two novels, the first having for its subject matter Louis XVII, still alive after the French Revolution, and still a king—the king of the Gypsies. How he marries the daughter of an Irish king, and how sudden death takes him off just as he is reaching successfully for the crown of France are all set forth in the first three hundred pages. Then comes the second novel, the story of the boy Mudo, who would be emperor. Despite the straining of probabilities, the splendid adventures and successes of Mudo, descended, like Maecenas, of royal ancestors are far and away the noblest chapters that have yet fallen from John Ayscough's noble pen. The reign and death of Mudo are inspiring. So too the noble end of his trusted friends, Lope and Fergus. There are martyrs in this book, and one splendid miracle.

Even though the action drags at times in the earlier pages, Dromina can be cordially recommended to all. In diction, in theme, it rises higher, ever higher, till it stops at the gates of eternal day. It is in every sense a Catholic novel. F. J. F.

A Little Land and a Living, by BOLTON HALL. New York: The Arcadia Press. $1.00.

Like another work by the same author, entitled, "Three Acres and Liberty," this little work of the well-known sociologist, Bolton Hall, makes very practical and timely suggestions towards the solution of one of the most vexing problems of our complex civilization, the overcrowding of our large cities with unadaptable laborers seeking a living where there is no real opportunity. It emphasizes the slogan, "Back to the Farm," but in a sane and practical way. It advocates what Mr. Borsodi in his introduction of the volume calls the ideal plan of aiding the poor. It is not intended "to induce the unfamiliar to rush headlong into farming, but to encourage those who feel the presence of city life to study how they may get away from the overcrowded city into nearby country, where the gardens may first be made an adjunct to the income and later, perhaps, prove the source of income." It is a most practical book for the city pastor who is endeavoring to induce the young man from the farm who is not succeeding in city pursuits to return to a more healthful occupation; it shows that country life, on small plots, not only pays financially, but in every other way, and it points out a solution of the social question infinitely more practical than any socialistic day dream.

The Italians of To-day, from the French of René Bazin. New York: Henry Holt Co. 1908.

Let a single masterpiece establish a man's rank and quality, and the rest of his work is sure of a hearing. This is no less true of literature than of the other arts. "The Italians of To-day," written by René Bazin more than a dozen years ago, has had to await translation until popular appetite had been whetted by "The Nun" and "The Coming Harvest." Yet "The Italians of To-day" (or more correctly—though the publishers refrain from making the explanation—"The Italians of a dozen years ago"), is a work sufficiently important to win fame for a lesser man than Bazin. Italy's beauty, history, and picturesque peasantry have long been a hackneyed theme for "Letters and Impressions from Italy," but Bazin is no ordinary tourist. He brought with him a new quality, or rather one he himself discovered in Fromentin, and which for want of a better word he calls "eye" (just as we say "an eye for baseball"), a sharpness of the senses, an aptitude for receiving impressions, a memory for images, and the result is a series of sketches so unique that they may best be described as literary landscape painting. He is most at home away from beaten tracks; he loves the smell of the earth, and almost echoes that confession of St. Ambrose, "Ego odorem ipsum terrae simplicem atque sincerum pro gratia benedictionis accipio." A man of the people himself, and familiar with the farm-life of his native Brittany, his eye is keen for the details of Italian agriculture. He visits the dairy-farms and learns the names of the cows there, soft Italian names, Galantina, Bellabecca, Monachello; he rides out to the buffalo herds in the Campagna, and he describes the pastoral encampments amid the great silence of the Agro. Of the Agro itself and the awful effects of the malaria he draws a melancholy picture. It was never inhabited at any time, he thinks; it had palaces where in Roman times the rich spent a month or two a year, and then left the place to their slaves, and every palace had an altar sacred "to the Goddess Fever." Besides the malaria, he blames the excessive taxation for the misery he found everywhere. The figures he gives are appalling; and while it is true that since Bazin wrote the "Benefica del Agro Association" has done much to remedy the malaria, the burden of taxation has increased. As he predicted, emigration has continued, and socialism has become more and more revolutionary. Perhaps the only thing that has undergone no change during the past twelve years is Italy's feelings towards France, which he sums up so cleverly after the manner of a chemical analysis.

The book contains, moreover, a charmingly intimate account of a visit of some days to the Novelist Fogazzaro, and a description of Mt. Etna in eruption. The translation is loyally done; but we may be allowed to suggest a more accurate rendering of "Tempo di Sicilia, tempo femineo" than that given, "Sicilian weather, woman's weather"; Verdi knew better when he wrote "La donna è mobile come il vento." "The Italians of To-day" is a work which no serious student of sociology can afford to overlook, and which every visitor to Italy ought to make room for beside his Bae-deker or Murray.

Life of the Right Reverend Joseph P. Machebeuf, D.D., First Bishop of Denver. By the Rev. W. J. Howlett, Pueblo, Colorado, 1908.

The Catholics of the United States have reason to be proud of their pioneer bishops. The stronger the light thrown on their labors for Christ the greater the astonishment and admiration. There is no kind of hardship that they were not called upon to endure. "In labor and painfulness, in much watchings, in hunger and thirst, in fastings, in cold and nakedness"—they lived over again in the nineteenth century the lives of the early Apostles, and shed a lustre on the Episcopate of the American Church that will ever remain a precious heritage. Among these sturdy and saintly pioneers is the illustrious Joseph P. Machebeuf, first Bishop of Denver, whose admirable life has been written by the Rev. W. J. Howlett, of Pueblo, Colo. It is a book that will be read with the greatest interest. No pains have been spared by the author to picture the man of God and to give in detail the narrative of his missionary and episcopal labors. The story is doubly interesting, because we have the inner life and character of the missionary disclosed to us through a series of charming letters to his family as well as the historic portrayal of his priestly ministrations over an immense territory east and west of the Mississippi. To have had a share in the formation of the Church in one State of the Union would be glory enough for any man, but to merit the threefold title of pioneer priest of Ohio, pioneer priest of New Mexico and pioneer priest and apostle of Colorado is a triple distinction quite unique in the history of the Church in the United States. The book is well printed and has a fine portrait of the venerable bishop as frontispiece. E. S.

Reviews and Magazines

Rarely does one find in the Atlantic Monthly a paper which the ordinary reader is obliged to characterize as a disappointment whatever be the view-point of his criticism. "The Hundred Worst Books," by Mr. Crothers, is, however, a distinct disappointment, unworthy to hold the place of honor in the May issue of our leading literary monthly. Despite his slurring reference to the assistance offered to the bewildered reader in recent years by the efforts of Sir John Lubbock and others "to chart the vast sea of literature," most of us will be slow to agree with Mr. Crothers' judgment regarding the many lists of "Best Books" presented to the public.

And similarly his own effort to mark; in his own words, not the "middle of the channel," but "the reefs and shoals" of this vast sea by setting up a "bell-buoy" telling the mariner where not to go, what not to read, would be of service had he done justice to his self-imposed task. But little help can be looked for from a rambling paper, full of phrases which lead nowhere, and in which, whilst proposing to tell us what he considers the hundred worst books, Mr. Crothers fails either to name a book as being among the worst, or to furnish us a real standard of judgment.

Surely the essayist will not expect one to accept his dictum that in selecting such a standard the word "worst" is to be used "not in the moral but in the strictly literary sense and that therefore the candidate for place in the list must be bad, not as a man may be bad, but as a book may be bad." As it is distinctly not true that the lowest depth into which a book can fall is to be unreadable, so it is not true that we are to judge a book by the test of whether or not we can read it.

"Is Immortality Desirable?" in the same number, is an article suggestive of the free and easy methods some modern thinkers, free from the "shackles of medieval dogmatism," follow in their philosophic development. Mr. Dickinson is of opinion that "the Immortality of Man is one of those great open questions which are of the most worth discussing, even though they may never be resolved." He admits that there may be those who are convinced on grounds of revealed religion that man is immortal; he concedes that there may be others who are equally assured, on grounds of science, that man is mortal;—against these he does not argue, but airily passing over their contentions and considering the fact of immortality to be an open question he devotes his paper to the inquiry whether, and in what sense, it is desirable. One might express his astonishment that the essayist is thus ready to overlook the splendid array of authorities who impelled by the strength of pure reason alone hold fast to the ancient teaching of the soul's immortality. But the disposition to vent his astonishment will speedily disappear as he recognizes how futile it were to reason with one who calmly sets about building up a theory utterly disregardful of what most thinking men accept to-day. Poets may be allowed to follow fancy's ways, but philosophic teachers are supposed to be made of sterner stuff.

"The Newspapers as Historical Sources" is a readable paper in which James Ford Rhodes, out of the riches of his own experience, builds up a strong argument that "take the newspaper for what it is, a hasty gatherer of facts, a hurried commentator on the same, and it may well constitute a part of historical evidence."

"Sorting the Seeds: A Survey of Recent Fiction" is a chatty sketch of the work of recent novelists. It presents a satisfactory critical review of the day's output, and will prove interesting to the student who has not the leisure to peruse even the best of the popular sellers.

There are fair-minded men among us who profess not to understand the attitude of practical Christians regarding the system of instruction in our public schools. They know the objection ordinarily advanced, the lack of religious training, but they are slow to realize why it is that some sort of arrangement can not be made whereby church and school may work together in religious and moral training. An article in the Educational Review for May may give them some help to comprehend the existing difficulty. So long as men like Mr. La Rue are conceded to possess any influence among schoolmen of the day, so long must it be clear that the atmosphere of the public school is vitiated and unfit for the growing child.

It is to be regretted that Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler allowed such a paper to find place in a magazine of wide influence among teachers. It is full of statements of materialistic rationalism; one's gorge rises as he reads the flippant urging by the author of principles rejected by the Christian world. Mr. La Rue's "The Church and the Public School" abounds in anti-Christian sentiment, and its lack of sound reasoning is only surpassed by the boldness with which he propounds his creed. With the characteristic cock-sureness of the modern unbeliever the Christian sense of the people is sneeringly ruled out of court without regard to the fact that it is as the pulsing life even of the majority of those who hold the public school system of the day to be the model system. One gem of the paper may be quoted: "Baby-boy represents something like the barbarian stage, morally. . . . So-called irreverence, disobedience, and impudence are but the first crude expressions of a fiery, straightforward, independent nature—something to thank God for, not to wail over. . . . The child must experiment morally, discover a few ethical affinities and spiritual atomic weights. He will know, as soon as we, when the equation does not balance. We need only see that the explosions are not too serious and that he does not pour the acids too recklessly."

Happily but few of the school-teachers who devote their lives to the training of the young in our schools are of the reckless atheistic mind of Mr. La Rue. But will the leaders of the system continue to wonder that Christian fathers and mothers are fearful of the consequences in the moral development of children when these are entrusted to a system which harbors men of his calibre?

In the Outlook for May, Mr. Roosevelt reviews the Japanese Question. He holds it to be the duty of America to wait and see whether or not Japan means to efficiently prevent undesirable immigration of her citizens to this country. If Japan fails to do this, it is his opinion that this government must protect itself "in the way that would provoke the least possible friction and cause the least possible hard feeling." Boldly asserting the right of Americans to say what immigrants shall come to their shores, Mr. Roosevelt urges the need of a powerful navy to back up the laws we may enact to this end. We are powerless, he argues, to force our rights against any nation that chooses to disregard our wishes "unless we continue to build up and maintain a first-class fighting navy."

The ex-President has little patience with "those well-meaning but fatuous advocates of peace who would try to prevent the up-building of our navy and who utterly misread the temper of their countrymen." To defend its inalienable right America would fight, he declares, whether prepared or not, and "all the peace advocates would do would be to prevent this country from being successful in the war."

The usual symposium is devoted in this number to the discussion of the question "Should Ministers know Life?" And, though a so-called neat thrust of a writer quoted in one of the articles bids us follow Dr. Johnson's advice and clear our minds of cant, one cannot see that a fair objection to the whole spirit of the policy urged in the symposium is thus airily to be set aside. Specialization has its limits and it certainly is to exceed these limits when candidates for the Christian ministry are presumed to pursue unprofitable training unless they devote the best part of their course to what, after all, concerns only the material well-being of those who are to be their after charge. Material well-being and civic righteousness are only a secondary elementary part of the Christian minister's duty to his people. "My kingdom is not of this world," was Christ's doctrine in the long ago and even the cry of "cant" will not frighten his followers into other lines of thought or of endeavor. And to add another word, while it is difficult—one might say impossible—to find room in a Christian seminary for instruction of the highly practical nature suggested in these three papers, we have yet to discover the impossibility of the student's applying the principles of the religion he studies to social conditions in a manner to work out that material well-being and civic righteousness, which his higher duty bids him aid and assist in every way.

The Ecclesiastical Review for May offers an unusually attractive and interesting table of contents. "The Literature of Anglo-Saxon England in Honor of God's Blessed Mother" shows how deep was the love of Our Lady which once glowed brightly in this land. Father Martin's third article on the Congregations of the Curia deals with the Congregation of the Propaganda from whose jurisdiction the American ecclesiastical provinces have been but lately transferred under the common law of the Church. And in his wonted luminous way the author gives his readers a brief but very satisfactory notion of the origin of the congregation; its territory, subject matter and scope of jurisdiction; its changed relations according to the new Constitution Sapienti Consilio and its temporalities. "How the English Martyrs saved the Mass for England" will please and edify the devout student of the history of the "Sublime Sacrifice."

The review of Father Fagan's paper prepared for the meeting of the Association of Catholic Colleges held in Chicago in 1901 and the practical suggestions it offers are apt and timely. The paper, entitled "The Danger of State Legislation interfering with our Rights of Education," after giving some account of the forces that are moulding and influencing educational interests in the United States, points out how principles and methods advocated by these forces can and do affect Catholic interests of great value.

In Father McDevitt's reply to Professor Dahmus' article on the "Batavia System," as a remedy of certain defective educational methods, which appeared in the February number of the review, the author contends that the good found in the system is no novelty in educational work, while harm may result from excessive praise of it as it diverts attention from the real evils in all systems of teaching; namely, inefficient teaching, overcrowding, inadequate equipment and the like.

Few critics after all will reject Father McDevitt's conclusion that "of all factors that make for the proper education of children, the efficient teacher is the one absolutely essential." And therefore, he does not hesitate to affirm that "the splendid results, if such there be, in the schools of Batavia, are to be traced to the active, energetic, earnest, zealous and efficient Superintendent, who has kindled in his teachers the enthusiastic spirit that stirs his own soul, rather than to the system for which he stands sponsor."

When a New York detective was killed recently by some miscreants in Sicily, the New York Sun made, editorially, a very unworthy attack on the Italian people, saying that in return for our charities (to Messina) they gave us a corpse. Arthur Woods shows in the May McClure's ("Problem of the Black Hand") that Italy has given us not only the life and services of that excellent officer but thousands of other worthy citizens; and that only a few, and these mostly condemned criminals, are responsible for crime. The past ten years have seen 1,766,019 Italian immigrants come through Ellis Island. "They have spread all over the United States. As a whole they are respectable, industrious and self-supporting. Mixed with them, however, has flowed a thin stream of men who have left a criminal record behind them in Italy; these are the Black Handers. They settle down in communities of wage-earning Italians wherever they can find them and then proceed to prey on them. So far, then from being criminals themselves, the vast majority of the Italian immigrants here are in need of defence against the criminals. . . . The Black Hand is not a cohesive society. Given a number of Italians with money and two or three ex-criminals, you have all the elements necessary for a first-rate Black Hand campaign." The remedy lies in enforcing the immigration laws.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—Old St. Patrick's, New York's first Cathedral, celebrated the centenary of the laying of its cornerstone on Sunday, May 9, by an elaborate ceremonial, the ministers of which were prelates and priests, headed by His Grace, Archbishop Farley, who in the earlier years of their service had been connected with the parish. Mgr. John F. Kearney, for forty-three years the pastor, read this cablegram from the Pope.

"The Holy Father blesses the Archbishop of New York, blesses the priests gathered in your church to-day and blesses the congregation assembled in the walls of Old St. Patrick's."

The Right Rev. Thomas F. Kennedy, rector of the American College, Rome, sent a cablegram which read: "We have celebrated pontifical Mass this morning for the Archbishop, for the priests and for the congregation of Old St. Patrick's at the same altar where you celebrated your first Mass." This had reference to the chapel of the college, of which Mgr. Kearney is the oldest New York alumnus.

—Bishop Walsh, of Portland, Maine, has made the cause of higher education one of the special works of his episcopate. A new convent school which he has had erected in the Deering District near Portland is nearly completed. It will be in charge of the Sisters of Mercy, and will be equipped with all the latest modern improvements.

—Richmond Va. has just celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of St. Peter's Cathedral.

—Two bronze memorial tablets, one for Bishop Thomas A. Becker and the other for Bishop A. A. Curtis, the first and second incumbents of the see, will be unveiled in the cathedral, Wilmington, Del., on July 11. Two marble baptismal fonts, also memorials, will be placed there at the same time.

—Enough Spanish-speaking Catholics have been enrolled in Philadelphia to form a special parish, of which the Rev. Antonio Casulleras, C.M., has been given charge.

—Gallipolis, Ohio, is the oldest Catholic parish in the State, having been founded one hundred and sixteen years ago by a colony from France in the course of one of the wild-cat land boom schemes evolved in the early days of the Republic. The first settlers were, of course, grossly deceived as to the nature of the country. One of the canons of St. Denis, Paris, was designated as the bishop of the projected see, but before he could be consecrated, the land fraud was discovered. In spite of its age there are now only sixteen families in the parish and there is not a single French name among them. New blood is, however, coming into the place and during a mission there two weeks ago, the local Episcopal minister asked that a sermon on "Convents and Nuns" should be given on an evening when he and his parishioners could attend.

—The Rev. Dr. Herbert Vaughan, who came here from England a year ago to study the system of the mission bands, in order to make use of it in the work of the Catholic Missionary Society for England, is returning to take up the extension of the organization throughout the various English dioceses. In response to his appeal for financial aid the Catholic Missionary Union has given him $500. As his mother is an American, Dr. Vaughan thinks he has what he calls "a wee claim" on the generosity of those enthused with the missionary spirit on this side of the Atlantic.

—There are now 21,584 members in the 110 branches of the Holy Name Society organized in New York archdiocese, according to the business reported at the last quarterly meeting.

—Monsignor John Manuel Bidwell, D.D., who since the beginning of 1908 has been one of the attachés of the Papal Secretary of State in Rome, has been called back to the archdiocese of Westminster to act as chancellor.

—The new co-adjutor to the Bishop of Syracuse, N. Y., Mgr. John Grimes, will be consecrated on Sunday, May 16, by Archbishop Farley, at the Cathedral, Syracuse.

—The Archbishops at their recent meeting made Rev. A. P. Doyle, C.S.P., of the Apostolic Mission House their representative in the appointment of chaplains in the Army and Navy. During the last seven years twenty priests have been appointed in the army, four have retired on pensions, five have resigned, leaving at present eleven. There are now three vacancies to be filled in the army and none in the navy. The War Department is exceedingly anxious to have these vacancies filled as soon as possible.

—The intermediary general chapter of the Franciscan Order which convenes six years after the chapter in which its Minister General of the Order is elected, will be held in the convent of Santa Maria degli Angeli in Assisi, on the 29th of this month. The General Definitors who, according to the laws of the Order, act as counsellors to the Minister General and who are twelve in number, are to be elected in the chapter; and other business of importance within the Order is to be transacted. America will be represented by the Very Reverend Father Provincials, Edward Blecke of the Eastern Province, Chrysostom Theobald of the Province of Cincinnati, and Cyprian Banscheid of the Province of St. Louis.

—Catholics will be interested in a new movement among Protestants, the enlisting of students as missionaries. The Boston Evening Transcript gives an elaborate account of the first annual conference of the Greater Boston Volunteer League, the primary purpose of which is to try to persuade college men and women to go to distant parts as missionaries. It is said that there are now nearly five thousand student Volunteers in the foreign mission fields, while nearly as many more have signed the declaration pledge and stand ready to go when the opportunity arises. During the current college year twenty-three thousand young men and women have been enrolled in the mission study classes maintained by the association. These classes are being conducted in nearly four hundred institutions of higher learning.

—One of the great difficulties in dealing with the rapid increase of Italian Catholics at all our centres of population during recent years has been the scarcity of priests not only speaking their language but in sympathetic accord with the people. Provision in one phase of this direction for the New York of the future is being made by Columbus College at Hawthorne, Westchester County, which will be dedicated by the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falconio, on Sunday, May 16. It will be in charge of the Salesian Sons of Dom Bosco, and is the gift for its special purpose of Mr. J. McGrane, of New York.

—As a practical evidence of the rapid growth of the Church in the Middle West, the task recently assigned to Rev. E. A. Kelly, of Chicago, as head of a fixed Committee of the Archdiocese may be adduced. In order to relieve overburdened existent parishes and to accommodate the influx of Catholic population in newly developed residential sections of Chicago, Archbishop Quigley contemplates the establishment of ten new parishes in his diocesan city. The Committee, of which Father Kelly is the head, is considering the problem of re-districting old parishes and of mapping out new ones. Its report will be in the hands of the Archbishop in a few weeks when the ten new parishes will be erected.

Bishop Canevin, of Pittsburg, has sent the Rev. Hugh C. Boyle to make a special course at the Catholic University previous to assuming in the coming fall the office of Division School Inspector.

Archbishop Gillow of Oaxaca, Mexico, has ordered the establishment of parish schools wherever they are not at present in operation.

EXAMPLE.

Some one who watched my faltering fight
(Though all unknown to me),
Bore news of what I tried to do
Over a far-off sea.

And there another striving soul
(Though half a world away),
Through word of me took heart anew
And won the hard-fought day.

MARIE BLAKE.

SOCIOLOGY

The official transfer of the sovereignty of the Congo State to the Belgian people, has caused a great deal of interest in the world at large. During the years of King Leopold's rule, the Congo Free State was officially an independent power, governed by three secretaries-general residing in Brussels, responsible to the King alone. To outward appearance, it was an extremely autocratic government, but, practically, it was no more autocratic than the administration of some of the British "crown colonies" in which the governor is, to all intents and purposes, autocratic. Now all is to be changed. Following the transfer of sovereignty, there has been created a Belgian Colonial Minister, who takes charge of Congo interests. He will be responsible to the Belgian Parliament, and if Parliament does not like the way he manages affairs, it can easily remove him. Moreover the colonial budget will be subject to the approval of Parliament, which thus holds the purse-strings, and controls the situation. All new laws must be approved by the Belgian legislature, and all new grants of concessions must be submitted to Parliament. No one now denies that the "one man power" of King Leopold's regime was efficient; will the rule of Parliament prove equally so? On the whole, the prospects seem good, in spite of the croakings of the envious, and this in spite of the fact, that Congo concessionary shares are depressed and selling below par. It is generally granted that "one man power" is essential in the early years of colonial development for quick and decisive action in dealing with colonial problems as they arise. But with the passing of the days of infancy of a colony, circumstances become radically changed. Thus it is with the Congo Free State, and the transfer of its sovereignty seems to have aroused a splendid spirit in the Belgian nation. A good start has been made in the choice of M. Renkin, a level-headed man of calm judgment, high ability and quick decision, as first colonial minister. He has done much good work in organizing his department, and he means to spend some time in the Free State itself, to secure that first-hand knowledge of the country and people, which a wise prudence urges him to attain. The relations of the Congo to the other powers naturally undergo certain changes, but these are more in form than in reality. Congo, as an independent State, has ceased to exist, but all its international obligations and treaties have been assumed by the new government, the Belgian nation.

From Washington, D. C., comes the report of the inauguration of an "Irish home-going movement," which will take the form of a pilgrimage to Ireland of the sons and daughters of Erin. The slogan, indicating the time and place of the event, will be "Ireland for the Irish—1910—Meet me at Kilkenny." The principal purpose of the proposed pilgrimage is the development of the natural resources of Ireland and the upbuilding of its industries. The leader in the movement is Mr. Frank J. Kilkenny, of the Treasury Department, who hopes to establish national headquarters in Washington, with branches of the Irish homegoing movement in the principal cities of the country.

After the model of the German "Volksverein" the Catholics of Holland two years ago organized an association, which from the beginning has commanded general respect. It now counts 70,000 members, and up to date has distributed nearly a million pamphlets on the social question. Every year the members hold a "Social Question Week," during which they are agreeably and profitably entertained with speeches and lectures on social needs and methods. The greatest praise for the society comes from an enemy, the editor of a socialist paper, who said: "It is an adversary that enters the combat well equipped. It would be folly to disregard its power."

The promoters of public playgrounds in American cities present a report at once surprising and gratifying. There are now one hundred and thirty-seven cities supporting playgrounds at public expense and ninety-one others in which private generosity supplies the need. The reports reveal the awakening of the municipalities to the needs and rights of children and to the realization that in the bustling activity for to-day's interests it is well to show full regard for the secure well-being of the morrow.

There is a type of morbid activity that is peculiarly characteristic of modern civilization, says Dr. Charles L. Dana, the eminent nerve specialist, in The Medical Record. We have come to regard animals differently he tells us in the past one hundred years: we breed them more carefully, train them better, kill them less ruthlessly, and are more concerned for their welfare. But along with these advances there has come a tendency to regard the animal intelligence as of a human type, which is not justified by the facts. To this "Modern malady," as he calls it, he gives the name of "zoophil-psychosis." "The psychosis," says Dr. Dana, "is really the expression of a weak nature. A very kind-hearted person, for example, may be also very indolent and very selfish—the combination is not uncommon."

The writer of a letter to the Boston Evening Transcript blames the Doctor for being too hard on kind-hearted people. Granting there is on record the case of a woman who lost her mind because her cat died of cancer; of a girl "obsessed with remorse" because she had given away her cat; of a young man who dared not go about for fear of seeing animals suffer, or a woman who neglected her home duties "to keep a cat hospital," is it not reasonable to suppose that those persons were weakminded or mentally unsound to start with? "There is little danger," he says, "of the world getting too sentimental over the sufferings of animals. So far we are only beginning to think about giving them fair treatment . . . better run the chance of letting a few hysterical men and women, who are going to go daft over one thing if they don't over another, take the lower animals for their craze than hinder a progress in advanced civilization that will not be perfect until, not only mankind, but all living creatures, are treated with sympathetic and kind consideration for their needs, which means with ample justice."

The Men's Anti-Immorality Societies of Germany met at Cologne. The executive committee reported that they had taken part in the international congress at Paris against pornography and had also frequently and successfully petitioned the Prussian Minister of Justice to stop the spread of immoral posters and advertisements. It was on their petition that the so-called "Schönheitsabende"—beauty evenings—were prohibited by the Berlin police, because they were schools of the grossest kind of vice. "Our laws are all right; but the people must not expect that the police and the courts can do everything." The meeting was specially interesting because of a lecture by Dr. Forester, a Protestant professor of the University of Zürich, who has written excellent works on the relation of the sexes. "If we read the books written on this subject during the few last years," he said, "we almost imagine that everything must be remodelled. What we need, is the treasure of old: the sanctity of the marriage tie! Modern literature as regards matrimony is one gross error; but the time will come when even the blind will see that there are eternal truths which can not be effaced by ephemeral wisdom."

EDUCATION

Some years ago the Lower House of the Parliament of Holland accepted an amendment to its school laws by which primary free schools, Catholic schools included, should receive subsidies from the Government. By a vote of 63 to 19 the House has lately passed a new law admitting secondary free schools, Catholic colleges among them, to the same privilege. A proposal that the subsidized institutions should have the approval of the Government was rejected by a vote of 54 to 24, the Minister declaring that the free schools should remain free in the fullest sense.

The inevitable reaction against the exaggerated specialism in education in this country in recent years is at last beginning to set in very strongly. Here in the United States those who are opposed to it are as yet not very emphatic. In Canada, however, they do not hesitate to say what they think about it in unmeasured terms, and some of their expressions make rather racy reading. An article written by Steven Leacock in The University Magazine of Montreal on "Literature and Education in America" is concerned mainly with exaggeration of specialization in post-graduate studies. He says "The American student is expected to become altogether a specialist, devoting his whole mind to the left foot of the garden frog, or to the use of the ablative in Tacitus, or to the history of the first half hour of the Reformation." He says nothing about the conceit that is likely to develop in a man who thus devotes himself to one little subject and thinks he knows all about it. Dean West, of the graduate schools at Princeton, summed up that very well, however, sometime ago when he said "a specialist is a man who knows so much more about one subject than he knows about any other that he thinks he knows more about that subject than anyone else does, in which he is often very much mistaken."

Mr. Leacock has something to say about this state of mind that is worth while repeating: "Some years ago I resided for a month with a group of men who were specialists of the type described, most of them in pursuit of their degree of Doctor of Philosophy, some of them—easily distinguished by their air of complete vacuity—already in possession of it. The first night I dined with them I addressed to the man opposite me some harmless question about a recent book of general interest. 'I don't know anything about that,' he answered, 'I'm in sociology.'" Mr. Leacock continues: "I remember once seeing a specimen of this kind enter a country post-office store, and make a few purchases, closely scrutinized by the rural occupants. When he had gone out the postmaster turned to a friend with triumphant air and said: 'Now wouldn't you think to look at him, that man was a d—d fool?' (Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, by the way, suggests that this term should not be used, it is Calvinistic, for it condemns the person in question by predestination as it were to eternal ill). 'I certainly would,' said the friend, nodding his head. 'Well, he isn't,' said the postmaster emphatically; 'he's a Doctor of Philosophy.' But the distinction was too subtle for most of the auditors." Evidently with sentiments like these in the air there is still hope for scholarship in this country.

A generous legacy from an old student and professor at Niagara University—why is it that such events are so rare in the records of our Catholic colleges?—has enabled the faculty to make a start on long deferred plans to add to the present buildings. A new dormitory and a house for the Sisters who care for the temporalities of the institution will be ready for use in September. In their statement of these changes the faculty add:

"A chapel, a science building, a library and faculty house are among the dreams—we trust our friends will not allow them to be mere dreams—of those who guide the destinies of Our Lady of Angels' shrine of learning, seated in regal majesty and queenly beauty above the mighty, world-famed gorge."

Seton Hall also announces that the damage of the recent fire will be repaired at once, and a new and up-to-date structure replace the burned part of the foundation. Another item of news in the same direction is that Boston College will break ground for the new university buildings next month. All of which is most satisfactory evidence of progress and push among our Catholic colleges.

PERSONAL

The congratulations showered upon Lord Lister on his eighty-second birthday prove that his services to mankind are not overlooked. More than forty years ago he first announced his antiseptic treatment, which has made so many of the miracles of modern surgery possible. The worthy old man has received in these years abundant proof of the popular gratitude: kings have ennobled him, scholars have honored him, and cities have welcomed him to their freedom. Lord Lister has been little moved by these manifestations, and in the peace of quiet retirement he spends his days.

Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte was tendered the position of legal adviser to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions by the board of directors, which met recently at the Catholic University, and Rev. William Ketcham, who is in charge of the Indian mission work, has received his acceptance.

Speaking of Charles Warren Stoddard's "The Lepers of Molokai," Burton Kline in the Boston Evening Transcript says: "The opening contains the quintessence of his powers. Nobody else could paint a scene with such magic accuracy, and at the same time stamp it with its atmosphere with the same unerring skill. The people in the piece are all there, but so are their feelings, joyous or sorrowful, vividly, poignantly portrayed. The lepers leaving the wharf at Honolulu, never to return from Molokai, are limed in with a realism that omits nothing; but the pity of their case, the very sunset shedding a benison over their parting, the despair of their friends left behind—that, too, has not been left out. The picture makes you feel as vividly as you see."

"It is true," continues the writer, "that 'Theo. Bentzon,' a very exacting critic, called Mr. Stoddard the American Pierre Loti, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and probably thought it a good and sufficient compliment. But his laurels need not be grafted on another's fame, not even the name of Pierre Loti. His books will endure because they were written by Charles Warren Stoddard. . . . They are redolent of the personality of their writer, a man of a sparkle and charm as taking as it was singular, fugitive and impossible to describe."

Dublin is to have a memorial of the ill-starred poet, James Clarence Mangan in St. Stephen's Green.

PLATFORM AND PULPIT

Lecturing on "Art as a Peculiar Product of Christianity," the Rev. P. C. Gavan, Chancellor of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, began the story of Christian Art with its rise in the Catacombs and follows its gradual development into the Byzantine period. Of the thirteenth century he said:

"About 1220 there arose two great religious bodies, those of St. Francis of Assisi and St. Dominic. The Dominicans preached the beauty of the Christian doctrines; the Franciscans, the beauty of a moral life. By their action a passion was aroused in the whole Christian world for the beautiful, and it was then that the passion for real painting first burst into life. The churches of the two orders soon became the schools and workshops of art, and it was the church that fostered this branch of intellectual learning.

"We have to-day examples of the work of the five great masters of the golden age—Correggio, Michael Angelo, Raffaele, Leonardo da Vinci and Titian. They put on canvas the greatest thoughts and conceptions the world has ever seen."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of America:

The editor of the "American Catholic Who's Who" finds that an idea has got abroad, in some quarters, that the "Catholic Who's Who" has an object it does not claim, that of being a social register. She wishes to point out that it is not to be a roll of honor, but a reference book, stating what Catholic men and women are doing and what position they hold in the Church, or the professions.

It will follow the line of the English (secular) "Who's Who," and "The Catholic Who's Who," published in London, of "Qui êtes Vous?" (Paris) and "Wer ist's?" (Berlin), works which have an immense vogue as books of ready reference, and serving the same purpose for the living that biographical dictionaries do for the dead.

The proposed work is not a social blue book. Its line of inclusion is drawn at what people have done for the Church, for education, for literature, science and art. Its purpose is to make Catholics better acquainted with what they are doing, and of bringing them into greater mutual acquaintance and unity.

In deciding who is to go in, the only question asked is: "Is this a person that Catholics and, we may add, non-Catholics, would like to know about, and need to know about?" It is understood, therefore, that the book is to be a means of bringing out the share which Catholics are doing of the world's work, so far as America is concerned.

To this end the editor trusts that all who have been, or will be asked to send in their record for the book, will promptly do so. Her work will thus be greatly lightened.

GEORGINA PELL CURTIS.

The object of AMERICA so well unfolded in the first issue, your organization and oversufficient facilities to realize such aim, all combine to secure a welcome, and let us hope, a very wide circulation among thoughtful Catholics.

Of these, there is one class, whose urgent needs I trust you will ever remember in your editorial and science columns. I refer to our Catholic doctors and Catholic nurses. Their influence, steadily at work, is not sufficiently used for the good of souls. Very many of them are trained by doctors, who, if not hostile to revealed religion, are most frequently material-minded. Thus prepared, with only a First Communion minimum of Catholic instruction, they do not realize their opportunities, nay, their obligations regarding the call of a priest to the apparently dead, regarding the baptism of children in the cases explained in our treatise "De Sexto," regarding some very important and very practical points about which every young mother should be kept informed.

Nevertheless, this class of influential persons are daily attending Catholic mothers, and hourly receiving into the hospitals the sick, dying and the apparently dead. With the needs of these doctors and nurses ever in mind, your AMERICA, by calling attention to certain practices fatal in consequences, to certain books and articles explaining the Catholic view on medical questions ever arising, could exercise a mighty influence for the good of souls, many of which are unable to help themselves.

REV. DANIEL P. DUFFY, S.S.
St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore.

A Brooklyn subscriber has this to say on a current topic of interest:

I am delighted to have a Catholic newspaper and one of such excellence as AMERICA. I wish, however, you had omitted the article on Woman Suffrage in your first number. I am neither a suffragette nor a suffragist, as yet, but I cannot but feel that the article is a very one-sided presentation of the suffrage movement. Why give such weight to the declaration of one "Englishwoman" even though she be "distinguished?" To state that a committee failed to report a measure favorably is surely no argument against its strength. Committees have been known to hold bills, although strongly urged by many members of the Senate and the Assembly to report them. As you know, a governor, one man, can influence a committee so that a measure will be held in committee. I was taught by a Jesuit father, now dead, to appreciate articles that gave both sides of a question, and allowed one to make one's own conclusions. That the suffrage movement has gained in strength cannot be denied; that it is wise movement is a different matter.

In the face of such excellence as AMERICA shows I hesitated writing my small protest against anything in its pages, but I disliked your first number being in any way unfair to the woman, or to any one. So many of our papers are biased; let the Catholic one be broad and fair.

I expected much, and happily am not disappointed. It is a credit to the staff. Its leaders, summary and reviews are all of a high order of journalism. Specially worthy of commendation seems to me the enterprise shown in cabling to Germany for correct information regarding Professor Schnitzer's case. With all my heart I say then to this newest venture in high-class Catholic journalism: "Vivat, floreat, crescat!"—May it live long, flourish exceedingly and prodigiously increase its circulation.

The Sunday Closing Question

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

As one of the "Committee of Fourteen," the corporation devoted to the work of suppressing the Raines' Law hotels, I am acquainted with the Brough Bill, drawn by it, to which Mr. Philbin's letter is directed in your issue of April 24. The strange position of the "Committee of Fourteen" is that it is showered with praise for everything in this bill, which covers a number of important points excepting the one clause which relates to the opening of the liquor saloons on Sundays from 1 o'clock in the afternoon to 11 o'clock at night. The committee finds it difficult to understand how its deliberations should have merited praise for its labor and zeal in every thing but as regards the proposal for Sunday opening.

I think there is no one of the "Committee of Fourteen" who is not in principle opposed to the sale of liquor on Sunday in the barrooms of this great city. The clause was inserted in the bill solely as a remedy for grave public evils. The committee thought that it was such a remedy for these reasons:

It is a patent fact that anyone who desires to do so can obtain all the liquor that he wishes in any one of the thousands of liquor saloons in New York which may choose to keep open on Sunday. The law is certainly not enforced. The violations of the law must easily exceed 100,000 cases every Sunday.

The evil consequences of this state of facts are: (1) the use of money in regard to the police; (2) the sale of liquor all day Sunday; (3) the open violation of the law, and (4) finally a social and political hypocrisy that, in my opinion, is the most grievous of all the evils if for no other reason than the following. The Raines' Law hotel is, unfortunately, sufficiently well known to make discussion of it here unnecessary. It is a cancerous ulcer on the body politic. It is the direct and immediate result of this hypocrisy, social and political of which I have spoken.

The opponents of the Sunday opening clause of the Brough Bill say that the liquor law respecting sales of liquor on Sunday can be enforced in the face of the reports of the public officers and the common knowledge of the people of New York City.

If they mean that the law can be enforced and regularly kept enforced in the present state of public sentiment by the local officers placed in charge of its enforcement I deny the statement expressly. In this denial the committee's inquiries show that almost everyone connected with the administration of justice or with intimate knowledge of political conditions joins.

The police side of the difficulty need not be discussed here. A policeman is only human. It is not fair to give him practically the power to issue licenses to violate the liquor law on Sunday and then expect him to resist the temptation in all cases when the overwhelming public sentiment of the city does not regard either buying or selling liquor on Sunday as a sin, and when the law itself permits such acts with perfect legality in the cases of hotels, both Raines' Law and otherwise, and of the social clubs of certain qualities.

It seemed to the "Committee of Fourteen" that the remedy lay in acknowledging the public sentiment of the city and in inserting in its bill a provision regarding Sunday selling of liquor which would be supported by the general public opinion of the city, and which the police consequently would have to enforce. The saloonkeepers and the brewers and the liquor trade, vitally concerned in the matter all agreed with the "Committee of Fourteen" that such a provision broadly considered was wise, and that it could be enforced, and that the liquor trade generally would acknowledge it as an enforceable statute and see to its enforcement as far as possible. Public opinion, it was evident, would force this anyway. This is the genesis of the Sunday opening clause of the Brough Bill.

Mr. Philbin discusses in his letter the police and grafting. The general honesty of the police force is not questioned by anyone that I know of. Certainly I never heard them charged with "being hopelessly addicted to the habit of grafting." It is a fact, however, beyond contradiction that the man in the street is convinced that the liquor dealers pay for the police protection for the sale of liquor on Sunday. The strength of the evidence behind this conviction Mr. Philbin does not discuss or mention. The position of the liquor trade and the saloonkeepers in the matter Mr. Philbin seems entirely to misunderstand.

I am not aware of the idea which Mr. Philbin mentions "that saloonkeepers insist that the law be adapted to their business regardless of consideration for the community." As I have stated above the cooperation of the liquor trade for the orderly and decent enforcement of a reasonable Sunday selling provision has been promised by honorable men of standing in the community.

Mr. Philbin's second assumed ground for the bill mentioned in his letter "that the working men desired to have the saloons open" on Sunday is new to me. I never heard such a proposition discussed. It seems to me to be in fact irrelevant. The working men are not in a political sense a class in the community. Some 90 per cent. of the population are working men and women. The "Committee of Fourteen" was considering a general public sentiment and moral condition, not those of any social class in the community. The "Committee of Fourteen" wishes as fervently as Mr. Philbin that the working man would "not spend his time on Sunday away from his family in a saloon." It honestly thinks that the proposed change in the law would result in a great decrease in the number offending in that way. Now liquor is sold generally all day on Sunday in back rooms and concealed places and as far into the night as the liquor seller and his customers choose. Under the proposed change it would be sold legally and decently, and only for ten hours, and those in the most acceptable part of the day, and such a law would and could be enforced.

Mr. Philbin's proposition as to the Raines' Law hotels and the effect upon them of the allowance of sale on Sunday in barrooms generally is erroneous. The "Committee of Fourteen," which has long studied the Raines' Law hotel problem earnestly, knows that it is the privilege of selling liquor on Sunday which keeps them for the most part alive. It is to be remembered that a Raines' Law hotel is never a legitimate hotel; that is, one honestly conducting for profit the business of boarding and lodging guests. It pretends to be a hotel solely in order to sell liquor on Sunday. The expenses of making this pretense are recovered by the unspeakable methods pursued by their keepers, not only on Sunday, but during the week in the portions of the building outside the barroom. As a matter of fact if the sale of liquor on Sunday were permitted in barrooms, the Raines' Law hotel with its horrors would probably entirely disappear.

Lastly, Mr. Philbin's confusion in his letter of malum prohibitum and malum in se, I think has misled him seriously. To reduce the prevalence of offenses recognized as such in morals by repealing the penal statutes which make them civil crimes because they are hard to enforce would indeed be an absurd plan, and would merit the scorn which Mr. Philbin's letter visits upon it; but to modify or repeal sumptuary laws which control people's habits and customs as such, is surely a proper and wise field of legislation. When Connecticut repealed the Blue Laws which are humorously said to have prevented a mother from kissing her little child on its way to church on a Sunday morning, certainly there was no attack upon the morals of the State or public order generally. To support this part of Mr. Philbin's argument it must be assumed that either buying or selling liquor on Sunday in a liquor saloon is a moral offense. Mr. Philbin certainly would not claim that. The present liquor law, as has been said, is expressly to the contrary.

A great many excellent people completely misunderstand both the purpose and the methods of the Brough Bill and its advocates, and especially its provisions regarding the permission for the sale of liquor under severe police restrictions for a limited time on Sunday. The "Committee of Fourteen" has convinced itself that such a change in the law would render great public service. It would like to see its arguments met and discussed. The failure of the bill at Albany this season does not mean its defeat by any means. I hope Mr. Philbin will return to the discussion of the matter.

Yours very truly,

EDWARD J. MCGUIRE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. McGuire has courteously sent me a copy of his communication to you, and which concludes with the suggestion that I reply. I ask your leave to briefly do so.

There is no evidence that public sentiment opposes the enforcement of the law. The main object of the civil law is to procure peace and rest on Sunday. If the law is violated as to saloons, the average citizen does not know it, except through the press. The community would not stand for the saloons being open as on week days, even for a part of the day.

The grand juries have failed to take interest in such cases because of the need of considering more important crimes. The law does not design that they shall have violations of the liquor tax law submitted to them, but the Court of Special Sessions has been designated as the proper tribunal. Failures to convict are more frequently due to the difficulty of getting sufficient evidence than lack of sympathy on the part of officials. The law can be enforced. It is rigidly upheld in Buffalo. The State Commissioner of Excise, with only sixty special agents, secured over two hundred convictions in this city since January, 1908. What would be the result if the local police accomplished proportionately as much?

The District Attorney has said that if the Excise Commissioner would give him twenty agents he could close every saloon as tight as a drum. The "Committee of Fourteen" has closed eleven hundred so-called Raines Law hotels, which seemed an incurable evil, and yet it says the Liquor Tax Law cannot be enforced.

The official who enforces the law as to saloons offends but a small percentage of each section of the city, and that is greatly offset by the general popular approval. If he is sincere and fearless every great religious, labor and civic organization will applaud and support him.

The law would still be broken if it were amended as proposed. The most profitable and pernicious period of violation is between midnight and five A. M. on Sunday. The saloonkeeper would certainly not consider the privilege of selling between one and eleven P. M. as compensating for the enforcement of the law during the above hours.

A recent report of the Excise Department states that eight hundred and sixty-four saloons have been put out of business, mainly for Sunday violations, thus indicating that public sentiment is not overwhelmingly against the enforcement of the law. The amendment of the law would be a source of temptation. Sneaking in a side door and possibly being regarded by the bartender as a spy, deters many. An open saloon would induce many a man to drink who now has no desire. There is no evidence that the workingman desires the saloon open on Sunday.

I have confined myself to a discussion of the plan of opening the saloons on Sunday. There are other phases of the observance of the day that present greater difficulties in their solution. It should be possible to make the day one of recreation as well as of rest for the workingman, and even the sale of liquor under proper circumstances, but not in the saloons, might be susceptible of satisfactory adjustment to all.

Respectfully yours,

EUGENE A. PHILBIN.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

Numbers 2 and 3 of AMERICA came to hand last week. Their contents are in every respect satisfying, as a fulfilment of the undertakings which were given in the programme mapped out by the management. We venture to say that for the future historians of Catholic activity and thought in this epoch they will be found to be of the same high scale of value as the immortal "Relations" which tells the story of the conquest of North America by the great Jesuit pioneers.—Catholic Standard and Times.

The new Catholic review, AMERICA, recently launched * * * to the delight and happiness of literary minds, both home and abroad, is being highly commended by the press of the country, both religious and secular. The new review richly deserves the highest encomium.—Catholic Sun.

The first number gives every indication that the new publication will be an able and valuable addition to the literature of the Faith.—Jamaica Plains News.

Its sphere of influence will be boundless. To the Catholic mind it is a source of clean pleasure, reliable information, and a broad education. * * * The attention of the non-Catholic mind will be caught by its simplicity and methods and accomplishments. Anti-Catholic prejudice will be emasculated by its policy, its spirit, its atmosphere of truth and thoroughness.

AMERICA needs no apology, no appeal—only the chance to present itself to the eye and mind of a reader. Grant it that, and its own merit will enlist your support, enthusiasm and gratitude.—Parish Monthly, Peru, Indiana.

No one paper or magazine can hope to reach everybody, neither can any one paper possibly expect to refute each error that appears in the public press in regard to our most Holy Faith. Therefore all Catholic editors should unite in the Pilot's kindly message to AMERICA; all should unite in our sacred work of safeguarding, defending, explaining the true faith and refuting error; we should be brothers-in-arms in a glorious warfare; and exult that we are permitted to do a work which has been called most congenial to the mind of the great apostle St. Paul, and which he would gladly choose, were he among us now.—Sacred Heart Review.

In typographical appearance and in arrangement of matter the new review is pleasing. It is of handy form and well suited to the reader in his easy chair or the confirmed straphanger who will insist upon scanning a paper on his flight from office to home. We envy the equipment which permits of such nice preparation, and very earnestly hope that the future will prove so kind to us that we can don such smart garb and mingle, even in a very modest way, in such charming company.—True Witness, Montreal.

What is Said About America.

. . . AMERICA realized what has been my desire nearly half a century, to see a clever and impartial Catholic weekly newspaper, containing a true statement of important facts and principles habitually misstated and misrepresented in the daily non-Catholic press. . . . I have ardently recommended it to my flock, and shall again repeat the recommendation.

REV. DR. HENRY A. BRANN.

New York.

. . . AMERICA covers a wide field thoroughly, and is a dignified, interesting magazine. May it prove successful in every way.

REV. G. PETTIT, S.J.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

. . . With the greatest pleasure I subscribe to your review, AMERICA. I am sure that it will be my best and dearest friend in the solitude of my mission.

Lambert, P. O. REV. W. T. ROY.

. . . Allow me to congratulate you upon the new field of labor which you doubtlessly will plough with results more encouraging than the most sanguine of your admirers will predict. I heartily hail the appearance of AMERICA.

REV. FRANCIS T. PARR, C.S.S.R.

Buffalo, N. Y.

. . . I have seen the first two numbers of AMERICA and am delighted with them. I feel that every Catholic should rejoice in the excellence of the publication.

REV. ALBERT REINHART, O.P.

Washington, D. C.

. . . I enclose check for my subscription to AMERICA, and also add my hearty congratulations, good wishes and sincere gratitude to those who have been zealous and optimistic enough to inaugurate this great work for the increase of the Gospel through journalism.

REV. J. G. MURRAY, Chancellor.

Hartford, Conn.

. . . It is much needed, and is bound to do great, great good in the service of truth and religion.

REV. P. M. J. ROCK.

Louisville, Ky.

. . . AMERICA is bound to occupy the best strategic post for offence and defence in the battle for truth in our time and country.

REV. WILLIAM J. MCGURK.

So. Manchester, Conn.

. . . The right reverend bishop directs me to say that he hopes that your efforts will meet with success and that AMERICA will find a large circulation.

VERY REV. MGR J. A. DELANEY,

Secretary, Bishop of Albany.

Albany, N. Y.

. . . I wish you every success and hope your weekly will reach a large number of readers, and be the center from which will flow the best in Catholic thought and literature.

THOMAS F. COSTELLO.

New York.

. . . As I am pretty far advanced in the seventies, I am afraid I shall not enjoy reading AMERICA for many years, but as long as I live, I will remain on your list of subscribers. Wishing you full success, and a very long list of subscribers.

VERY REV. M. G. PROULX, V.G.

Nicolet, P. Q.

. . . It takes in the Catholic horizon at a glance, and will keep us posted on important things that otherwise would not be likely to be noticed.

REV. JOHN M. BREEN.

Manayunk, Phila. Pa.

. . . The paper is excellent; it satisfies all requirements, and the fact that we have at last a Catholic review that stands for the best thought and aspirations of literary Catholics, is most gratifying to those who have awaited the advent of such a review.

REV. EDWARD F. X. FINK, S.J.

Earthquake Funds Misapplied.—The question of the misuse of the earthquake funds is still alive. As AMERICA, May 8, announced, there have been attempts at "Souperism" on the part of some Protestant sectaries, who made use of their own funds. But now it comes to light that the Hungarian Earthquake Committee has officially constituted itself a promoter of Protestantism in the afflicted regions. The Italian press has published a letter from the committee to the president of the council forwarding him "3,000 crowns to rebuild the Waldesian church and school at Messina, and 5,000 crowns to assist other Protestant and Evangelical churches in Southern Italy." These are the exact words of the letter signed by President Kossuth, the son of the great Hungarian Revolutionist who certainly never descended to religious proselytism. It is another example of Protestant methods which, in Rome as elsewhere in Italy, bring in converts of the style known in Asiatic countries as "Rice Christians."

The present case is all the more irritating because Prince Cardinal Vaszary is patron, and Wekerle president of the Hungarian Council which sends this money for Protestant propaganda. Whether the committee directly voted the money for the purpose, or merely accepted it for transmission, it clearly went outside its powers in doing so. Moreover, it is a question whether the Italian Government would accept money under such circumstances for a purely Catholic object. Some people are asking if the act is to be interpreted as an official anti-Catholic declaration. As far as Kossuth and Wekerle are concerned they are out-and-out Protestants, but as concerns Giolitti it is only another example of the opportunism which is the keynote of his whole political career. Doubtless the Cardinal Primate's patronage was abused; but if Catholics would only realize the way all public charitable collections are diverted they would entrust their contributions to safer hands.

Columbus Day.—A bill has been introduced in Congress to make October 12 of each year a legal holiday to be known as Columbus Day. Seven States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Colorado, California, Montana and Illinois have thus far so honored the great discoverer, and it is hoped to have the national tribute to his memory paid at an early date. Narrow-minded carpers who objected at the outset of the movement that we are having too many holidays do not seem to be meeting with special success in this direction. There is a growing interest in the trans-Atlantic fad that turns back the clock two hours in the morning to give that additional day light for work, with a similar increase of the evening time for recreation.. It has already caught the government bureau employees in Washington. Lecturing before the Brooklyn Institute the other day on "Ideals of Democracy," G. Lowes Dickinson, M.A., Fellow of Kings College, Cambridge, declared, with much public approval, that "we ought to be able to secure more leisure, even though the thing that most condemns us just now is the little leisure and the extraordinarily bad use to which it is put."

"If people are too tired out to enjoy things that are worth while," he added, "they naturally go to see something that will amuse them and not put further strain upon minds weakened by too long hours of work and affected by the jaded body."

Senator Depew and the Tariff.—The Senior Senator of the Empire State injected a bit of academic novelty into the weary routine of the tariff debate during his speech this week. Having endorsed Hancock's claim that tariff is a local issue and denied any pledge of downward revision on the part of the Republicans, the Senator declared himself opposed to an income tax. Explaining his position as a protectionist, Mr. Depew then discussed the conflicting economic theories of Alexander Hamilton and Robert Walker, reaching the conclusion that, save in Great Britain, the Hamilton theories had conquered the world. "The fight to the death is now going on in the last citadel of Adam Smith, Richard Cobden and Robert Walker—the British Isles. It is a contest which I believe must result there as everywhere else in the triumph of the ideas of Alexander Hamilton."

The Hains Sentence.—"A substantial though by no means a severe punishment" is the popular verdict regarding the indeterminate sentence of from eight to sixteen years imprisonment imposed on Captain Peter C. Hains. The words spoken by Justice Garretson in imposing sentence show a praiseworthy disposition regarding the appeal to the "unwritten law" urged by Hains' counsel. "With the verdict of the jury the court is not disposed to disagree. The logic of it is that the killing of William Annis by you on August 15 last was not justified, and was the act of a man who was responsible therefor, and you must receive the penalty which the law prescribes. That any person may assume to be judge and executioner for a real or fancied wrong done to him by another, society cannot approve and the law does not sanction. Such a doctrine is abhorrent to all right-thinking men, and the practice of it is subversive of modern civilization. In this case the law of the State has been vindicated, and the claim to a right to mete out personal vengeance has been again condemned. Further comment is needless. The result of the trial is its own best commentary."

The Wirz Memorial.—A monument erected to the memory of Capt. Henry Wirz, at Andersonville, Ga., by the Daughters of the Confederacy, was unveiled May 12 by his daughter, Mrs. Perrin, of Nashville. Father P. H. McMahon, of Albany, Ga., delivered the invocation. The Stars and Stripes mingled with the Stars and Bars and good feeling marked all the addresses. Capt. Wirz, a native of Switzerland, having been disabled in the Confederate service, was made commandant of the Confederate prison at Andersonville. He was tried by a military commission at Washington on charges of cruelty and murder, and executed November 10, 1865. Mr. Stovall, the principal speaker at the unveiling, said that the monument was erected not to perpetuate bitterness, but to vindicate the memory of a brave and innocent man, the vicarious victim of popular passion. When Capt. Wirz was appointed Commander at Andersonville, the blockade of Southern ports had made medicine and the necessities of life contraband. The sufferings of the prisoners were unpreventable, and were endured by Wirz himself. He wrote, urged and journeyed to procure them food and medicine, but found it impossible. "His trial was unjust. He indignantly spurned a pardon proffered on condition that he would incriminate President Davis on a charge of which both were innocent." Gen. Grant's refusal to exchange prisoners and dire necessity were responsible for the sufferings at Andersonville. This the South is willing to forget, but she will not forget her heroes and martyrs.

Those who knew Captain Wirz and his circumstances best, maintained that he was a wronged man. Fathers Whelan and Hamilton, both priests of the highest character and frequent visitors to the Andersonville prison, declared that he did the best he could under the circumstances. Father Whelan received him into the Catholic Church while he was in command at Andersonville, and wrote three times to Secretary Stanton in his favor, but his appeal was unnoticed.

Census Tinkerings.—Committees of settlement workers in various big cities want the director of the coming census to order the enumerators to make their returns of population according to "city blocks" in place of wards or districts as formerly. This is to give the uplifters and social emancipators a chance "to work among the poor more effectually." The determination of the census director to clip fifteen per cent. off the enumeration of the Catholics to oblige the Sociologist who believes that their number should be limited to those "who are entitled or privileged to participate in the ordinance of communion," as noted recently in AMERICA, will be recalled. At this rate of procedure the Census of 1910 will result in a thing of shreds and patches. The "block" system, too, has not an attractive sound to the public ear. Some irreverent critic might make a reference to the "blocks of five" of malodorous memory.

Catholic Disabilities Bill.—The bill introduced by Mr. Wm. Redmond, M.P., in the British Parliament, illustrates how absurdly Catholics are discriminated against by English law eighty years after what is called Catholic Emancipation. The King's oath calls Catholics "idolaters," and is otherwise brutally offensive. Neither the Lord Chancellor of England, the "Keeper of the King's Conscience" nor the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, his representative, may be a Catholic, though they may belong to any other religion or to none. Members of Catholic religious orders have no legal status in England, at least by statutory law. Mr. Asquith, the Premier, spoke favorably of Mr. Redmond's bill which aims at removing these disabilities. The vote, however, by which it passed second reading, indicates that many Liberals abstained from voting and that some opposed it. A petition against the bill bearing 300,000 names was brought into the House as Mr. Redmond rose to introduce his measure.

Ireland and the British Budget.—All classes in Ireland are united against those portions of the British Budget that bear heavily on that country. Mr. Redmond and Lord Dunraven are at one in their protest against the indirect taxation which will be twenty-three per cent. higher in Ireland than in England. Ireland's tax, said Mr. Redmond, is chiefly on the food of her people. A Government Commission has established that she pays $12,500,000 per year beyond her due; and now that she is trying to rebuild her industries, Government not only lends her no assistance but discriminates against her in favor of England. Mr. Lloyd-George's reference to Ireland's advantage in Old Age Pensions only accentuated the fact that the misgovernment which caused the emigration of the young, made the proportion of the old abnormally large. England and her colonies whose commerce they protect should pay for the Dreadnoughts, not Ireland, which has been left no commerce to need protection. The tax raises tobacco from 3d to 3½ pence an ounce. This means, says the Dublin Leader, that "the Irish workman buys in his ounce of tobacco a ha'p'orth of Dreadnought." Mr. Lloyd-George held out some hope that Irish-raised tobacco would be protected; but the distillers and brewers, and in consequence the producers of oats and rye, have no such prospects.

German Colonies.—On April 25 German colonial policy celebrated its silver jubilee. On that day in 1884 the German consul in Capetown made the official declaration that a settlement at Angra Pequena, started by a Bremen firm, was under the protection of the German Empire. Until then England had considered that spot a part of her Cape Colony, but gave up her claims. Germany's colonies now represent an area five times her own size with a population of about twelve millions. "Our colonies," says the Kölnische Volkszeitung, "give us little pleasure in return for the enormous expenses which they caused. We must be satisfied if our colonial officers have at least learned something by their unfavorable experiences. Indications of better times are not wanting. The present administration tries to make the colonies self-supporting. We also hope the period of colonial scandals has come to a close, and the absolute necessity of aiding missionary efforts is at last fully realized."

There are about 130 Catholic missionary stations in the German colonies. As a rule they are protected by the colonial officers, though there are cases of persecution on record. In German East Africa the silkworm is found in such numbers as to injure the crops. This will constitute a much desired source of revenue to the mother country. In Hanau, Germany, a company has been formed to develop the diamond fields which are situated in South West Africa. In 1890 Cecil Rhodes concluded a treaty with a Kaffir chief for the exploitation of districts in the German colony. But this transaction was never considered as valid by the German colonial authorities. At present the Government takes steps to prevent non-Germans from working any mines in these districts. A grave danger to the colonies is alcoholism. Dr. Ph. Kuhn, an army physician who spent many years in Africa, says that the negro is entirely helpless against the attractions of intoxicating drinks.

The Orleans Feasts.—A most striking fact has been the opposition shown by freemasonry and the Government against all demonstrations in favor of Jeanne d'Arc on the occasion of her Beatification. M. Fabre, a Senator and a Protestant, in a very sensible and elaborate article in Le Temps, reproaches both freemasons and the Government for this conduct. Among the acts that provoked indignation, was the prohibition of any decoration of the statues of Jeanne d'Arc on the day of the Beatification. If flowers were placed near them, the police that kept watch at once removed them. In Domremy, the native place of the holy Maid, all houses were decorated and illuminated, but the little house where Blessed Jeanne saw the light was left unadorned and dark. Another act even much more resented was the preventing the historic traditional cortege at Orleans. M. Clemenceau gave peremptory orders that it should not take place this year, on the plea that the Orleans feasts this year had a particular character. The act was denounced on all sides as an outrage to patriotism. The merchants of Orleans in a meeting held at the Chamber of Commerce loudly denounced the act as a blow to the glory of their city, and to its municipal liberty. They resolved, if it were not withdrawn, to pay no taxes. The municipal council the next day entered its protest. The Women's Patriotic League sent representatives to the Prefect of Loiret to voice their indignation. Over two thousand Orleanese women joined them. The prefect, a creature of M. Clemenceau, was not to be seen. M. Clemenceau's sectarianism failed. The civil, the military and religious authorities and the various societies responded to the invitation issued by the city council to honor the celebration with their presence.

Government Employees on Strike.—A private letter from President Butler of Columbia University, published by permission in the Sun on May 18th, contains some timely views on the status of Government employees. "In my opinion, loyalty and treason ought to mean the same thing in the civil service that they do in the military and naval services. The door to get out is always open if one does not wish to serve the public on those terms. . . . The happiness and prosperity of a community might be more easily wrecked by the paralysis of its postal and telegraph services than by a mutiny on shipboard. . . . So far as my observation goes, events which have been taking place in France have produced a response from American opinion which is sound to the core."

"The peculiarity of the French case is that the Government is propped up by bureaucracy, and the civil servants know their power as well as the pretorians did in ancient Rome. Defeat of the strikers will mean the fall of the Government. That is Clemenceau's real dilemma.

Porto Rico's Governor.—The Republican Party in Porto Rico has sent a representative to Washington to demand the removal of Governor Post. The governor is accused of Anti-Americanism and favoring the Independence party; and of not seeing eye to eye with the Protestant clergy in the Island.

The Wreck of the Maine.—In a lecture in Washington on Sunday last, Rear Admiral Sigsbee argued against the raising of the Maine in Havana harbor, and upheld the finding of the Board of Inquiry that the Maine was blown up from outside. Last year Rear Admiral Luce wrote a letter in which he expressed the opinion that "it is a duty we owe ourselves as a nation that the true cause of the disaster should be determined beyond a doubt." Rear Admiral Chadwick would also desire to see the wreck raised. The prevailing opinion abroad seems to be that the sinking of the ship was due to an internal explosion, and AMERICA re-echoes Admiral Chadwick's words: "We can afford to say we were mistaken; we cannot afford the imputation of fearing the truth."

On nautical grounds Mr. Magoon in his last report as Governor of Cuba urged the raising of the derelict. In any case the general public would welcome any new light which exposing the wreck might bring.

Frauds in Examinations.—The State Education Department at Albany, N. Y., is actively investigating cases of personation in connection with Regents' examinations. Inspector De Groat declares he has the names of four professional personators, and it is asserted that in two years one of them added between $3,000 and $4,000 to his income by this means. The public has a right to be safeguarded against these frauds. Civic honesty demands that every assistance be given the investigators in unmasking not only the personators, but those who through their action have secured certificates for which they were unfitted. Unqualified, ignorant professional men are as much a danger to the State as forged bills or impure food.

Misleading Tariff Tables.—An evidently inspired statement appears in the New York Tribune of May 19, repudiating the accuracy of a table of tariff duties on various imported necessities, which has recently appeared in the press. The document in question, though prepared in the Treasury Department, was rejected by the treasury experts as misleading, and rescued from the waste paper basket by the newspapers.

The error of the table consists in the fact that the retail prices were taken as the basis for computing ad valorem duties. It is interesting, if sad, for the consumer to have it pointed out to him in cold official print that an article valued in the custom house at $5 very often retails at $10; so that very naturally tariff computations on retail prices are misleading. In the Senate on Monday, May 17, Senator Smoot said a German razor brought in at a cost of forty-nine cents was selling at $3. Making all allowances for difference in the cost of production between the United States and Germany this would seem to prove that more than protection is needed for our razors and similar industries.

Bohemia's Protestant Converts.—According to official statistics the number of apostasies from the Catholic Church in Bohemia during the year 1908 was 1,673. Of these, 1,266 fell away to Protestantism, 393 to Old-Catholicism and 14 to Judaism. The number of conversions to the Church from Protestantism was 370, from Old-Catholicism, 111, from Judaism, 69; in all, 550. The total loss of the Church in Bohemia is therefore 1,123. This is to a large extent the result of the Los-von-Rom movement. In judging these figures, however, we ought to bear in mind a warning of The Messenger: "By far the major part of these 'converts' to Protestantism are undeveloped youths, students, dependent employees, etc. People were often amazed and surprised to see their names on the list of 'converts'; an imprudent word dropped in the presence of the agitator about matters of Faith was enough." Moreover the Protestants receive their "converts" from a population of six and a half million Catholics, while there are only 160,000 Protestants from whom to draw converts to Catholicism. There was a conversion to Catholicism from every four hundred and fifty Protestants. If the Catholics had fallen away from their Church at the same rate, there would have been more than fourteen thousand apostasies to Protestantism. How careful we must be in accepting Protestant statistics may be seen from the following instance: According to the official census the increase of Protestantism during the last ten years is 19,400, births and conversions included. But the Protestants give the figure 19,795 for the conversions alone during the same period, and another Protestant statistician maintains that the increase by births alone is 10,000. Where is he mistaken? Probably not in the latter figure as that can easily be controlled. So the number of conversions must have been more than doubled in the report.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Retirement of Prof. Haeckel

On February 16, 1909, Ernst Haeckel, Professor of Zoology at the University of Jena, reached his seventy-fifth year, and on this occasion announced his retirement from public life. Shortly before, he had been compelled to admit, over his own signature, the existence of deliberate forgeries in his scientific writings, so that his departure was attended with but little dignity and honor. The chief features of this episode are worthy of mention.

Haeckel had published in 1907 a pamphlet, entitled, "Das Menschen-Problem," in which representations of the embryos of man and of various types of apes were given for purposes of comparison. After carefully studying these diagrams, Dr. Arnold Brass came out with a counter pamphlet, "Das Affen-Problem" (Leipsic, 1908), in which he asserted that many of the diagrams were inaccurate and worthless, and that others had been purposely and deliberately falsified; that in particular, Haeckel's Gibbon-embryo (plate III) was a reproduction of Selenka's drawing of a Macacus-monkey-embryo, 15 or 16 vertebrae having been omitted, and the name changed; also that the human embryo (same plate, after drawings by His), had been furnished by Haeckel with 11 vertebrae not occurring in the original. In proof, Brass published four plates, in which the original diagrams, and Haeckel's distorted and forged copies appeared side by side.

This deadly parallel made all thought of escape impossible. Haeckel's reply appeared in the Münchener Allgemeine Zeitung (No. 2, of January 9, 1909), and contained the following admission:

"To put an end to this unsavory dispute, I begin at once with the contrite confession, that a small number (6 to 8 per cent.) of my embryo-diagrams are really forgeries in Dr. Brass's sense; those namely for which the observed material is so incomplete or insufficient as to compel us . . . to fill in and reconstruct the missing links by hypothesis and comparative synthesis. . . . I should feel utterly condemned and annihilated by this admission, were it not that hundreds of the best observers and most reputable biologists lie under the same charge. The great majority of all morphological, anatomical, histological and embryological diagrams . . . are not true to nature, but are more or less doctored, schematized and reconstructed. . . ."

The last sentence caused a sensation. Professional ethics require that the word "schematic" be always added to every diagram which the author has retouched or invented; whereas Haeckel deliberately left his readers under the impression that he was using diagrams from nature! The zoologists of Germany were, therefore, compelled, much against their will, to throw Haeckel overboard in order to save their own honor. The following statement, signed by forty-six professors representing twenty-five German and Austrian universities and scientific schools, was issued in No. 8 of the Münchener Allgemeine Zeitung:

"The undersigned professors, directors of laboratories, etc., herewith declare that they do not approve of the method of 'schematizing' which Haeckel has in some instances made use of; at the same time, in the interests of science and professional freedom, they condemn in the sharpest manner the warfare waged against Haeckel by Brass and the members of the Kepler-Bund. They declare, moreover, that the evolutionistic idea can suffer no detriment from some few inaccurately reproduced embryo-diagrams." (Signatures follow.)

This document depicts clearly the state of mind of Haeckel's friends! The last sentence was totally superfluous; the point at issue being merely, that Haeckel, in trying to prove a scientific problem, had presented forged documents as evidence. But the attack on the Kepler-Bund proved to be no less superfluous and ill-advised. This association, in some respects analogous to our A. A. A. S., has no religious affiliation, and pursues purely scientific purposes; among its members are men like Valentiner, Berberich, Reinke, Branca, whose reputation is international. We quote from their rejoinder, as reproduced in the Augsburger Post-Zeitung of March 23, 1909:

". . . . We are in agreement with the Kepler-Bund, when it demands, that henceforth as in the past, German scientific research shall rest on an uncompromising love of truth, and on the strictest personal sincerity. . . . What should we say of a historian who altered the letters of an inscription in order to push through a preconceived personal opinion? Haeckel's want of conscientiousness in popularizing scientific facts and philosophic speculations has been shown up by others besides Dr. Brass; we refer particularly to Wilh. His, who in 1875 exposed the arbitrary manner in which Haeckel modified his scientific data. To declare as unimportant such arbitrary mutilations of the diagrams of other workers as Haeckel has been convicted of, by Rüttimeyer, His and Brass, manifests a laxity of opinion to which we cannot assent.

The declaration was signed by twenty-five scientists, members of the Kepler-Bund, and by eleven non-members. Nineteen universities, botanical laboratories, etc., of Germany, Switzerland and Austria are represented by these names, including the University of Jena.

Rüttimeyer's name, in the above statement, recalls the fact, that in 1868 Haeckel printed off one and the same diagram three times in succession, to show the marvelous similarity of the embryos of man, ape and dog. Rüttimeyer called attention to this curious device, whereupon Haeckel conceded that he had been guilty of "a thoughtless piece of folly." The end of his career is therefore worthy of the beginning.

Repudiation of Haeckel is now unanimous and complete; he is discredited by the signed verdict of eighty-two of the foremost German authorities, forty-six of whom gave judgment sorely against their inclination. Poor Haeckel! One could almost sympathize with this lonely old man, as he goes out into obscurity, clad in dishonor. What are his reflections on considering his ruined life-work?

The Cost of a Decent Livelihood*

Thanks to Pope Leo XIII, the Catholic doctrine that the laborer has a moral claim to a wage that will maintain himself and family in reasonable comfort, is pretty generally known and accepted. How far is it realized in the actual rates of remuneration? To answer this question we must know, first, the money cost of a decent livelihood in any place, and, second, the wages paid to the various groups of workers. Of these underlying questions, the first is by far the more difficult.

In 1890 and 1891, the U. S. Bureau of Labor investigated the cost of living among several thousand families in the coal, iron, steel, textile and glass industries, and found that the average annual expenditure for all purposes varied from $390.93 per family in the iron ore industry, to $769.06 among the glass workers. While the average amounts and kinds of food, clothing, shelter and other essentials of living obtained by the different groups, were reported with considerable minuteness, no attempt was made to state which, if any, of the groups were actually enabled to live in conditions of normal health and comfort. The work of the Bureau was merely positive and descriptive. It left to others the task of determining whether the planes of living that it described were above, at or below any ideal or normal standard. The same methods and the same limitations characterize the Bureau's investigation and report, which was published in 1903, concerning the cost of living of more than 25,000 families.

Various individuals had, however, made the attempt to define the minimum cost of a normal or decent livelihood. John Mitchell placed it at $600 per year for the average family in cities of between 5,000 and 100,000 inhabitants; Dr. E. T. Devine gave the same estimate for New York City. Both estimates seem to have been based upon general knowledge and observation, rather than upon any detailed study of the essentials of living and the cost of each essential in a large number of cases. Using the results of the Labor Bureau investigations of 1890 and 1891 as his principal justification, the author of "A Living Wage" declared that a family of six or seven could not live decently in any city of the United States for less than $600 a year, and that this amount would not suffice in some of the larger cities. Although this estimate was not disputed by anyone who studied its basis, the basis itself was not sufficiently specific. After a somewhat brief investigation, several groups of social workers placed the minimum cost for a family of five at $950 in New York City, $900 in Chicago, and $750 in Baltimore. This was in 1906. About the same time Mrs. Louise B. More made an exhaustive study of 200 families in Manhattan, and published the results in a volume of 280 pages, entitled, "Wage-Earners' Budgets." Her conclusion was that to live decently and make adequate provision for the future, a family of average size required from $800 to $900 per year. Comparing the results of her investigation with those obtained from all previous investigations, both in America and Europe, Mrs. More found that they all showed a remarkable general agreement. This proves that the cost of living is as susceptible of accurate study as any other social fact, and can be made to yield equally sound practical conclusions.

At the New York State Conference of Charities and Corrections, November, 1906, Mr. Frank Tucker asserted that the cost of a normal standard of living for a family could be ascertained and stated in such a way as to convince society of its correctness. The outcome of his address was the appointment of a committee to report at the next annual conference concerning "the essentials and the cost of a normal standard of living in the cities and towns of the State." In its preliminary report to the 1907 Conference, the committee gave as its opinion that for a family of five, the three children being under fourteen years, $825 per year was sufficient for "a fairly proper standard of living in Manhattan." The secretary of the committee, Dr. Robert Coit Chapin, of Beloit College, then took all the reports brought in by the enumerators, restudied, analyzed and tabulated them, thus producing the final report of the committee. It is now available in the volume which forms the subject of this review. Of the 642 families that were investigated in Greater New York, Dr. Chapin rejected for various reasons 251; of the remaining 391, he gave particular attention to the 318 whose incomes ranged from $600 to $1,100. Nine nationalities were represented, including, Negroes, Russians and Italians, and the number of persons per family was 4, 5 or 6, the average being a little above five. His conclusion is that $800 per year is not sufficient to permit the maintenance of a normal standard, but that $900 or over "probably permits the maintenance of a normal standard, at least so far as the physical man is concerned" (pp. 245, 246.)

The investigation from which these conclusions are drawn was the most exhaustive that has yet been made in this country by the "intensive" method, that is, the method of studying in great detail a small number of typical families. It is sometimes called the method of Le Play after its inventor, the great French Catholic social student. Dr. Chapin tells us that, although the family reports upon which the book is based have not the exactness of a bank statement, they are carefully prepared, and are sufficiently accurate for a tentative estimate of the cost of living (pp. 32, 33). His own work of tabulating, analyzing and drawing inferences seems to have been done thoroughly and conscientiously. As a result, the facts are presented as fully, as variously, and as suggestively as any reader could desire. We are enabled to form our own judgment concerning Dr. Chapin's view of the details and elements of a normal standard of living, and concerning every other opinion and conclusion that he offers; for we can easily examine their basis. In addition to Dr. Chapin's study, the volume contains several important appendices, including the reports of the committee referred to above, a translation of a workingman's budget from the works of Le Play, and a partial bibliography of works on the standard of living.

No one who studies the detailed presentation and analysis of the amounts and kinds of welfare (food, clothing, shelter etc.) obtained by the sixty-three families in the \$900-\$999 group, will deny that the average expenditure of \$906.70 is barely sufficient for decent and reasonable living. Their outlay for rent is less than \$15 per month, which enables them to live in dwellings that average only $3\frac{7}{10}$ rooms each. The clothing expense is \$132.34, and food costs \$405.19. Turning to the non-physical items, we find that the expenditure for labor unions, religion and lodges is only \$16.78; for recreation and amusement, \$11.71; for education and reading, \$6.70. The average of \$45.51 for "miscellaneous" may at first sight seem high, but it covers alcoholic drinks, tobacco, barber's services, funeral expenses, moving and a variety of other items. Speaking of the whole number of families investigated, Dr. Chapin declares that the number that was kept below a normal standard through drink was so small as to be negligible in any general statement of causes (p. 249). He likewise rejects the explanation of "too many children," since the average was only three, which is about the general average for the whole country, and the minimum that will suffice to prevent a decrease in population (p. 248).

The conclusion that $900 is the minimum upon which a family of five in Greater New York can maintain a sound physical existence and make some provision for the future, and that even this amount does not seem to meet adequately the mental, religious and emotional needs, ought to be sufficiently startling to the comfortable classes, the unreflecting optimists, and all the varieties of closet philosophers. True, the cost of living is higher in New York than in other cities, but only in the matter of rent. The results of the committee's investigations in nine other cities of New York State, which are to be found among the appendices of our volume, make this a tolerably safe conclusion. The difference in rent between New York and Buffalo for families with a cost of living of $900 per year would be somewhere between $72 and $100 per year (pp. 314, 315). Putting it at the latter figure, we see that even in Buffalo (and in very many of the other large cities) the minimum annual cost of a decent livelihood would be $800.

What proportion of adult males get this amount of wages? Very much less than half. The writer of the report on Buffalo, Mr. John R. Howard, says, that the investigations have established one fact beyond question, namely, "that the average unskilled wage-earner in these two cities [New York and Buffalo] gets far below the income necessary to provide what any one of us could call a minimum standard of living" (p. 317). "Census Bulletin, No. 93," which presents the results of the most extensive and thorough investigation yet made into the wages paid in our manufacturing industries, warrants the conclusion that more than 75 per cent. of all the adult males in these occupations receive less than $800 per year. And the wages in our manufacturing industries are probably as high as those in urban occupations generally, except some departments of the printing and building trades. Is it any wonder that the average laborer refuses to be comforted when he is told that he is well paid and prosperous? Is it any wonder that we have a labor question and a growing propaganda of Socialism?

Many other vital questions are raised by this book, but they cannot be considered here. It should be noted that the expenses of the investigation upon which the book is based were borne by the Russell Sage Foundation. A few more studies like this and the recently published "Pittsburg Survey," will convince every intelligent observer that the funds of this endowment are to serve the cause of the poor in a wise and far reaching way.

JOHN A. RYAN.

Finance Reform in Germany

Since the days when Tariff Reform raised the German people to a fever of excitement, and led to such stormy scenes as the Reichstag had scarcely ever previously witnessed, no question has arisen in the domestic politics of the German Empire, which has monopolized public interest to such an extent and aroused such deep feelings of excitement as the question of Imperial Finance Reform. For many years, contemplated but always postponed, its solution has now occupied the Reichstag for five months. In the frequent sessions of the Tax Commission and its sub-committees, the bill of the Confederate States has been discussed without giving any clear clue as to the direction in which the final solution of this vexed question will be found. It is certain that finance reform will again constitute the most important question of home politics during the present summer, and that a solution must unconditionally be found, since the most pressing interests of the Empire require it.

In contradistinction to the old German Confederacy, which had no general financial system and no truly characteristic scheme of economy, the German Empire has its proper financial administration distinct from those of the Confederate States, and has withdrawn many important problems from the competency of these States and undertaken their solution. Thus, the Empire has taken in hand the protection of the frontiers, the guardianship of German interests in foreign lands and all social legislation of a comprehensive nature. The prerogative of the Confederate States, on the other hand, extends to all the narrower social problems, e. g., the provision for education and the sciences, the administration of the laws, the encouragement of commerce, manufactures, agriculture, etc. For the realization of the funds necessary for the discharge of its various offices, certain sources of revenue have been assigned to the Empire. The Empire has hitherto referred to the separate States all direct taxes (e. g., income-tax, property-tax, etc.), and has itself levied only custom, excise and traffic duties. At the present time, therefore, the main sources of Imperial revenue are the traffic receipts, the custom dues, the excise receipts and the "Matrikularbeiträge," about which a few words of explanation must be given. By the term "Matrikularbeiträge" is meant the contributions paid by the Confederate States into the Imperial exchequer. They are regulated by the excess of the Imperial expenditure over the receipts from other sources, but, as they are levied on the various States in proportion to their population and not in proportion to their taxable value, they press much more heavily on the poorer than on the richer states. The allotment of the contributions to the different ratepayers of the Empire is also unequal, since the separate States levy the contribution on the ratepayers according to their income (i. e., the direct taxes which they pay), and the system of taxation is not uniform throughout the Empire. It must also be noted that these "Matrikularbeiträge," which we shall hereafter refer to as "state contributions," have not always been paid in full. According to the Franckenstein clause of the Customs Act of July 15, 1870, the excess of the customs and tobacco duties over 130 million marks (thirty-two and one-half million dollars) in any year must be placed to the credit of the separate Confederate States in proportion to their population, and the State contributions to the Imperial exchequer lessened by such amount. In 1881 and 1887, the stamp duties and the excise duties on brandy were also assigned to the Confederate States. According to the Imperial financial system, therefore, the States at one time contribute towards the expenses of the Empire; at another, they receive large sums from the Empire in accordance with the Franckenstein clause. In all, the States have contributed to the Empire, between 1872 and 1907, about 247 million marks more than they have received. In the present unsatisfactory financial position of both parties, the State contributions far exceed the Imperial grants, in consequence of which the weaker Confederate States are face to face with financial ruin. In the Budget for 1908-09, the revenues of the empire are given as follows: Customs and excise duties, 1,068,860,000 marks (customs alone, 666,970,000 marks); postal and telegraph departments, 644,150,000; Imperial printing department, 10,930,000; railway department, 125,520,000; banks, 34,670,000; State contributions, 346,030,000; extraordinary receipts, 265,550,000; (public loans, 260,950,000). Total revenue (including certain items not here mentioned), 2,784,850,000 marks.

Against this revenue must be set the great outlay necessary for the proper discharge of the Imperial functions. The upkeep and development of land and sea armaments demand an ever-increasing expenditure. In 1908-09, the war department required 670,530,000 marks for ordinary expenses, 127,240,000 marks for immediate needs, and 56,620,000 marks for extraordinary expenses. The naval department, 133,800,000 marks for ordinary purposes, 129,040,000 marks for immediate needs, and 86,140,000 marks for extraordinary expenses. Total for army and navy, 1,203,000,000 marks. The Colonial Office required 56,800,000 marks; the Home Office, 107,300,000 marks; postal and telegraph departments, 621,700,000 marks; the treasury, 310,500,000 marks (principally for the Imperial grants in accordance with the Franckenstein clause); the railway department, 121,700,000 marks; the National Debt, 156,000,000 marks; pensions, 146,400,000 marks. Total expenditures, including certain minor items not here mentioned, 2,784,850,000 marks. A brief comparison of the receipts and expenditures will show that equilibrium can only be maintained by the raising of a loan, i. e., by increasing the National Debt.

Matters have been in this parlous condition for many years, and have rendered financial reform unavoidable. The financial difficulties of the Empire are in fact almost as old as the empire itself. Even as early as 1876, its income proper did not suffice to cover the current expenses, although the French war indemnity brought in a large sum. Since, however, political and commercial reasons made it desirable not to raise the State contributions to too high a figure, no method of meeting pressing liabilities remained except the raising of Imperial loans, of which the first was raised in 1876. The Customs and Finance Reform of 1879, which substituted a moderate protection for extreme free trade principles, introduced indeed new sources of revenue, but the successful working of its provisions was seriously hampered by the above-mentioned Franckenstein clause. In the succeeding years of commercial prosperity, however, the Empire was able to make grants of many millions to the separate States. Consequently the great outlay required for raising the army to its present strength, and for inaugurating the social-political measures recommended by the Imperial Commission of 1881, could be met without raising inordinately the State contributions or the National Debt (in 1880, 268,000,000 marks; in 1886, 486,000,000 marks). But the trade boom of the last decade of the nineteenth century was followed by the commercial crisis of 1901; receipts sank, although stamp duties had increased and the introduction of duties on sugar and brandy had opened fresh sources of income, while the expenditure maintained its tendency to rise. Thus the State contributions, which during the period 1895-99 had been smaller than the Imperial grants, had to be increased, and the National Debt mounted up at an alarming rate, exceeding 1,000,000,000 marks in 1889, 2,000,000,000 marks in 1894, and 3,103,000,000 marks in 1903. The so-called "Minor Finance Reform" of 1905-06 was expected to end these abuses, to restore the balance of Imperial economy, to open up new paths of revenue, and to lay the foundation for a systematic reduction of the National Debt. A number of new taxes were imposed, and those already existing were raised (e. g., the death duties, the duties on beer, cigarettes, railway tickets, automobiles, etc.), the revenue from these sources being estimated at 180-200,000,000 marks. But, in spite of these measures, the financial state of the Empire has become ever more cheerless, and the need of a "great financial reform" every day more pressing. The reasons for the failure of the reforms of 1905-06 are now potent. In the first place, the taxes imposed have not realized the estimated sums; the ticket duty, instead of the estimated 180,000,000, brought in only 110,000,000 marks, and most of the receipts from other sources are almost correspondingly low, leaving—as far as can be judged from available information—a total deficit of 280-300,000,000 marks for 1908-09. Again, the Empire has found itself compelled since 1906 to forego to some extent its claims to the State contributions, although it has a perfect constitutional right to demand payment. The decline in revenue may also be traced in part to the reduction of the sugar duty from fourteen to 10 marks, which means a yearly decline of 35,000,000 marks.

This falling off of revenue assumes a much more serious aspect in consequence of the many additional items of expenditure, which it was impossible to avoid. Clerks' salaries and allowances for houses had to be increased; some improvement had to be made in the soldiers' and sailors' pay; the salaries of the State officials were increased; and the retroactive measures for the improvement of the position of employees (1908) require between 180,000,000 and 190,000,000 marks. From 1910 should begin the gradual reduction of the National Debt, which in 1908 amounted to 4,250,000,000 marks, without reckoning 475,000,000 in treasury drafts. In the same year should come into force the Widows' and Orphans' Insurance scheme, for which the sum levied on provisions in accordance with the Trimborn law convention will certainly not suffice; consequently, an Imperial grant will be essential. Again, the Imperial Fund for Invalids will be exhausted in a few years, and still another burden will be thrown on the Empire. If, then, we take into account the proposed reduction of local postal rates and the gradual increase of expenses in general, we can easily test the accuracy of the Treasury officials, who estimate an increased expenditure of 2,000,000,000 to 2,250,000,000 marks in the next five years, that is, of 500,000,000 marks for each year in the period of 1910-1913. The Government has tried to shake clear by means of detailed tables and preliminary estimates for the next few years that the increased revenue of 500,000,000 marks is not an over-estimate, and the accuracy of their estimate has never been seriously impugned. Greater economy might indeed be exercised in some details, e. g., by the reduction of certain official posts, by modifying the luxuriousness of buildings, by the abolition of some altogether or practically superfluous posts particularly in the military departments, by displaying more thrift in every direction; but a substantial reduction of the deficit will not be accomplished by these means.

Concerning the necessity for Finance Reform, then, the German people are of one mind; concerning the manner in which the reform is to be brought about, there is a great diversity of opinion.

JOSEPH LINS.

In the City of Confusion

Canon Henley Henson has sailed from Boston to England "to answer charges of heresy" as the daily press reports it. He carries with him our sympathy and our admiration. For how can we fail to admire a man who has succeeded in being accused of heresy by Anglicans while repudiating Rome "as definitely outside the range of reasonable and practical policy!" Perhaps high churchmen are angered by his further declaration that "the churches of Russia and the East are admittedly sunken in ignorance and superstition, and would have to traverse the whole distance between modern civilization and the semi-barbarism of the Middle Ages before they would really be able to enter on equal terms into any negotiation (for unity) with the reformed churches of the Western world." For shame, Canon! how could you write such things of those dear people with whom your bishops have been flirting, though surely without encouragement, ever since the Tractarian movement discovered the comforting theory of Branch Churches. The canon's article in the current Nineteenth Century and After on "The Lambeth Ideal of Reunion" is well calculated to annoy Lord Halifax and his followers who pin their faith to Apostolic succession and valid orders. "Corporate reunion of Christendom along the lines of the Lambeth policy is a mistaken ideal; . . . any reunion on the basis of 'historic episcopate' is essentially identical with the Roman ideal, only the Roman is incomparably better justified in history and reason. . . . In the Roman Catholic Church alone episcopalianism finds its true logical development." It has been written, "a man's enemies are of his own household": and here we have a canon of the Anglican church betraying the weak spot in her armor. He has no concern for continuity. In his eyes an Anglican bishop holds the same place as a moderator in the Presbyterian Church, and his appeal is that the Lambeth conference should begin by joining hands with Non-conformity. That Conference held out an olive branch toward Presbyterianism when it made a tentative and hesitating suggestion that Presbyterian ministers joining the Anglican body should not necessarily be compelled to accept reordination at the hands of a bishop. In face of such a step there is logic in the canon's appeal for another acrobatic wriggle to include non-conformity. But imagine the confusion! The ritualist, the evangelical, the non-conformist all using the same Prayer Book. The one believes he is saying Mass: the other swears it is a "blasphemous fable": the third holds that the Real Presence is a "damnable heresy." No wonder religion becomes repulsive to thinking laymen when such ideals of unity are contemplated.

While the Lambeth Conference dreams of reunion the Houses of Convocation have appointed committees to "Report on Prayer Book Revision." The truth is nobody really wants the Prayer Book revised. The main body of the people are indifferent, or hope that nothing will be done to mar the beauties of this great monument of Tudor English. Lord Halifax and his party dread any tampering with doctrine or ritual. The Dean of Canterbury and his henchmen are equally uneasy. Very probably what are known as the "cursing psalms," and others of a "vengeful spirit," and such daring expressions of belief as the Athanasian Creed will be put on the shelf; but genuine anxiety centres around the "Ornaments Rubric" which deals with Eucharistic vestments. On this point the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury has already sent in its report. "Whereas the Eucharistic vestments commonly so-called cannot be rightly regarded as symbolic of any distinctively Roman doctrines, and whereas the historical conclusions underlying the ruling judgments in regard to the vestments appear to be liable to reasonable doubt it is expedient that two alternative vestures for the minister at the time of celebrating Holy Communion, viz (1) the surplice with stole or scarf, and the hood of his degree; (2) the Eucharistic vestments commonly so-called, be recognized as lawful under proper regulations." "The bearings of which saying lie in the application of it," as Captain Bunsby puts it. In other words it says to the Anglican ministry: one of you thinks himself a sacrificing priest and for that reason puts on a chasuble; the other thinks himself a minister of the word and for that reason puts on a surplice. It is not the least consequence what you wear, cucullus non facit monachum; but be sure you do what your congregation likes best.

As was to be expected the Ritualists are very angry, and Mr. D. C. Lathbury, a supporter of Lord Halifax, complains that the "Ornaments Rubric" has now no sense at all. "It would be bad enough if the use of the vestments so intimately associated with the conflicts of the past forty years had been forbidden. It is worse to have them relegated with other antiquarian survivals to the region of ecclesiastical art." Yet the Christian church was to be a city seated on a hill, with streets so straight that not even a fool should err therein.

In America Before Our Era

Between the first appearance of man upon our continent, and its certain discovery by the Norse about the year 1000, there extends a vast and "weird mid-region," covered with the mists of myth and fable. And yet this long period of doubt and uncertainty is not without its interest to the historian. To condemn at once as entirely fabulous all that meets us here, would be both hasty and uncritical. The antecedent probability of a pre-Christian discovery of America by the great nations of antiquity has appealed strongly to the modern historian. That the small, yet well-built crafts of those early seafaring people were often caught in storms and carried off to the most distant lands, no one can doubt. That, lost in mists and fogs, they were cast at times upon the shores of our continent, is not improbable. But that their crews should ever have returned again to tell the tale of their adventures, offers to us a more serious difficulty. Yet even this was not impossible. "First and last," remarks an American historian, "there has been on all seas a good deal of blowing and drifting done." That some of this should have resulted in chance discoveries of our continent, even before the era of Christianity, is certainly no improbability.

What, for instance, are almost all the voyages of Ulysses, but a "blowing and drifting" by the cloud-gatherer, Zeus, by Poseidon, or some other deity? Most characteristic, perhaps, is that intended homeward journey when the wind catches up the ships and bears them far away to the strange land of the lotus. "And now I should have come to mine own country all unhurt, but the wave and the stream of the sea and the North wind swept me from my course, as I was doubling Malea, and drove me wandering past Cytherea. Thence for nine whole days was I borne by ruinous winds over the teeming deep; but on the tenth we set foot on the land of the lotus-eaters." Such, too, is the story of the "Æneid," and such, we know, is the record of history. But aside from all merely antecedent probability of a pre-Christian discovery of America, there are strange whispers audible even to this, our day, that once were heard throughout those early epochs of our race, whispers that told of a land beyond the western seas, wonderful and mysterious. How far such rumors rested on the fact of actual discoveries, and how far they merely bore witness to the voyagings of man's imagination, we may never be able to say.

This tradition of a land beyond the waves of the Atlantic is thought to have originated with the early Phœnicians, the Britons of their day, whose craft once dotted every sea. These hardy seamen visited at regular intervals, we are told, the British Isles, and so may readily enough have been caught in some tempest which cast them on our shores. We are actually informed by Diodorus of Sicily that they were thus carried beyond the Pillars of Hercules, over the Atlantic Ocean, several days' sailing from the coast of Africa, and so discovered a vast island, with woody stretches and lofty mountains and pleasant streams, where the climate was elysian and the trees bore fruit all the year. Confused legends of this same country, it is thought by some, may have prompted Homer to place here his abode of the blessed, on the westernmost limits of the earth. It is in search of this that Tennyson significantly makes the ancient Ulysses set forth at the end of his days:

'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.

. . . for my purpose holds

To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths

Of all the western stars, until I die.

It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles.

Hesiod, Plutarch, Aristotle, Strabo the geographer, and many others, are cited in evidence of this tradition of other lands beyond the Atlantic Ocean. But the classical argument is that which is taken from Plato's Atlantis. To refute at once the opinion that we are dealing here with an allegory, emphasis is laid upon the fact that Plato makes Critias refer to this history as "very strange, but altogether true," and that Socrates is called upon to witness to it as "not an invented myth, but a history absolutely true." We certainly require, to say the least, the strongest affirmations for its credibility. And yet there may be blended with it some vague legendary knowledge of our continent. It is the tale of a powerful nation of American aborigines, sweeping across the waters of the Atlantic in a wonderful flotilla, and overrunning all Europe and Asia. All this, Plato takes care to tell us, happened nine thousand years before. The very details of his geography are made to agree most perfectly with the geography of our hemisphere as we now know it. To give the text of our author with a running commentary: "Then," writes Plato, "that ocean (the Atlantic) was navigable; it contained an island (Atlantis) opposite the mouth which you call, as you say, the Pillars of Hercules (Strait of Gibraltar). The island itself (the lost Atlantis) was greater than Asia and Lybia together. From this island the voyagers at the time had access to the other islands (the Leeward and the Windward Islands) of that ocean, and from these latter islands to the whole continent (the continent of America) lying close beyond them and around that other sea, the true sea (the Pacific Ocean).

But proofs for an actual Greek discovery of our continent are likewise advanced, and we are called upon to credit a strange find, which is claimed to have been made in a field near Montevideo, South America, in 1827. It consisted of a large slab, inscribed with unknown characters. When this was raised from the ground, there was discovered beneath it, we are told, a vault in which lay concealed two ancient Greek swords, a shield, and a helmet. On the latter could be traced a sculptured design of Achilles dragging the corpse of Hector about the walls of Troy. The legend on the slab, when deciphered, ran thus:

During the dominion of Alexander, the Son of Philip, King of Macedon, in the Sixtythird Olympiad, Ptolemais.

However this may be, we must say that a great deal of simplicity is required to credit at sight all the countless "facts" and arguments adduced. In addition to the array of witnesses we have already summoned up before us, there still remain the Roman authors. Though existing at the beginning of our era their testimony is significant only as an echo of earlier days. Repeating what they had learned from the Greeks, the voices of Virgil and of Horace are heard, speaking vaguely of a far-off land in the distant ocean, "jacet extra sidera tellus—extra anni solisque vias." But above them all we hear the clear and stately tones of Seneca's so-called phrophecy:

Venient annis sæcula seris,
Quibus oceanus vincula rerum
Laxet, et ingens pateat tellus,— Tethysque novos detegat orbes,
Nec sit terris ultima Thule.

"Still many years, and the age shall come when the ocean shall loosen her chains, and a vast land shall lie disclosed. Tethys shall unfold new worlds to us, and Thule shall no longer be the bourne of the earth."

It is but just to say, before closing this brief review, that not one of all the arguments advanced seems to be conclusive. Taken together, however, they may constitute a sufficient proof, that among the nations of antiquity there existed some vague knowledge of our western continent. If this is so, there still remains for us an unsolved problem to which the key is not yet found. How and when was such knowledge first obtained?

M. Clemenceau and Blessed Jeanne d' Arc

M. Clemenceau ordered that neither the military nor the civil service should take part in the Orleans celebrations on May 8, in honor of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc. Citizens of all classes protested; and, as one of the bishops laughingly put it, Clemenceau's ban, like Balaam's, was turned to a blessing. Determination to make the event a success in spite of the absence of military color and picturesqueness was unbounded, and in the end Clemenceau was constrained to lend the troops and to present the flags and banners of the Fifth Army Corps to the Cathedral.

The mayor, M. Courtin-Rossignol, sent out invitations to all the civic, military and religious officials of Orleans, and the only one to refuse was the Prefect, a freemason.

CORRESPONDENCE

Meeting of Royalty at Baia

ROME, MAY 6.

The event of the week has been the meeting of King Edward of England, and King Victor Emmanuel of Italy, at Baia near Naples. Modern Italy owes its existence in great measure to English diplomacy, which for nearly fifty years has assisted Italy's cause on the diplomatic chess-board. England's hold on Malta, Cyprus and Suez is an added reason for Italy's desire to stand well with so powerful a nation. Her entry into the Triplice, in 1880, did not alter good feelings with England. At that time Official Italy was drawn towards Germany as much by prestige in arms as by the success of Berlin's diplomatic skill. It was, moreover, a source of pride to a young nation such as Italy to be sought in alliance by such powerful empires as Germany and Austria-Hungary. England could then afford to stand in "splendid isolation," whereas Italy could not afford the luxury of such independence. The Triplice has been a doubtful boon for Italy. Mancini tried to make its clauses cover the safeguarding of Italian interests in the Mediterranean, and Robilant, the Italian Ambassador at Vienna, who engineered its drafting, had to confess later as Minister of Foreign Affairs that all it meant for Italy was the empty honor of an increased national prestige. Recent events in the Balkan have proved how truly he spoke.

In the early years of the Triplice, England and Germany were fast friends and German susceptibilities were not aroused by Italian advances to England, so that there has grown up what I would call a "sentimental alliance" between England and Italy, while on the whole Italy's aim has been to stand well with all the powers, though France has not yet quite forgotten Crispi's Gallophobia. Now it is rumored that the meeting of the two sovereigns at Baia contemplated a tightening of the bonds between the powers they represent. The tone of the Italian press on the matter is uncertain. The Opposition papers build great hopes on the meeting: the ministerial organs treat it as a passing act of courtesy and friendship. On the whole the event is looked on as making for the peace of Western Europe.

THE REAL TROUBLE IN THE EAST

In the East the real cause of recent happenings is gradually coming to light. The yellow press version must be rejected in toto. A confidential letter I have had from Constantinople declares the newspaper accounts to be worthy of Munchausen at his best. Is fecit cui prodest is the only safe motto in examining into the question: and the fact is becoming known that the Young Turks have been but tools for furthering a Bismarckian program. Germany is driving Austria towards the East: Austria in turn is pressing on the scattered races between her and the sea. The combined strain has fallen on Turkey and before long we may see the Turks driven for refuge to their Asiatic provinces to carry on there their traditions of hate and violence against Christians. Possession of Constantinople is the political apple of discord in Europe; and the still unsatisfied hunger of the Czar of Bulgaria is causing no small alarm. L'appétit vient en mangeant. If we bear this in mind it may help us to follow coming events more clearly.

Present safety for Turkey in Europe would seem to lie in granting autonomy to the various races within the Empire at present divided by race and creed hatreds. But it was one of Bismarck's saying that "autonomy is much the same as anatomy": in Turkey it would mean dismemberment, and could hardly save Mohammed V who is but the puppet of the Young Turks who in turn dance on wires pulled by forces far away from the Bosphorus.

Mahomedan Byzantium, with its intrigues, its fickleness, its dissensions, is a reproduction of Byzantium of the Emperors without its greatness and its dignity. The mob that applauded Abdul Hamid was the same that deposed him next day. Perhaps history may one day throw light on the logical sequence of events in Constantinople. But I have purposely dealt at this length with the situation there because I have exceptional grounds for believing that a plot has been and is on foot to throw dust in the eyes of the public outside Turkey as to the real nature of what is taking place there. Marriage Statistics in Hungary

BUDAPEST, APRIL 16, 1909.

The statistical report for 1907, recently issued by the Hungarian Government, gives fresh evidence of the fact that, since the introduction of civil marriages in 1895, there has been a steady advance toward the complete annihilation of family life amongst the people. The number of marriages contracted in 1907 was 201,431, or 24,605 more than in the preceding year. The number of divorces amounted to 7,110—a figure hitherto unapproached in Hungary and exceeding the preceding year's figure by 3,220. The increase in the number of divorces has been specially noticeable since the introduction of the Civil Marriage legislation. The great number of mixed marriages (22,607) must be regarded as another sign of religious deterioration, as they constitute 11% of the total number of marriages—a proportion abnormally high for a country prevalently Catholic. Still more serious is the consideration that a large number (629, an increase of 113) of these mixed marriages are between Catholics and Jews. From the statistics we also learn that the Catholic partners in the mixed marriages have as a rule clung the more closely to their religion. In most cases, provision had been made that the children should be reared as Catholics, and this action led to a Catholic gain of 723 and a gain of 49 for the Greek Catholics, whereas the Lutherans lost 283, the Calvinists, 249, and the Jews had neither loss nor gain. The statistics concerning the birthrate make mournful reading. The population continues to increase, thanks principally to the influx of Polish and Galician Jews, but the increase in the birthrate does not increase correspondingly. In several districts of the country, e. g., in the Calvinistic districts of Baranya, Tolna and Somogy, the prevalence of families with but a single child is truly alarming.

The Catholic press inaugurated a decidedly forward movement by establishing a Catholic Press Bureau to supply news for the exclusive use of Catholic papers. Heretofore, Catholic organs were to a great extent compelled to draw their supply of news from Liberal-Jewish sources, without having any means of testing its accuracy or supplying its defects even in matters which affected the honor of the Church. The Press Bureau is already at work, and the improvement of the Catholic papers is discernible almost from day to day.

THE RESIGNATION OF THE WEKERLE MINISTRY

On April 28th the "Coalition Ministry" under Wekerle as Premier handed in its resignation. It was forced to this step by the Independence party which demands the complete independence of Hungary from Austria. The coalition was formed three years ago for the purpose of passing some laws which were of vital interest to the State. But most important questions are still waiting for settlement. The ministry showed the best of will to come to a satisfactory solution. Suddenly the Independence party, under the leadership of Minister Kossuth, came out with a demand for an independent Hungarian Bank. They worked on the national feelings: "Hungarian Bank," "Hungarian Money" and other catch-words were tried with good effect, although even members of the Independence party granted that the independent Hungarian Bank was bound to be disastrous for Hungary. The King (the Emperor of Austria) insisted on the carrying out the coalition program, which contained no bank project at all. This caused a deadlock for the coalition government, which for three years had ruled with greater satisfaction of all parties than any other cabinet since 1848. In the best sense of the word it had been a popular government, because it represented not an artificial majority but all classes of citizens. Even the little Catholic party was represented in it by a minister, Count Zichy. Besides, this government had made it its special aim to improve the condition of the rural population, which had been sorely neglected by the Liberal legislation. As the King has not accepted the resignation definitely, the ministers remain in office until further steps can be taken. The future of Hungary is uncertain and not hopeful. Socialism is steadily increasing here, though the latest congress of the party in Budapest at Easter time showed most glaringly that internal disruptions are at work. The 215 delegates indulged in the most insulting attacks on one another. As usual, several members of the executive board had to be removed for good. The funds amounted to $130,000, every dollar of which came from the pockets of poor workingmen, who get nothing in exchange but virulent agitation pamphlets, class hatred, dissatisfaction and the misery caused by ill-advised strikes.

That "Riot" in Mexico

In the first number of AMERICA a few words were said about the true nature of the Guadalajara trouble. Further explanations seem nevertheless necessary. According to a local correspondent, the affair began as follows: In a little village, called Portezuelo, near Atotonilco el Grande, of the Guadalajara archdiocese, some poor ignorant people found on a rock a rough design, which they fancied to be an image of our Lady of Guadalupe. The fact soon spread among the country people, who thought of a new apparition of the Virgin and started a series of pilgrimages, which were at once prohibited by the clergy. The impious press, however, seized the opportunity to make fun of the miracles and apparitions approved by the Church and to charge the priests with inventing startling stories, as a means of making money.

A few days after, the same press distributed an obscene pamphlet against the virginity of Our Lady, against Joan of Arc and Pius X. This roused the indignation of Catholic Guadalajara, and a solemn reparation service was thought necessary. Although pious associations and sodalities alone were invited to be present at the service held in the Cathedral, it may be said that the whole Catholic population had its share in the manifestation. More than 20,000 adults and about 3,000 children received Holy Communion in the various churches of the city.

The Archdiocese of Guadalajara has just made its annual pilgrimage to the national shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe, near Mexico City; 4,000 tickets were issued by the railroad companies, and a solemn reparation service was held at the national expiation Church of St. Philip, built in the leading street of our metropolis.

Velardena is a mining plant under American management in the State of Durango. The chief manager of the mine requested the priest, who is in charge of the Chapel of the Hacienda, to prepare solemn Holy Week services. The priest, granting the request, ordered among other things that a statue should be translated to the place where the services were to be held. The statue was accordingly veiled, and a few people accompanied it beating a drum and playing piccolos. The police agent at the mine interpreted this act as a violation of existing laws, which forbid any act of religious worship outside of churches. On April 11 the priest was summoned and declared a prisoner. Such an attempt could only create popular excitement, and indignation went so far that a mob attacked the house of the chief of police and burnt it down, perpetrating other violence. Soldiers were sent to the spot in order to check the uprising, and forty-eight persons were taken to jail, of whom thirteen, according to other statements, eighteen, were shot without further trial. This bloody deed was received with universal reprobation throughout the country. According to an official document, President Diaz has given orders for an investigation of the case which so wantonly violated individual safety.

Among the Molokai Lepers

Under date of April 13, Joseph Dutton writes AMERICA from Kalawao, Molokai, Hawaii:

The great visit that is now made every two years by the legislature and friends took place on Palm Sunday. This visit is nearly always made on Sunday. The visit two years ago, I think it was two years ago, was on Easter Sunday. This time about one hundred came. As usual they took horses and all sorts of conveyances, as soon as landed, and came directly here, to Baldwin Home, and after gathering at the office, they repaired to the hall and held a meeting for people of the home and for all at Kalawoo—a fine opportunity for oratory. Nothing pleases the bright Hawaiian better. When finished, the flow of words being unobstructed, he is satisfied, and does not worry as to how the subject at issue is determined.

Much the same followed the return to Kalanpapa, after paying respects to Mother Marianne, who is now becoming quite feeble. She is the only one amongst the workers older than myself. Everything passed off very quietly, and the special steamer took the visitors back to Honolulu, leaving the settlement at about 4 o'clock, having spent the day here from early morning. The legislature has various measures in hand, affecting the Leper Settlement. It is well to have some effective law concerning segregation.

Extensive efforts to secure tourist travel are being made. The military camps are increasing in number and size. It is suggested that the proper force of infantry, cavalry and artillery for a brigadier-general's command will shortly be located upon the islands, and that a separate district may be formed.

The heavy works at Diamond Head will be known as Fort Ruger. This is interesting to me, as the Ruger family has been a subject of my earliest boyhood remembrances. Two brothers of General Ruger served in the Civil War with the regiment to which I belonged; one as Captain of Co. A, the other as adjutant. But the latter, about 1863, was promoted and given service on the staff of his brother, Gen. Thos. H. Ruger, in honor of whom our fort is named.

Signs of Waning Bigotry

LONDON, MAY 5, 1909.

The Protestant Alliance, one of the militant anti-Catholic organizations, had a "great Protestant rally" April 30th, at Queen's Hall, one of the largest of our concert rooms. Mr. Sloan, M.P., a Belfast Orangeman, talked of a mysterious conspiracy to put "Rome on the Throne." I fully expected to hear that King Edward VII had been denounced as a Jesuit in disguise, for during his recent holiday in the south of France he motored into Spain one day and paid a visit to the Jesuits at Loyola, and saw the old home of St. Ignatius, now built into the historic college. Then when he went on to Malta he bestowed on the Archbishop the decoration of the Victorian order. Apparently Mr. Sloan and his friends have not yet heard of the Loyola visit—the telegraphic agencies did not mention it in their press despatches. This will be perhaps another suspicious circumstance for those ultra Protestants. Next week there will be another of these anti-Catholic gatherings, the meeting of Mr. John Kensit's Wycliffe Association, which sends preachers through England to denounce Ritualism and incidentally to thunder against Romanism. The "Kensitites" are a particularly objectionable and foul-mouthed crew of agitators. They are good allies of the "Protestant Alliance," and slightly less respectable in their methods. It was the joint opposition of these two bodies that last year frightened poor Mr. Asquith into forbidding the great procession of the Blessed Sacrament on the last day of the Eucharistic Congress. Kensit has just scored another success. On Palm Sunday there was a procession of the Blessed Sacrament in the streets of Reading. He has succeeded in obtaining from the mayor and police authorities there a pledge that no such procession will again be permitted. There would be a howl of indignation about the violation of religious liberty if such an order were issued as to General Booth's Salvation Army parades. Kensit's organ in the weekly press has been calling on all good Protestants to prevent such processions in London, because on the morning of Low Sunday, in the almost entirely Catholic district of Hatton Garden, the Italian quarter, the priest took the Blessed Sacrament in procession to give Holy Communion at the houses of six poor people who were seriously ill.

This Kensit is the son and heir of a father of the same name, who started a small bookshop in Paternoster Row and made a speciality of the "Revelations of Maria Monk," and anti-Catholic tracts against the Mass and the Confessional, the former blasphemous, the latter so indecent as to bring him within reach of the law. John Kensit, senior, founded a "Protestant Truth Society," which never showed the public its balance-sheet and which Mr. Labouchere in Truth aptly described as a one man organization for collecting subscriptions to be used in disposing of his own stock of pamphlets. In his latter years he took to lecturing against "Romanism and Ritualism." After one of his meetings at Birkenhead he was roughly handled, and died of his injuries, and he counts as a Protestant martyr among his followers. His mantle descended on his son, whose Wycliffe preachers are continually making disturbances at Ritualist churches.

This week John Kensit has addressed a long memorial to the Bishop of London pointing out that in many Protestant Churches in London the "adoration of the Cross" was carried out on Roman lines on Good Friday; that in some of them "the Sacrament" is reserved; that in others sermons are preached and hymns are sung in honor of "the Virgin." He asks Dr. Ingram if this is sound Protestantism? Kensit has logic on his side. He represents the bitter old Protestant tradition. But then the Establishment is a kind of Noah's Ark that shelters all kinds of strange creatures.

Low churchmen have been angered by the Anselm celebration at Canterbury Cathedral. Why, they ask, should a Protestant Archbishop honor the memory of a "Roman saint," whose action "rivetted the chains of Rome on England for centuries." The high churchmen, who were pleased with Dr. Davidson's ceremony in St. Anselm's chapel as a tribute to their curious "Continuity" theory, are somewhat scandalized at the Shakespeare celebration in St. Saviour's Cathedral, Southwark. St. Saviour's is one of our pre-Reformation churches—once the "Church of St. Mary Overy" (i. e., over the river). When it fell into Protestant hands at the Reformation in Elizabeth's days the dedication to Our Lady was got rid of. Close by stood in those days the Globe Theatre, where Shakespeare acted in his own plays. St. George's Day was his birthday, so on this day the feast not of St. George but of William Shakespeare was kept in St. Saviour's. A prominent actor read an address. The poet laureate recited a feeble ode. A poem composed by one of the canons was sung, to the tune of Luther's Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott. The tombs of the poets and dramatists Gower, Fletcher, Dyer and Massinger are in the church, and they were invoked to do honor to Shakespeare:

"Come forth, ye poets, from your sleep

Green laurel garlands bringing,

For him who climbed thought's highest steep,

And crowned the world with singing."

One High Church organ rightly says that this sounds very like a pagan ode. But the people who joined in this chorus would be scandalized at being asked to sing a hymn calling on the angel choir to join with the faithful on earth in honoring their Queen. It is a strange world, and the wandering and blundering of even educated human minds, unenlightened by the gift of Faith and without the guidance of God's Church would be grotesquely ridiculous if the whole thing were not so profoundly saddening.

One of the most famous of the great monasteries of pre-Reformation England was the Convent of Syon, at Isleworth on the north bank of the Thames, nine miles west of London. It was founded by King Henry V, suppressed by Henry VIII, restored by Mary, and finally suppressed by Elizabeth. Its community of Bridgetine nuns after long wanderings on the Continent is now at Syon Abbey in Devonshire, and kept last December the fifth centenary of the foundation. The site of their original home at Isleworth is now occupied by Sion House, a mansion of the Duke of Northumberland, and the old abbey lands are a beautiful park.

In the days when Henry VIII was working the ruin of Syon Convent, one of its community of chaplains, Blessed Richard Reynolds and his friend and neighbor, Blessed Thomas Hale, parish priest of Isleworth village, were among those who braved the fury of the tyrant even to death. These two were among the first five martyrs who were executed at Tyburn gallows. The day was May 4, 1535. This year the anniversary was kept at Isleworth in a way that might well have made an on-looker think he was not in Protestant England but in a Catholic country.

In the seventeenth century the Catholic Talbots, Earls of Shrewsbury, had a house there in which they kept a chaplain hidden. One of the Talbots became a Jesuit and worked on the English mission as "Father Gray," though for many years of his life he was Earl of Shrewsbury. A little later two brothers of the Talbot line were bishops of the London and the Midland districts. When toleration began, a little chapel was built. Sixty years ago it was enlarged into a small church. The steady growth of the congregation made a new church necessary. One generous benefactor gave the land, a fine site at some distance from the old church. Another gave the money for the building, with the condition that the donor's name should be kept secret. The new church stands where the main street of Isleworth runs into the London road, and preaches a silent sermon to the passers-by, for the chief ornament of its white stone front is a crucifixion carved in high relief with figures of Our Lady and St. John.

Tuesday, May 4, the day of the triumph of the two Isleworth martyrs of 1535, was fixed for the solemn opening. The Catholics gathered at the old church, and a procession was formed. It came out headed by the processional cross escorted by acolytes. Then came hundreds of men and women marshalled four deep each carrying a lighted taper. There were many banners. The statue from the old Lady Altar was carried by four young men and escorted by the white veiled Children of Mary. Last came the clergy in their vestments. It was after sunset and the winding village street was a mass of moving light and resounded to the hymns to Our Lady sung by the procession.

What were the Protestants doing? They had combined with their Catholic neighbors to decorate the street with lines of flags. Here and there Chinese lanterns hung out. There were flowers in the windows. The dull grey street was a mass of color. On either side crowds stood looking on respectfully. There was not one unfriendly word. It was the same when after the blessing of the church the procession returned to the old church for a last benediction of the Blessed Sacrament there. Darkness was coming on and the effect of the moving lines of light was still more striking.

Faith of our fathers living still, was appropriately the first hymn of the return march. At the benediction the old church was so crowded that many could not find space to kneel. The note of the whole celebration was on the side of the Catholics unbounded enthusiasm and on the part of the Protestants friendly good-will that manifested itself in many congratulations on the success of the day.

I am sending this description of what may seem to be a mere local celebration in the suburbs of London to readers beyond the Atlantic, because such an event has more than mere local significance. It is quite true that, as the Archbishop said, there seems to have been a special Providence watching over Isleworth, thanks to its martyrs. But though in this place the progress is more striking than in some others, and the events of the last few days serve to demonstrate this progress in a startling way, there is a marvelous movement towards the Church in England. Catholics are realizing their strength, and non-Catholics never count the Church as one of the sects; outside the Ritualist body they feel it represents the historic creed of England. Many of those who walked in the procession through the streets of Isleworth were converts. Many of those who looked on were more than tolerant because they were half persuaded to be Catholics themselves.

St. Triduana's Well

It is always pleasant to note the waning of ancient prejudice. In Scotland, the Reformation was carried on with such vigor and with such antipathy against the old Faith, that no measure seemed too sweeping which could help to destroy all traces of what was contemptuously styled "Papistry." But happily in our own days we see the turning of the tide. Scottish Presbyterians are exhibiting an interest in everything that concerns the ancient Faith, which might put many a Catholic to shame. It is true that they regard everything Catholic from a mere antiquarian and artistic point of view; but that the interest is genuine cannot be denied. A case in point is the recent commencement of the restoration of a building of historic worth in the village of Restalrig, a mile or two from Edinburgh.

The church of this place was one of the first doomed to destruction by the Presbyterian leaders in 1560. It was decreed in the General Assembly of the Scottish Kirk in that year that "the Kirk of Restalrig, as a monument of idolatrie, be raysit and utterlie castin downe and destroyed." The acknowledged reason for such wanton demolition was that the church in question had for many centuries been the bourne of pilgrims visiting the shrine of one of the early Scottish saints. St. Triduana, a virgin recluse of the eighth century, or thereabouts, was entombed there, and her holy well, hard by, was reputed miraculous in working the cure of diseases of the eye. It is not unlikely that a less spiritual reason than the prevention of "idolatrie" was at the root of the iconoclastic zeal displayed by the Assembly in this instance; the Dean of the Collegiate Church of Restalrig had been a prominent opponent of the growing heresy, and Protestantism, now in power, was in a position to retaliate.

So Restalrig Church was ruined and left desolate, and St. Triduana and her well were practically forgotten. Antiquarians came to the conclusion that another well in the same village, called after the saintly Queen Margaret, was really "St. Trid's Well," which Lindsay had scornfully jeered at as a place where the superstitious might "mend their ene," but renewed interest in the little church of Restalrig has lately led to a most important discovery. On the south side of the main building stood a small six-sided chapel, styled usually the Chapter House, for the church had been served by canons. This ruined heap of masonry was almost buried in a mound of earth.

In 1907, the Earl of Moray, owner of the land, resolved to bring about a restoration of the little building, and an Edinburgh architect of note was entrusted with the work. The clearing out of the rubbish revealed that the Chapter House was the building raised over the once famous well of St. Triduana, and that the other holy well in the same village had no connection with the earlier saint, but had been always dedicated to St. Margaret. The style of the architecture of this recently discovered holy well, is that of later fourteenth, or early fifteenth century work, and is pronounced to be of great beauty.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Cable or Fable?

The heading is suggested by the frequent recurrence of "cables" from Rome, London, Paris—anywhere far enough away—containing false or misleading statements on Catholic matters. There is a suspicion abroad that many such foreign "cables" are of domestic manufacture. A late one from London in the New York Sun might just as well have been invented at home, and at less expense. It is to the effect that the Ruthenian clergy in the United States recently petitioned Rome for permission to marry, and that, though their request was denied, the fact is very significant as this is a live question among the clergy of England and the Continent, many of whom are similarly disposed. The latter statement is of course an evident concoction added to give body and news value to the "cable."

As to the "fact," Archbishop Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, has written in response to an inquiry of AMERICA, that he has received no notice of any such petition or reply. As his Excellency has special charge by Apostolic commission of the Ruthenians in the United States, this statement determines the value of the Sun cable and others of similar nature. Ex uno disce omnes.

The status of the Ruthenian clergy has been settled long ago. As Archbishop Falconio states, "several times in the past (1890, 1894, 1897) the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda published circular letters and decrees in which it was decided that the Ruthenian priests in the United States should be celibates or at least widowers." The marriage question had indeed been agitated by some of the sixty Ruthenian priests in the United States prior to 1890, and again from time to time until 1897. In that year the Apostolic Constitution "Ea semper" and the appointment of Mgr. Ortenski as bishop of all our Ruthenian Catholics with definite instructions as to rites, marriages and jurisdiction, determined the question absolutely and beyond recall.

Bishop Ortenski was given general supervision of the Ruthenians in the United States and Canada. He was directly responsible to the Apostolic Delegate, but together with his clergy received his jurisdiction from the local bishop. The Ruthenian clergy were to follow Ruthenian rites in celebrating Mass and administering the Sacraments according to the ancient customs of their people, but in regard to marriage, they were to conform to the rule of the American priesthood and of the Catholic Church generally. It was absolutely forbidden to allow any Ruthenian clergymen to exercise any priestly functions, unless he was "a celibate or at least a widower and without children." Those who refused to obey this decree were promptly suspended. A few recalcitrants tried to create a schism, but the Ruthenian people maintained their traditional loyalty to the Catholic Church, and in a short time the affair was ended.

American Catholics who had never heard of married clergy in the Church were surprised at the necessity for such action. It should be remembered that the celibacy of the clergy, though generally requisite to the efficiency and dignity of the priesthood and the proper administration of the Sacraments is, notwithstanding, a matter of discipline. St. Paul urged it and the Church succeeded in enforcing it in the West, but after the days of Athanasius and Chrysostom discipline in the East continued to grow lax, until with the schism of Photius it became customary to receive married men into orders. Even then marriage was never permitted after the reception of the diaconate, and bishops were chosen from celibates only, a rule which holds among Greek and Russian schismatics to-day.

The Ruthenians had been evangelized from Constantinople, and though the majority finally rejected schism and, despite the uninterrupted persecution of Greek, Turk, Calvinist and Russian, remained loyal to Rome, they were allowed to follow the Greek custom in regard to married clergy. The recent repeal of Russia's penal code increased their number considerably, and there are at present about 5,000,000 Ruthenian Catholics in Europe, chiefly in Russian Poland and Austria-Hungary. Bishop Ortenski found on his arrival a quarter of a million in the United States and Canada. He has followed faithfully the decree of 1897, and for twelve years no married Ruthenian priest has had any jurisdiction in this country. Moreover, he has had Ruthenian youths trained in our seminaries according to the instructions of the same decree and on the conditions therein prescribed: "Only celibates, either now or in future, can be promoted to Holy Orders." Thus it is clear that the Catholic Church, which compels none to enter the priesthood, maintains unalterably its discipline of celibacy for those who choose to enter it, and that the indulgence granted the Ruthenians and a few Orientals for local reasons is the exception that proves the rule.

It is also clear that the Sun's cable message was twelve years old.

A Contrast in Law-Making

"A Contrast in Disestablishment," one of the topics of the day discussed in the London Tablet of May 8, is a clear and forcible article which merits attentive study. The paper compares the French Law with the bill recently introduced into Parliament for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Wales. The writer disavows from the start any intention to "applaud the two general principles involved in the bill of the separation of the State from religion, which in the language of the Encyclical 'Vehementer Nos' is an obvious negation of the supernatural order, and of the diversion of money given for religious purposes to others never intended by the donors." In every other phase of the bill, however, he finds, and rightfully, fit subject for praise in the honorable dealing of the framers of the bill when comparison is made with the provisions of the French law. At the very outset there is discovered a striking contrast between the two bills as to the constitution to be imposed on the respective churches after the disestablishment. The French law, ignoring the known constitution of the Catholic Church, assigned "the administration and the supervision of public worship, not to the hierarchical body divinely instituted by our Lord, but to associations formed by laymen placed in such a position of dependence on the civil authority that the ecclesiastical authority would clearly have no power over them." In Wales a constitution is offered which statutorily includes and secures the rights of the bishops and clergy.

The provision made for the disposal of ecclesiastical property offers even more striking contrast between the Law of Separation and the bill at present before Parliament. Much of the church property in Wales remains in the control of the church; the rest, subject to all existing and private rights, is to be used for charitable institutions and higher education, and Mr. Asquith's bill, moreover, secures the church in the absolute possession of what is left to her. M. Briand's Law, on the contrary, deprived the Church in France of everything and, moreover, placed every obstacle that perverted ingenuity could invent in the way of obtaining or keeping the use of what the law offered.

The third notable contrast between the two measures affects the rights and livelihood of living persons. In the case of the Welsh bill the existing interests of the present holders of ecclesiastical offices are carefully safeguarded, not for a mere arbitrary period, but for the full term of their incumbency, practically, therefore, for the period of their natural lives. In an entirely different manner has the French law dealt with such interests. Instead of securing their livelihood to the holders of ecclesiastical office whose meagre salaries had been guaranteed as a compensation for the Church property seized by the Revolution, nothing but miserable old-age pensions and temporary allowances were offered, and these under conditions either practically impossible or of such a nature that a self-respecting ecclesiastic might not accept them.

Certainly the charge of "grave injustice" affirmed of the French law in the "Vehementer Nos" is, as far as living persons are concerned, practically absent from the Welsh Disestablishment Bill.

The Tablet's article presents a masterly object-lesson of the opposite methods of action followed in a land where justice and fair play rule and in one where the whim of a powerful faction overrides all thought of square-dealing. And it permits one to cherish the hope that similar honorable dealing in favor of their Catholic fellow-citizens will characterize Britain's law-makers when the Removal of Disabilities Act will have come before them for final action.

Prussia and Her Polish Subjects

The destruction of the Kingdom of Poland, brought about by the dismemberment of that helpless country into the three "divisions of Poland," and the distribution of the spoil between Russia, Prussia and Austria, was finally determined in the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Of these three powers Austria treats her Polish subjects the most humanely, Russia the most despotically, relaxing, however, somewhat after the war with Japan. Prussia in 1900 counted, in a population of thirty-seven millions, about three million Poles, who live in the eastern provinces of the monarchy. In the Province of Posen they make up sixty, in Silesia, thirty-five, and in West-preussen, twenty-three per cent. of the inhabitants. At the time of the occupation, royal promises were lavished on them, that neither their nationality and language nor their religion would be interfered with. Whether these promises were meant or not makes little difference; they were surely not fulfilled. The Prussian Government went so far as even to prescribe the German language for catechism instruction in the schools. It is at present the avowed intention of Prussia to make these provinces both German and Protestant. The usual means of discriminating against the Catholics which is practised in the administration of the whole kingdom, does not work fast enough. Extra legal facilities had to be invented. The most effective is the so-called Settlement Law of 1886.

This law, were it not for its anti-Polish clauses and its anti-Catholic method of execution, might be styled excellent. Its origin sprang from the fact that the people of the poorer farming classes emigrated in large numbers from the eastern to the western part of the kingdom, while extensive estates which might have been worked as smaller farms with great profit were not well cultivated at all. Tradesmen and day laborers also hoped to find better pay in the industrial regions of Prussia or in foreign countries. Most of them would have preferred to stay and acquire a little farm or at least a home, but had neither the money nor the credit. The German working people, especially, found it very hard to compete with the Poles who were ready to work for smaller wages. The emigration again had a bad effect on the large estates, as it deprived them of the necessary farm hands. It also rapidly widened the gap between the very rich and the very poor. During the years 1885 to 1890 not less than 800,000 persons emigrated from the eastern provinces.

The Settlement Law was to check this depopulation. It provided for a Settlement Commission which was given a public credit of twenty-five million dollars, to buy up lands, especially large estates, break them up into small plots and thus furnish homesteads for settlers, farmers, tradesmen and laborers. The buildings are erected by the commission and go with the plots. Generally, the homestead with the farm or garden is to be held in perpetuity against the payment of a fixed rental. The law makes the conditions for the colonist as easy as possible.

But the law is made extremely odious by the clause that only Germans may be settled on the estates thus acquired. And the reports of the commission reveal another much more deplorable fact: the law as carried out is an effective weapon for the propagation of Protestantism. The commission from its beginning, in 1886, to the end of 1908, turned over 15,143 homesteads to German settlers. Only 586 went to Catholics, and 14,557 to Protestants. The whole number of Germans settled on them is 113,000 persons. For this population of newcomers the commission built forty-two churches and twenty-eight chapels (Bethäuser), but among them are only two churches for the Catholics. In many parts of the Empire the parishes are still endowed, the rural parishes owning farms large enough to support the clergy. Forty-four such church farms were provided for the Protestants and two for the Catholics.

These figures show clearly that in the language of Prussian bureaucracy, Germanization means Protestantization. How little real Germanizing is done may be seen from another fact. Two-thirds of the property bought up by the commission had been owned by Germans and simply passed from one German hand into another. The only gainer by the whole affair is Protestantism. The activity of this commission creates an entire province of well-to-do Protestant farmers.

This Settlement Law, however, must not be mixed up with the Prussian Expropriation Law, which was passed last year. This latter places in the hands of the Government the power to condemn the estates of any Polish land owner and settle Germans on it, if this is considered necessary, e. g., to strengthen the German population of a village or city. Prince Bülow and his partisans declared this power was absolutely necessary to safeguard German interests in the eastern provinces, but the passage of the law was only obtained with great difficulty. Until now this law has never been carried into effect.

Another weapon for the suppression of Polish nationality was secured last year in the new association law for the empire. For the convenience of the anti-Polish policy of Prussia the so-called "language paragraph" was inserted and passed by Prince Bülow's bloc parties. According to the law no public meeting can be held unless the police are informed twenty-four hours before. All such meetings must be conducted in German. Only in districts in which sixty per cent. of the population speak another language may this language be used, provided, however, that the police be notified three days ahead. In this way a very large number of Polish subjects will be unable to use their mother tongue in their own assemblies. How severely the law is enforced one incident will show. A Polish society in Gnesen was holding a procession and when passing the house of one of their clerical friends, stopped and invited him to join them. The priest came out of the house and spoke a few friendly words in Polish to the men. The following day he was haled to the police court and fined fifteen marks for speaking Polish in a public meeting without due authorization.

Professor Karl Krumbacher, an authority in the history of the nations of Eastern Europe, says in a recently published book: "It is my firmest conviction that the present Prussian method of treating the Poles is not only contrary to the written and unwritten laws of justice, to the principles of Christianity and civil order—such trifles do not bother a normal statesman—but that it does not even serve its purpose and will be attended by the most disastrous consequences."

Franciscan Historical Activity

Discoveries of the past are always precious, and their value grows in proportion to the interest exacted by the subject to which they refer. Surely a very interesting subject is the Franciscan Order and its history. St. Francis, lowly and meek, seraphic in loving God and His poor, saint, poet, and friend of nature, is a centre of attraction to all, to the philosopher and the artist, to the Catholic and non-Catholic. Literary men have praised him in prose and in verse. Something of this attraction belongs to the Franciscan Order itself, like a halo of glory and sweetness bequeathed to it by its founder.

No small amount of gratitude is due to the Franciscan Fathers for making us know more of their founder and of their order. They have opened their archives, rich with the accumulated lore of ages, and brought forth treasure new and old. As an example take the historical works which the Rev. Father Zephyrin, O.F.M., is writing and publishing in this country. His histories are monumental; he has delved into the Franciscan archives, from which he draws an authentic, accurate and detailed history of the missionaries whose deeds will ever remain the chiefest glory of America. Our readers may be glad to know that a quarterly is issued by the Franciscans under the title, Archivium Franciscanum Historicum.

AN ITALIAN VIGNETTE

The pilgrim was jogging the foot-path way from Zaggaruolo over the Sabines. The breath of romance had caught him, and the never-ending Pronti: partenza of the trains was out of joint with the mood. If all went well he would hear the "Ave Maria" bell at San Vito and sleep at the Aquila Nera.

"Madonna what a day! a day for Inglese and mad dogs (cani matti)," the old vignaiuolo said, as he poured out a litre of rich red vino nostrano.

A day for Inglese and mad dogs! There was wisdom in the saying. The masterful sun held the whole countryside in his gaze. Zaggaruolo was winking in the valley below, and through the Campagna the railway threaded its course in lazy curves.

Up along the mountain-paths singing as he went the pilgrim jostled the mules and oxen laden with the ripe grapes—for it was vintage time, and the air re-echoed the songs of the grape-gatherers among the vines—up to the Genezzano with its shrine and its legend of the Georgian peasant who followed the picture over land and water. (They show you his descendants in the village to this day, a swarthy, dark-eyed gentle race.)

He hurried over its crazy streets cut out of the rock or tunnelled under it, with the houses and storerooms tottering along them on either side, out of which peeped wild-half-naked beings who were treading out the grape-juice to a music as old as Dionysus. It called to him, that hill-side hamlet of goat-herds and vine-growers, where every street-corner and every house had its Madonna-image, moulded in clay or daubed in raw color, and bedecked with dead wild flowers, that must have been plucked fresh in the morning withal. No wonder Mary of Nazareth had mistaken it for home!

But there was thunder smouldering in the hills, and the leaves of the olives were turning inwards, so he stayed just long enough to kneel at the shrine and visit Signora Volpella's osteria where he eased the pinch of a shoe by soaping a stocking, and the pinch of his hunger by absorbing the signora's excellent pasta con brodo.

The way to San Vito lay up the tangled hillside; it was mostly a bridle path and the clouds were gathering. Already Olevano in the valley beyond, circling the summit of its little cone of olive-garths and vineyards, was shrouded in a belt of Guido Reni blue. Two carabinieri were hurrying to shelter. They smiled the natives' indulgent smile for the foreigner so busy after roba antica. . . . "Bacchus! there would be rain . . . altro," they said, "but the women would put the santini in the windows and the church bells would ring, and so the vines would not suffer. Senti! that was thunder . . . well, warnings are short in the mountains. Going to San Vito? Madre di Dio," and shrugging their shoulders they left him.

But the pilgrim heeded not, for his mind was drenched with the glory around him. The sun lay cradled behind a rampart of clouds, just kindling their edges with a flame; the lightning played along the sky, and the voice of the thunder trumpeted behind telling how the hills rolled back upon one another like the volutes of a mighty shell; in a little while the clouds poured down a very sea of rain, and he saw the Sabine gods walk abroad in all the tempestuous loveliness of the storm. He fled to the recesses of a cave on the hillside; it was wind-swept and bare, but in the darkness he discerned the figure of a child crouching on a cushion of freshly gathered vine leaves. A lightning flash lit up her long hair, glossy as velvet, and in the succeeding darkness he felt her great roe's eyes fixed timidly on him in a sort of panic.

"Signore," she said, "the Madonna has sent you, and my prayer is heard: for I vowed three candles for my safe home-coming."

"They call me Annunciata," she continued in reply to him, "Annunciata of the pecorelle, in our paese up the mountain. We live at Civitella, my mother and I; but she is old, and I keep watch on Sor Luigi's sheep. It is a little thing, but bread and oil are dear since Beppo went. He drew his number last Spring. It was a good number, but he wanted to far servizio, so he played the number in the lotto and won ten lire: it was fortuna. Then he left us."

Thus, she babbled like a child as they went out together from the cave when the storm had spent its fury, and sought the scattered sheep. She showed him a cluster of houses rising sheer behind one another on a spiked ridge of the mountain with a shaft of sunshine playing on the weather-beaten dome of a church.

"Ecco," said she. "Ecco, Civitella." It was off the way to San Vito, but the pilgrim had forgotten the Aquila Nera. Surely he owed the Madonna the child's safe home coming. And when they had found the flock unharmed and set the leader with the bell on the homeward path, they climbed the slippery track together. The bells of the old church were still ringing their appeal to Heaven against the storm as they drew near the gates, and a gaunt figure came hurrying over the uneven pavement.

"It is my mother," said Annunciata, simply, and raising his eyes the pilgrim met the mother's anxious distrustful gaze. "Annunciata is now safe," said he. "She will remember the pilgrim when she pays her vow."

"Truly I will pray the Buona Madonna for you, Signore," said the girl.

He lifted his hat, and sought the path to San Vito, and though the old woman made the figs at him with both hands he knew it not, for he never looked back.

WESTMINSTER'S MOTHER CHURCH

One of the historic landmarks of Catholic London will disappear before the end of the present year. The new Church of Sts. Anselm and Cecilia, near the Holborn end of the wide new avenue of Kingsway, is rapidly approaching completion. Then the old church of the same name will be closed and pulled down. Old Sts. Anselm and Cecilia's has been called, not without reason, "the Mother Church of the Catholic Faith in the Archdiocese of Westminster." The mission began in 1648 in a private house. In 1687, the freedom granted under James II encouraged Catholics to build a church, which, on King James' flight, was saved from confiscation by the Sardinian ambassador, who acquired it as the chapel of his embassy, hence "Sardinia street." In the Gordon riots of 1780, the church was burned, but the chancel was saved, and the building was restored on the same lines by the Government. It belongs to the "meeting house" style of architecture, a plain oblong building, with galleries to increase its seating accommodations, with a complete absence of external ornament, as if those who built it were still used to meeting in secret for the worship of their forefathers. It is a link with the heroic past, and one wishes that it could have been saved from the "improver."

THE COUNTRY CHILD.

The Country Child has fragrances

He breathes about him as he goes;
Clear eyes that look at distances,
And in his cheeks the wilding rose.

The sun, the sun himself will stain
The country face to his own red,
The red-gold of the ripening grain,
And bleach to white the curly head.

He rises to the morning lark,
Sleeps with the evening primroses,
Before the curtain of the dark
Lets down its splendor, starred with bees.

He sleeps so sweet without a dream
Under brown cottage eaves and deep,
His window holds one stray moon-beam,
As though an angel kept his sleep.

He feeds on honest country fare,
Drinks the clear water of the spring,
Green carpets wait him everywhere,
Where he may run, where he may sing.

He hath his country lore by heart,
And what is friend and what is foe;
Hath conned Dame Nature's book apart,
Her child since he began to grow.

When he is old, when he goes sad,
Hobbling upon a twisted knee,
He keeps somewhat of joys he had
Since an old countryman is he.

He keeps his childhood's innocencies,
Though his old head be bleached to snow,
Forget-me-nots still hold his eyes,
And in his cheeks old roses blow.

LITERATURE

A Literary Weed.—Gabriele D'Annunzio has written a new tragedy, "Fedra." Its plot is borrowed from Racine's "Phèdre," but the mantle of that poet's exquisite art has not fallen on the sensuous and degenerate shoulders of the pagan, D'Annunzio. While Racine keeps the action always in the pays du tendre, D'Annunzio's Fedra is an animal de luxure. Degeneracy reached its lowest ebb when D'Annunzio chose his young son to take the part of Hippolytus in the play. No doubt the purveyors of immorality for the theatre-loving people of America will see to it that "Fedra" finds her way to the haunts of "Salome."

Egoists, A Book of Supermen, by James Huneker. New York. Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mr. Huneker's subjects quite fill the bill of his title; Stendahl, Anatole France, Huysmans, Nietzsche, Blake, Ibsen, etc. By Supermen we may assume abnormalities, rather than superiorities, to be the appropriate meaning, though Mr. Huneker would no doubt demur to this interpretation. The literary people who constitute his galaxy are super in no transcendent sense whatever; though each deviates most strikingly from the normal, they are conspicuous examples of the irregular and the bizarre. One exception is to be made, Ernest Hello, who has no proper place in a collection where eccentricity is the sign manual. He is unmistakably the only genius; the rest are men of talent with disordered imaginations. To Hello Mr. Huneker devotes the briefest and most superficial consideration, though he alone merits a profound and extended study. The reason is evident: Hello is the antithesis of the author's standpoint, if that may be called a standpoint which has no ground of any absolute conviction. For Mr. Huneker's attitude is that of one who stands apart contemplating all creeds, with none of his own. He characteristically remarks that "in literature Hello was a belated romantic, a Don Quixote of the ideal, who charged ferociously the windmills of indifference." Mr. Huneker himself is one of the windmills. With him everything matters excepting the one thing that alone matters, and with Hello, nothing matters excepting the one thing that Mr. Huneker ignores—God. The purple patches of literature are much, if not most, in Mr. Huneker's eyes. His studies are interesting and clever; but a critic who lacks a fundamental conviction lacks the one thing essential. Criticism without conviction is like a bird without tail feathers; it may fly, but without direction; it may gyrate even to heights, but it never gets anywhere. Mr. Huneker is eloquent at times, epigrammatic frequently, interesting generally, earnest sometimes, convincing never. He often stimulates and suggests; his pictures are vivid, drawn with skill and with a teeming background of information. His sympathies plainly lie with the irregulars who seem closest to his interests and evoke his liveliest appreciation: Stendahl the apostle of the passion of unhappiness, whose life was one long disorder; Beaudelaire whose existence was a "muffled delirium"; Anatole France, the literary embodiment of a polished sneer; Barrès, morbid analyzer of a sick soul; Nietzsche, barbarian and madman; Ibsen who made life a hideous problem without solution. Of these he gives vivid and sympathetic analyses, without, however, any absolute standard of measurement to orientate either their or his own place in the sum of things. In this, Mr. Huneker but follows the fashion of the hour, the indifferentism which evades conviction, and which if pushed hard would be afraid to admit that two and two make four. In this sketch of Huysmans he keenly appreciates the literary artist, but to the Catholic who returns to his faith, he is antipathetic. "All this" (Huysman's conversion) "may have been auto-suggestion, or the result of the 'will-to-believe,' according to the formula of Professor William James, yet it was satisfying to Huysmans whose life was singularly lonely." Of Hello's Catholicity he remarks, "And perhaps if one too hastily criticizes the almost elemental faith of Hello, and its rude assaults of the portals of pride, luxury, and worldliness, perhaps the old wisdom may cruelly rebound upon his detractors; 'Dixit insipiens in corde suo; non est Deus.'" Why the "perhaps?" CONDÉ B. PALLÉN.

The Tragedy of Man. From the Hungarian of IMRÉ MADAC. Published by the Arcadia Press. 1909.

The "Tragedy of Man" is the first rendering into English of the masterpiece of a Hungarian poet of the Shelley type, Imré Madac, who was born of a noble Magyar family in 1821 and died in 1864. The plan of the work shares a measure of epical breadth and dignity. Adam, the typical man, falls into a deep slumber during which the future of humankind is unfolded before him in a series of visions, each embodying some memorable stage in the historic evolution of the race. Egypt of the Pharaohs, Athenian democracy, Roman Epicureanism, medieval Christianity, the French Revolution, English industrialism and the Socialistic state pass before his eyes as so many signal failures to solve the problem of human happiness. The visions at length pass and Adam, at issue with the realities of life, finally takes his stand on a broad, elemental deism, as embodied in the words of the Lord, "strive and trust," with which the poem closes.

In the socialistic "phalanstery" no room is found for the man of genius: Plato is penanced as a day-dreamer, and Michael Angelo set to work at the crudest chain-making. Christianity is also reckoned among the great disillusionments of history, though in the beginning it was big with promise.

"The Tragedy of Man" is merely another version of the familiar history of the man of genius who finds or fancies he finds all the historic creeds and philosophies outworn, and falls back for support on that vague, pathetic, half-doubting optimism of which our English poet has given us the supreme expression:

"Behold, we know not anything.
And yet I trust that good shall fall
At last, far off, at last to all,
And every winter turn to spring."

A Friar Observant, by FRANCES M. BROOKFIELD. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The Reformation is an old tale, and yet every new story or article concerning that all-absorbing subject brings with it a lively interest and a fascination which are sure to lay hold even upon those who feel themselves well grounded in the period of the Great Reform.

A unique account of the days of the "new faith" is given in "A Friar Observant," by Frances M. Brookfield. Friar Wulstan himself tells the story in nineteen chapters. After leaving his native England and his loved monastery, he travels to Wittenberg, Dresden and Cassell, meets the great Reformer, is present at the marriage of Philip von Hesse and Margaret von Saal, converses with Cardinal Alexander Farnese, and finally, after seeing the Lady Anne, his brother's daughter, safe in the care of Sir Hugh, the good friar retires to a peaceful life in Italy.

Were it looked at as a piece of fiction merely, we do not think "A Friar Observant" sufficiently attractive for the ordinary reader.

It is a simple tale told by a humble friar who was in the very heart of the Lutheran country, face to face with the leader, and saw and heard many of the results of the new faith.

This is what lends interest to the story, and from the friar's frank and simple narration we catch glimpses of the life and times of Luther which could scarcely be gathered from an ordinary history. The attempt of the Landgrave Philip von Hesse to gain Luther's sanction for an unlawful marriage with Margaret von Saal forms a large and interesting part of the story. It is worthy of note that though Luther complained bitterly against this marriage, his name heads the list of those who sanctioned it. The restless, rebellious character of Luther is vividly portrayed in many notable passages where he rails against celibacy and church authority. Simplicity marks the tale throughout, and it places before us in an attractive form a picture of the double dealing, the pretended regard for authority and the unrestrained license of a movement which claimed for itself the name Reformation.

Catholic Churchmen in Science. Second series. Sketches of the Lives of Catholic Ecclesiastics Who Were Among the Great Founders in Science. By JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D., LL.D. Philadelphia: The Dolphin Press. 1909. ix, 228 pages.

In this Second Series of interesting biographies of Catholic churchmen who added to their various ecclesiastical labors an ardent and fruitful devotion to science, the author gives ample proof of the thesis he defended in the First Series, that only by those who are ignorant of the history of science can the Catholic Church be considered an enemy of science. The whole round of the sciences, and every century from the fifteenth down to and including the nineteenth, were laid under tribute in the First Series. In the present Series, most attention is devoted to the earlier centuries, although succeeding times are also represented; while, in two chapters, a general conspectus is given of clerical activity; and, more particularly, of the distinguished work of the Jesuit Order in astronomy. Not only Catholics, but every lover of science should be familiar with the notable facts presented in this volume. The publishers deserve congratulation on the very attractive appearance of the volume.

Handbook of Canon Law for Congregations of Women Under Simple Vows, by D. I. LANSLOTS, O.S.B. New York and Cincinnati: Fr. Pustet & Co.

Three different titles are given to this book. On the cover it is called "Handbook of Canon Law": in the formula of approbation from the religious Superior the title is, "Handbook of Canon Law for Congregations of Simple Vows": while the title on the front page is what we have given above. The reader will not find in this work a treatise on canon law according to the ordinary meaning of this expression, but he will find the present legislation of the Church relating to religious congregations of women with simple vows neatly and carefully expounded. The chief sources from which this legislation is derived are: first, the Constitution of Leo XIII, "Conditæ" (Dec. 8, 1900); secondly, "Normæ" or Regulations published by the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars (June 28, 1901); from these the writer deduces the laws respecting diocesan and non-diocesan institutes.

While this volume of 280 pages will be of special utility to the superiors and members of female religious congregations, it will be useful also to confessors of nuns and to others, who will see reference to Roman Decrees, such as the "Quemadmodum" of 1890 on manifestation of conscience, etc., and the "Sacra Tridentina Synodus" of 1905 on daily Communion. The work comes up to date, referring as it does to the new condition of English speaking countries since Nov. 3, 1908, when these were removed from the jurisdiction of the Propaganda. M. M.

Of the many pamphlets on modern Socialism now issuing from the press of friend and foe, the paper written by W. F. Poland, S.J., of St. Louis, Mo., and published by B. Herder St. Louis, Mo., merits to be read and studied by all students of the Socialist movement. It deals with the economic aspect of modern Socialism; clearly expounds its aim and purpose, and then shows its utter impracticability. Anyone desiring to have reliable information on the economic aspect of Socialism can turn with confidence to Father Poland's pamphlet.

Reviews and Magazines

The Canadian Magazine for May gives as its frontispiece a fine reproduction of "Sans Merci," the struggle of civilization against savagery, a striking piece of sculpture by the greatest of Canadian sculptors, Hébert, whose studio is in Paris. "Ontario's Outworn Police System," by John Verner McAree, suggests that city police, country constables, provincial detectives, special railway police or detectives, forest and fire-rangers, game-wardens, jail governors and turn-keys should be combined into one force, under one central management. "There should be mounted men in every township whose duty it would be to patrol the country roads day and night, sweeping up the tramps and vagrants who now make the life of women in the less populous rural districts a terror." For, as Mr. McAree rightly points out, the husky country bully often terrorizes the local constables, which he could not do if the latter had a combined police force to fall back upon in cases of emergency. Arthur Hawkes in "Why I am a suffragette" cleverly disposes of the commonest objections against woman suffrage; but he mars his article by quite unnecessary and altogether false references to Holy Scripture. The would-be-witty remark that "the Apostle Paul has a great deal to answer for, apparently because he had a wife to whom he was not congenial," betrays ignorance of what St. Paul says of his being unmarried (1 Cor., vii, 7, 8). "Kaiser Wilhelm: his opportunity and failure," by W. O. Payne, is an ambitious, if unsuccessful, attempt to summarize the Kaiser's career. The writer is not always sure of his facts. The robber barons had no show under the rule of Charlemagne. There never was a Duke of Brandenburg. There never was "a hard and fast alliance" between the Imperial party and the Catholics in the Reichstag. Moreover, the Centre party is not an exclusively Catholic party.

An amusing misprint occurs in this article, when we are told that Wilhelm hoped at one time to become "the fightiest of all monarchs." It is really a pity that "fightiest," which is so expressive, is not English. Among the book reviews, Dr. William J. Fischer's "Child of Destiny," noticed in our columns some weeks since, receives well deserved praise.

The Dublin Review for April opens with W. S. Lilly's important article on "Lollardy and the Reformation," which receives special notice in another column. This is followed by "Moral Fiction A Hundred Years Ago," by the editor, Mr. Wilfrid Ward, who attributes Maria Edgeworth's loss of popularity in our time to her habit of pointing the moral in a sententious paragraph, a fault which "drives our own generation nearly mad."

"Some factors in Moral Education," by the Rev. Michael Maher, S.J., is a review of the First International Moral Education Congress, held at the University of London, in September, 1908, and of the Report of an International Inquiry Into Moral Instruction and Training in Schools. The main question before these two bodies was, How is moral instruction to be imparted. The Moral Instruction League has made the introduction of non-theological moral instruction into all schools its chief object. But this direct ethical teaching is not approved by most of the non-Catholic educationists. Dr. J. J. Findlay, of Manchester University, argues that this method of ethical lessons for children will prove psychologically unsound and morally injurious. The child needs concrete example and is incapable of abstract thought. "To most Christians morality is to be like Christ; the separation between the abstract ideal and its personification is not made. It needs an adult mind—yes, and an educated adult mind—to think them apart. Children think of conduct in terms of personality, and are unable to appreciate ideals apart from strong personal attachment to higher powers."

Miss A. Ravenhill, who contributes a report on a large number of Girls' Elementary Schools—Council Schools and Voluntary Schools of all denominations—says: "With a remarkable unanimity teachers volunteered their conviction that the root of all morality lies in religion, and that to divorce the one from the other is impossible." The most telling proof of this principle is furnished by Father Edward Myers' article on "Moral Instruction in French Schools," in the second volume of the report. Even Harold Johnson, notwithstanding all his ardor in the cause of the Moral Instruction League, does not conceal his feelings of sadness over the result of godless moral instruction. It has been applied in France since 1882. Those who were children then now make the laws of the country. Criminality in France has increased threefold in fifty years, with hardly any increase of population. This enormous increase is particularly noticeable among children in the last twenty-five years. From being the soberest of nations France has become one of the least sober. The pornographic press with unbridled license "pours its obscenities into every hamlet in the land." The Morale laïque has steadily debased the national conception of family life. Under the new ethical teaching the birth rate has steadily decreased year by year. The entire nation is threatened with ultimate extinction. Father Maher, in concluding his review, explains the Catholic method of teaching a dread of sin as forbidden by God because it is "in conflict with His all-holy nature," and as leading to eternal banishment from His sight, and recommends Professor Sadler's Report on Moral Instruction and Training in Schools, because it contains "a great deal of interesting, valuable and suggestive matter."

There follows an unsigned article, apparently written by a nun, on "Catherine of Braganza and Old Hammersmith," which is of curious local interest to dwellers on the banks of the Thames, near Hammersmith. A long and instructive article on "Catholic Social Work in Germany," is also unsigned. In "Niccolo Macchiavelli" Herbert M. Vaughan describes the life and character of one whose name "suggests to British minds a vague picture of a cunning, sinister personage, steeped in all the arts of political tyranny," while he "is the idol of Young Italy, which has carefully studied his writings and, not without reason, venerates their author as the premature apostle of Italian independence and unity."

In "Catholic Boys' Clubs in London" Bertrand W. Devas gives much useful information gleaned from experience. "The Mantle of Voltaire" is a study, by F. Y. Eccles, of Anatole France's corrosive works. The writer of this article, who shows an intimate acquaintance with French literature of the Renan and Voltaire type, says that Anatole France oscillates between these two enemies of Christianity as his models, and in his recent work, "L'Ile des Pingouins," sides with the more ancient blasphemer; but it "is a ferocious, incoherent and dismal attempt to depreciate the moral patrimony of the French by a fable which, in its main lines, Voltaire might possibly have imagined, but which he would certainly have constructed with more regard to artistic economy." M. France "was always a mocker," but he has now "become a partisan," remaining, through his successive deteriorations "incredibly lascivious," an old man of "irrepressible salacity."

"The Needs of Humanity" is an able analysis by Cardinal Gibbons of the contrast between Christian and non-Christian civilizations. "The Export of Capital" is a very clear, albeit technical, examination of this economic question by H. Belloc.

The second number of Anthropos, an International Review of Ethnology and Linguistics, for 1909, has contributions in English, French, Italian and German. The Rev. I. Etienne, Professor at Bahia, in Brazil, writes on an insurrection, in 1835, of Mohammedan Negro slaves in Brazil, who intended to set up a Mohammedan State under a queen. His sources of information are the Arabic writings seized at the time, written in Barbaresque (North African) characters.

Father Kugler, S.J., a noted specialist on Oriental astronomy, states that the Babylonians in the ninth century B. C. had no scientific astronomy. "As a result of an eleven years' study I can say that the Babylonians were unable to scientifically fix the course of the planets."

Alice Werner, London, writes about the Bushmen. Their morality, she says, compares favorably with that of many "civilized" races. They had a native art of painting, which was practised until recent years, and the number of paintings extant shows that it was not the work of a few highly gifted individuals but a possession of the race as a whole. While other tribes adorn their huts with geometrical figures, the Bushmen prefer representations of men and animals. But no figure is so lovingly drawn as that of the eland, the most important domestic animal.

The number contains several contributions to folk-lore by missionaries. The stories are told in the language of the natives with interlinear translations. Perhaps the most interesting among them is an article on the religious traditions in Mkulwa, a region in Africa, near the place where Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika approach the closest. "No idea is clearer in the minds of these people, than that there is but one God, who is a pure spirit, the creator of the universe. His greatest attribute is kindness, so much so that he is even called Mama, mother, though not thought of as a female. He is, however, at the same time the avenger of sin, which he punishes by temporal afflictions." Man came upon earth from Heaven in a state of innocence, but the daughter of the first man committed a sin of distrust in God. In consequence man must till the soil, is subject to misery and death, but will rise to life again. There is also an account of the deluge. The dove that was sent out is not forgotten, but the raven is replaced by a hawk. To avert impending calamities the adults must confess their sins publicly, with humility and contrition, "not with a double heart." A table of sins, corresponding roughly to the Ten Commandments, serves for the examination of conscience.

In the Spectator of May 8 there is an article on the fallacies of the Labor Party's Right to Work Bill now being discussed in the British Parliament; popular essays on attractive topics find their wonted place in the number, while its pages of "Letters to the Editor" evince the ever-living craving of Englishmen to break into print on every imaginable provocation. The week's Art and Literature reviews are unusually good. One may be allowed to refer particularly to an exquisite poem, "The Country Child," by Katharine Tynan, which is reproduced in this number of AMERICA.

EDUCATION

The program of the coming session of the Catholic Summer School, from June 27 to September 10 presents a very varied and interesting series of lectures in which prominence is given to the historical subjects relating to the tercentenary celebration of Champlain's discoveries, in which the Summer School will take a prominent part.

Bishop Alerding of Fort Wayne on May 13, laid the corner stone of Walsh Hall, the new residence hall for students, at Notre Dame University. It will provide for one hundred and twenty-five students. This is the fifth residence hall at the University and a substantial evidence of its satisfactory growth. Other institutions, not under Catholic management, have a larger attendance of students, but none have all their students residing on the university grounds, eating in the same dining halls and forming one large family. In this respect Notre Dame with its one thousand students is unique.

The Carnegie Institution of the United States has engaged the Rev. Dr. John Maguire of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, and Professor of Latin Language and Literature at the Catholic University Washington, to reedit a series of publications of the Latin authors of the Middle Ages. The emended text will be reproduced with an English translation, commentary and indices.

The Sisters of St. Joseph of Philadelphia have purchased the Shoreham Hotel, Cape May Point, for a summer residence for the members of their communities. No better investment could be made than sea-side resorts where the Sisters who toil so zealously in the parish schools during ten months of the year can build up again some of the nerve and tissue they so unselfishly spend in their labor of love. The Philadelphia Sisters of Charity have a fine place at Point Pleasant, N. J.; the Mount St. Vincent Sisters, one on Long Island, and the Brooklyn Sisters of St. Joseph another at Rockaway Park. It would certainly be a great benefit, not only to the Sisters but to the schools, if every community could have equally pleasant and healthful country annexes.

The London Tablet quotes from a recent speech of Lord Morley two utterances worthy of the attention of those who have to do with educational systems to-day. In July last Mr. Balfour, referring to the controversy as to whether literature or science is the commanding interest and ought to be the most extensive field in university training, said: "I would rather have added to the sum of our knowledge of the truths of nature than done anything else I can imagine." Without going into the question here supposed in any detail, Lord Morley said: "After all, literature has shaken the world, and I for one will never stand to hear literature put in the second place. In this controversy there ought to be preferences but not exclusions. I am not going to talk of the relations of the new universities to the old. Both may supply inspiration and direction of their own." Referring to the two rival theories of university education, the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake and the pursuit of that kind of knowledge which is likely to bring bread and butter—Lord Morley pointed out to his hearers that they should take both theories. "It would be a great folly if you took either and framed your course upon either foundation without regard to the other. There is a story of Leonardo da Vinci, who said in reference to a book: 'The world won't care about it; it is just as if I placed it before a monkey; the monkey would smell it, and would ask me if there was nothing good in it to eat.' That is a sarcastic illustration of the insistence upon the utilitarian point of view applied either to literature or science."

Speaking recently before a number of fraternity men, President Schurman, of Cornell University, uttered a warning against exclusiveness among members of college fraternities and against the growing luxury of living in fraternity houses and the neglect of the intellectual life. President Schurman has been in favor of fraternity houses and on many occasions has defended them in Cornell. His word is the more weighty then when he tells his hearers: "If fraternities are to prosper in the university you must find some way of getting more work done; the intellectual life must be quickened." The Cornell president emphasizes three especial dangers to proper university life in the present development of the fraternity spirit: there is the tendency to divide into groups which in the very nature of things become antagonistic; there is the development of a class system, or caste spirit, that gives rise to rivalry between fraternities and independents or among the fraternities themselves; and there is the growing tendency to luxurious fraternity houses and living. It is not easy, he affirmed, for men to work when their main purpose is to live in fine houses, to have a good time and to give what is left to the professors.

At the request of the "Committee on Papers," the Rev. Chas. Coppens, S.J., now a member of the faculty of St. Ignatius College, Chicago, read a paper before the Latin Section of the Educational convention held in that city last week. The theme suggested by the Committee inviting Father Coppens was: "Jesuit methods in teaching Latin." The topic offered apt opportunity to present to the many teachers in attendance a sketch of the Jesuit "Ratio Studiorum," so fruitful of results in older days before the multiplicity of courses now in vogue had done so much to render literary culture uncommon among us. The well-known method of the system still in use among the Jesuits, in which thoroughness of work in precepts, models and practice is insisted upon, was carefully detailed in all its steps through the seven years of classical work in academic and college grades. The speaker touched also upon another distinguishing feature of Jesuit training. This is the custom of having one professor in charge of a class in all the literary work mapped out for the students of the class—in Latin, Greek and English. In an interesting manner he pointed out the obviously great advantages accruing to thoroughness in the study of language and literature through the directive control of one and the same capable teacher, who drills his students in the comparative grammar of these three languages and exemplifies the precepts of rhetoric, poetry and composition by models taken from the classics of all three tongues. The old ways are not without profitable suggestiveness to the new ways common in our modern pedagogics.

ART

Henry Mosler's recently finished "Liberty Bell," which has been on exhibition at the Knoedler Gallery, has attracted much attention. Called historical by courtesy it belongs more strictly to the general class. The face of the old bell-ringer is rightly stern and his figure is admirable in pose, action and character. The background and foreground are a little monotonous in treatment. Even wood can be animated and the interior of a belfry have a certain picturesqueness of its own. But taking the picture altogether it is a vivid and inspiring page out of our great national history, instinct with the genius of patriotism.

A real treat, to be enjoyed in almost solitude, at the Wunderlich Galleries, was the collection of Whistler etchings and engravings. One is tempted at times to think Whistler at his best when he is painting; when one gets a good and fairly complete survey of his line-work as in this showing, the artistry of the man seems stamped more indelibly on his production in black and white. Few craftsmen have been so intelligent, so thoughtful, so refined, so delicate, so subtle of selection, so economical of sign. The early etchings made in Paris are here, the London series, the Venice series and the later prints taken from plates done in his latter manner, the copper sometimes retouched after a long term of years. It would have been interesting to see Whistler, tool in hand. That his plates were retouched is well known but may he not also have subjected them to a learned series of effacings to reduce them to such perfect sobriety of expression and to such eloquence of blanks.

There are water-views suggested merely by a few tiny scratches of cloud and shoreline; glimpses of his beloved Thames in which the eye is given only a couple of miniature masts and a hull curve, and the noble old river in some manner shows itself, virgin of any mark of point or needle. These views of London are as characteristic and as suggestive in their few inches as a chapter of Henry James. Whistler's etchings are not new matter but their marvellous quality remains.

The Martin collection, sold at auction, attracted a good deal of notice while it was on view at the American Art Galleries. It showed, obviously, the taste of an amateur and the sculptures in particular, mostly replicas, looked exceedingly tame and old-fashioned. Really excellent specimens were those of the Barbizon School. Millet's "Water Carrier" must have been painted in the early days for there is hardness in the outlines and a want of atmosphere. The "Going to Work—Dawn of Day" is on the contrary full of mysterious beauty, of aerial contours, and of those impressions of form and shadow that bring to mind the plastic effects of sculpture. This canvas, of twenty-one inches by eighteen, went for fifty thousand dollars. (Purchased by H. S. Henry, Philadelphia.) A gem was Dupr 's small "Sunset and Windmill," so poetic, so picturesque, and so rich in depth and color. Diaz had an exceptionally fine painting in his "Bathers," the little figures, softly and potentially modelled, standing out vividly against the luxuriant green. Another canvas of first order was Corot's "Charette," full of his peculiar tremulous silvery tone, as of rain mixed with light on a pearly cloud-day. Fromentin's "March of Arabs in the Desert" should be mentioned for it has, in spite of its limited dimensions, a world of sky and sand, and immense suggestion, in its trim lines of travelers in the wilderness.

An interesting group of paintings by associates was offered to view recently in the Macdowell Club Rooms. Fourteen watercolors by Mr. La Farge occupied the first section. In quality his decorative subjects and sketches for stained glass excelled. The "Resignation," in particular, has, besides its powerful color, a symbolic felicity of pose. The "Strange thing little Kiosai saw in the River," a severed head floating, has a certain gruesomeness of interest. Mr. W. Chase shows two admirable pastels of the "Shinnecock Hills," and "Near the Sea." So their titles read. Miss Beaux has an interesting slightly peculiar portrait of a young lady in white reclining against a blue and white patterned cretonne; a not very pleasant singularity is that the light eyes are keyed to match those of a cat perched upon the sitter's shoulder. Mr. Irving Wiles sends a portrait of his daughter, scarlet cap and white sweater against a background of October woods. The serious, young face in profile is sympathetic and attractive.

Miss Jane Peterson's recent exhibition at the Knoedler Galleries, showed sketches in oils, of many lands and many peoples, open in workmanships and broad touch. Light and color in them are paramount considerations. The pictures of Venice were particularly successful and true to nature. It is a pity that some of these canvases have an unsatisfactory look of hasty work, undigested impressions and paint put on without sufficient previous observation and study.

Abundance of beautiful color and subjects varying from Rotterdam to Florence and Tokyo to New York, mark the showing of the American Water Color Society now in progress.

SOCIOLOGY

The speeches delivered before the members of the first Congress of the National Federation of Religious Liberals held in Philadelphia last week were full of the "meat that strengthens." Catholics may not find it possible to endorse all of the principles underlying the new movement for clean citizenship which the Congress approves, but no Christian can fail to be comforted by words such as these of former Governor Curtis Guild, of Massachusetts: "The dangers that threaten a free, popular government come not from this religion or that religion, but from irreligion. Atheism and anarchy are sisters. Strip from man the sense of responsibility to God and you dissolve by the same act his sense of responsibility to man. No republic of atheists has ever endured."

Regretting his inability to attend the Congress of the Playground Association of America, which met in Pittsburg last week, President Taft sent a strong letter endorsing the work of the organization. He affirms that he knows nothing which will contribute more to the strength and morality of boys and girls compelled to remain part of urban populations in this country than the institution in their cities of playgrounds where their hours of leisure can be occupied by rational and healthful exercise. The advantage he finds in these playgrounds is twofold: The vicious tendencies promoted in a life of idleness and confinement in a narrow city space, in houses and cellars and unventilated dark rooms are easily curbed in the wholesome openness of God's sunshine; while an opportunity for earnest and joyous play improves the health, develops the muscles, expands the lungs and teaches useful lessons of self-restraint and patient effort.

The congress, which was the third annual meeting of the Playground Association, began its sessions with representatives present from forty cities. The convention lasted several days. In connection with the event a special meeting was held in which the representatives discussed "a safer and saner Fourth of July." It was argued that there is too much danger attached to the present haphazard method of celebrating the day, and that concerted action on the part of the cities will reduce the number of deaths and accidents, permitting, at the same time, the children to have just as enjoyable a time.

Charles M. Pepper, a special agent who has been investigating fiscal affairs in Europe, sends to the Department of Commerce and Labor a report which forms an important contribution to current discussion of the proposed income tax. The report shows for the year ending March 31, 1909, the revenue from the income tax in Great Britain was $165,000,000, thus making the tax the greatest single source of income, exceeding the excise imports by $1,500,000 and the customs receipts by $23,000,000. There is an interesting sketch of the manner of levying the tax and a luminous analysis of the various sources from which this immense revenue is drawn. One feature of the report is the amount of British income received from investments abroad. Although there is a large income from abroad which cannot be identified as such in the assessments the income disclosed from this source in 1907 was $395,000,000.

Since two-thirds of the tax is collected indirectly, it is not possible to give the exact number of individual income taxpayers. Business and professions and employ  s of the government and public companies paid taxes on $3,000,000,000. Twenty individuals and ninety-two firms paid assessments on incomes of $250,000 and upwards. Assessments on incomes ranging between $50,000 and $250,000 numbered 4,200, and from $25,000 to $50,000, 4,800. The assessment on incomes between $800 and $1,000 numbered $238,000, and on incomes under $800 are exempt from the tax and graduated abatements are allowed on incomes between $800 and $2,500.

All white men in the Congo Free State are showing interest in the trial for libel of two American missionaries, the Rev. William Morrison and the Rev. W. H. Sheppard, which began in Leopoldville May 20. The suit is brought by one of the concessionaire companies called the "Kasai Trust," which has a monopoly of rubber gathering in the Kasai region. Damages in the sum of $20,000 are claimed from each of the missionaries for "calumnious denunciation." The suit may be considered practically one of the Belgian government against the missionaries, since the government holds half of the stock of the Kasai Trust, and a majority of its directors are Belgian officials. In substance the charges the missionaries are accused of having made "calumniously" are those contained in the reports sent out by the late American Consul at Boma, James Smith, and the British Consul, Captain W. G. Thesiger. These reports charge the trust with cruelty and extortion in dealing with the natives.

In an interesting interview Joseph Murray, Acting Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, declares that immigration furnishes the one trustworthy barometer of the times. "Think about it a second," he said, "and you will see why the poor people who flock to our shores are sensitive and sensible to conditions over here. Almost all of them have friends somewhere in this country, and very few of them come except on American advices. When work grows slack here in the States word gets back home pretty quickly. It is passed along on the other side that this is not a good time to go to America, and intending emigrants take the scare immediately. Stock Exchange panics are nothing to them, business failures are nothing, the shadow of coming events in the news of the day passes unnoticed, but when word goes home that the emigrant can find no work the tide of immigration is checked. It begins to flow gradually as work again absorbs the idle man in this country. Word reaches the waiting thousands in the old country that there is work here and there. As soon as the incoming stream are all employed and there is still a demand for more laborers the figures of immigration approach the high-water mark."

The figures of official reports appear to confirm Mr. Murray's declaration. When business was contracting in the spring and summer of 1907 the immigration record was remarkably high; in October of that year, when the financial world was convulsed, 100,000 immigrants landed at Ellis Island against 88,000 the year before, the undercurrent of the depression, the actuality of no employment had not yet reached labor across the seas. In 1908 when the shock had passed but whilst men were out of work as a result of it immigration records fell enormously, in fact it was said the foreigners were going out of the land faster than they were coming in all last year. The figures certainly show that while the immigrant does not make business, he shows how business is, when work is plentiful or when it is scarce. The conclusion is calculated to allay fear, regarding the business outlook, for, as Mr. Murray adds, prospects now seem bright for a record-breaking year in immigration.

The same report offers interesting details concerning the disposition of the multitudes landing upon our shores. Of late the Government has been making strenuous efforts to distribute immigrants throughout the country wherever labor is most needed. Regarding the success of these efforts the Acting Commissioner says:

"They come back here two or three weeks after they land to get another chance at offers which had no interest for them when they first arrived. It is then that Government agents succeed in transporting most of them to the West and Northwest, and then, too, that the immigration commissioners from the several States have a chance to talk business with them. On arriving immigrants have high ideas, and New York is their Mecca, but after a few weeks of hard city life they are, in large numbers, willing to try smaller places or to move back to the farms or other open places of labor."

Secretary of War Dickinson went to Panama two weeks ago on an official tour of inspection of the Canal Zone. Since then he has been over every inch of the canal on foot, has examined the operation of all departments, has met every executive head, and has been in touch with the different classes of the working forces. His satisfaction with conditions is expressed in his word to the newspaper correspondents as he was preparing to leave for Washington: "I am very much pleased with the organization here and with the way the work is progressing."

On May 19, 1775, a body of colonists of Mecklenburg County in the Carolinas met in an all-night conference to discuss the differences existing at that time between the colonies and the mother-country. Resolutions signed by a committee of twenty-seven were adopted, and these resolutions constitute the now famed Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. Before the meeting broke up news of the battle of Lexington was received and great enthusiasm prevailed. A copy of the resolutions was sent to the Continental Congress then in session at Philadelphia. Charlotte, N. C., outdid itself in its three-days' celebration, May 18, 19, 20, 1909, commemorative of this first demonstration of the kind to take place among the American colonists and which preceded the Philadelphia declaration by one year's time. President and Mrs. Taft were guests on the last day of the celebration.

Members and promoters of the Holy Name Society will wish success to the enforcement of the law passed on May 15 by the Wisconsin Legislature making it a misdemeanor to swear profanely in public. The bill as first introduced simply prohibited swearing in the presence of minors under eighteen years of age. When the bill reached the Senate in that form, an amendment striking out the reference to age was made. The amendment has been adopted and the bill passed. It is to be hoped that other states will follow the example thus set.

SCIENCE

We learn from Cosmos of May 1 that the earthquake which shook the Iberian Peninsula on the 23rd of April last, was first felt at Lisbon at 5 o'clock in the evening of that day. There were repeated shocks, accompanied by subterranean rumblings, and they were renewed with more or less intensity on the 24th and 25th. On the 23d the disturbance extended also over the greater part of Spain, where shocks were felt at Madrid, Valladolid, Cáceres, Malaga, etc.

The damage resulting has been considerable, notably in Portugal along both banks of the Tagus, and in Spain in the suburbs of Madrid. A number of houses have fallen, thereby giving rise to dangerous fires; churches, too, have had their walls cracked. Sad to relate the number of victims is also considerable, especially in Portugal. The numbers given are 50 dead, more than 150 wounded and 120 missing.

From the seismographical records of the University of Coimbra in Portugal it is inferred that the centre of the disturbance was situated either in the sea close to the Portuguese coast or on the Portuguese mainland; most probably it was submarine. The instruments of the Observatory of the Jesuits on the Ebro in Tortosa, Spain, registered a shock the amplitude of whose oscillations was the greatest experienced in the four years during which the seismographical records have been made in this observatory. The terrestrial movements here lasted five hours and forty-nine minutes.

The region affected is one of those subject to frequent earthquake shocks. Especially is this true of Portugal near the mouth of the Tagus. Not to mention the historical earthquake which destroyed Lisbon on November 1, 1755, there were notable shocks in this locality on November 11, 1858; on February 21, 1890, and on the 9th of August and the 14th of September, 1903. All were of submarine origin, which goes far towards corroborating the inferences of the Coimbra observers.

The report that the different Jesuit colleges throughout the United States were to make a systematic and concerted study of seismic disturbances and to perfect apparatuses in order to aid science to solve the earthquake problem, is explained by Rev. Father J. Ricard, S.J., who presides over the astronomical and seismic department of Santa Clara College, Cal., in an interview in the San Jose Herald, of March 2.

"Pursuing the initiative of Rev. Frederick Odenbach, S.J., of St. Ignatius' College, Cleveland, Ohio," he says, "some twelve or fifteen Jesuit colleges in the United States have formed a Seismological association in connection with the Seismological Society of America, established on this coast, and now spreading all over the world, mainly through the efforts of Prof. A. G. McArdle, of San Francisco. This association of Jesuit scientists will greatly commend itself to the scientific world by the fact that there will be perfect unity all through; the same instruments, the same seismograms, the same interpretation of records, and all these evenly distributed over the vast area of the United States. Some will be located on or near the earthquake belts or zones and others at great distances from them. In this way some records will inscribe the great oscillatory movements near their seismograph and make known to the world how a big shake in San Francisco is no stranger in Massachusetts or Louisiana, or even in Europe.

"Professor Lawson, head of the great geological department of the State University and now president of the Seismological Society of America, has highly recommended the Weichert machines, made at Göttingen, Germany. Professor Odenbach, of Cleveland, himself an adept in instrumental seismology, also declares that the Weichert machines are far superior to those which have hitherto been in use, not excepting the efficient machines of Professor Omori, of Tokio, Japan. It was therefore natural that the order for the new instruments to be used in all Jesuit colleges should be sent to Germany. Santa Clara College has already ordered one horizontal and one vertical seismograph, together with a contact clock that may be regulated to the sidereal time of the observatory or the standard time sent here from the Mare Island Observatory or the Lick Observatory. It is hoped that by such a concentration of efforts as is possible in the united Jesuit colleges the prediction of seismic phenomena may be initiated and perfected, and people may be rationally put on their guard without an undue effect on their morbid sensibility of the fearful. Ignorance breeds fear; science dispels it."

. . . AMERICA is splendid.

—The Society of the Catholic Teachers of the German Empire has just issued its eleventh year book. There are eighteen thousand men among its members. Women teachers have a separate society. Both societies consist exclusively of lay teachers.

It is very gratifying to see with what earnestness these educators always uphold the rights of the Church. As new school laws are in preparation regarding inspection of the schools and regulation of teachers' salaries, the society insists that before aught else, the right of the Church to the exclusive management of religious instruction be expressly acknowledged by law. Much space is also given in the year book to the various efforts that are being made against immoral literature and pictures. The teachers are urged to take an active part in the work of the men's societies for the suppression of public immorality.

—The Albertus Magnus Society was founded in Germany in 1897, to support promising young men in the pursuit of university studies and to promote the growth of an educated Catholic laity. Ecclesiastics are excluded and each diocese has a separate organization which takes care of its own applicants. One-fifth of all revenues are transmitted to the central administration to be used for applicants from Protestant districts. The members pay twenty-five cents a year or $25 for life membership. The society receives many extraordinary donations. The support granted to the students is considered as a loan, to be paid back by those who have finished their studies. In 1906 the society paid out $2,000 to five hundred and fifty students. The diocesan branch of Cologne in 1908 expended $8,000, and $30,000 from 1900 to 1908. There are also endowments for the support of students made by certain families. The number of these endowments is constantly increasing. Cardinal Fischer called this society the most important after that of St. Boniface.

—Longer than in any other country did the Lutherans of Norway retain the ancient doctrines they took with them when separating from the Catholic Church. Of late, however, German rationalism has forced an entry and is defended and propagated from the chairs of the University of Christiania and preached from the pulpits of the land, though it meets with the energetic resistance of the people. Last year a "free" faculty of theology was established in opposition to the state university for the education of orthodox ministers. The government favors the "moderns." A movement is now on foot to bring about a separation of Church and state, in order to save the faith of the people from state influence. The advocates of the separation are willing to let the Catholics have a share in the Church property which has come down from the times when Norway was a Catholic country. Whether the Lutherans will have unity enough to keep up the struggle for any length of time, is of course another question. To meet the propagators of German unbelief the Vicar Apostolic of Norway, Bishop Fallize, invited the German Dominican, Father Wirtz to give a course of German sermons during Lent in the Catholic church of the Norwegian capital. It was attended by large crowds of Catholics and Protestants, among the latter being a number of Lutheran ministers. Only two thousand of Norway's two million inhabitants are Catholics.

—From Dresden comes a denial of the report that Prinz Max of Saxony, brother of the reigning King of Saxony, has retired from Fribourg in Switzerland, where he is a professor in the theological faculty of the university, and that he is suffering from a serious illness, which will prevent him from continuing his lectures. Prinz Max is a Catholic priest. His declaration in 1893 of his determination to deny himself his inherited emoluments and honors to enter upon his studies for the priesthood caused a great sensation. He received the doctorate in theology from the University of Würzburg, after completing the usual course. Last year he published one volume of his lectures, which was very favorably received by students, treating as it did a subject not often handled by Catholic scholars; viz., the Oriental liturgies. It was the intention of Prinz Max to cover the entire field of Oriental liturgy in this and subsequent volumes. It is to be hoped that he will be spared to spread further the good example of his priestly life, an example he has given not only by his love of learning but by his deep asceticism.

—Under Father Raus, late Rector-Major of the Redemptorists, the congregation has extended all the world over. It now counts 17 provinces, 12 sub-provinces, 192 houses, and 3,700 members, of whom 1,900 are priests.

—Mgr Fabre, who succeeds Mgr Andrieu as Bishop of Marseilles, was born at Crotal, Bouches du Rhone, 1844. He was ordained priest in 1867 and began the ministry as assistant priest at Saint-Ferriol in Marseilles. It was the custom that young priests for whom great hopes were entertained should pass their first year of priesthood at the Ferriol. The Abbé Fabre did not disappoint in his achievements. Wherever he was he administered the posts assigned to him with the zeal and prudence that conciliates reverence and wins love. In 1906 Bishop Andrieu offered him the position of vicar-general, but he loved his flock too much to leave it. Lately the Pope promoted him to the dignity of Prothonotary Apostolic. The choice of the Holy Father has fallen on a prelate of great merit.

—Bishop John L. Spalding, who recently resigned the see of Peoria, Ill., because of ill-health, was promoted to the titular Archbishopric of Scythopolis at the Consistory of April 30.

—The new Bishop of Port of Spain, Trinidad, the Right Rev. John P. Dowling, O.P., was consecrated by Archbishop Walsh at Dublin, on May 16.

—Nearly five hundred priests have been sent out from the North American College, Rome, since that institution was opened in 1859. The alumni now ministering in the United States are nearly three hundred. Of these Archbishop Farley, Bishops McDonnell, Burke and Corrigan; Monsignors Kearney, Barrett, Donnelly and Murphy, with forty-six priests sailed from this city last Thursday to attend the jubilee ceremonies at the college, which will begin on June 6. A number of the laity were also with the party which will be joined abroad by others of the alumni including Archbishop O'Connell, of Boston. The Apostolic Delegate, Mgr Falconio, as the guest of the Alumni Association, accompanies them to Rome. He will return early in the summer. The new Bishop of Cleveland, Mgr Farrelly, has been persuaded to alter his original program and remain at the college for the jubilee. He had intended to start at once for his see.

—An incident of the trip of the battleship Mississippi up the river of that name which seems to have escaped the general news purveyor is the interest excited by the presence of the Chaplain, the Rev. William H. Reaney, who officiated at several Masses and other services during the passage of the ship up the river. Father Reaney was invited to preach at services held specially for the occasion at Plaquemine, Baton Rouge and in St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans. The eloquent chaplain's clear exposition of Catholic truth made a deep impression.

—The Apostolic Delegate Mgr Falconio dedicated Columbus College, at Hawthorne, New York, on May 16. The building, which was formerly used as a Lutheran school, will be devoted to the education exclusively of Italian ecclesiastical students, and will be in charge of the Salesian Fathers. It is a gift to them from John J. McGrane, of New York.

—On the spot at Eureka Springs, Ark., where the mother of Richard C. Kerens, of St. Louis, waved him her last farewell when he left the place, he has erected a beautiful church to her memory at a cost of $60,000. It was dedicated to St. Elizabeth by Archbishop Glennon on May 11.

OBITUARY

We chronicle with regret the death of ex-Judge Denis O'Brien, who died at his home in Watertown, N. Y., on May 18. Denis O'Brien was born at Ogdensburg in 1837, and admitted to the bar in 1861. A Democrat in politics, his broad impartiality won him the confidence and support of the Republican party also. In 1878 he was elected mayor of Watertown, and in 1883 he became Attorney-General for New York. In 1889 he was appointed Judge of the Court of Appeals for a term of fourteen years, and in 1903 he was re-elected with the almost unanimous indorsement of the Republican members of the State Bar. The veteran jurist leaves two sons and three daughters.

Francis O'Connor, a brother of the late Joseph O'Connor, of Rochester, N. Y., died at his residence in that city May 9, aged seventy-six years. He was like his gifted brother also inclined to literary occupation, and in 1878 was associated with the Rev. Dr. Lambert in the publication of the Catholic Times.

Archbishop Francis Joseph von Stein, of Munich, Bavaria, died May 4, after occupying that important see for eleven years. He was born in 1832 of poor parents, and through the kindness of an aunt was enabled to take up the studies for the priesthood. In 1879 he became Bishop of Würzburg, and the indefatigable zeal with which he took care of his priests and watched over the faithful will ever be remembered. He had the satisfaction of seeing the university of his residential town acquire world-wide fame under the three shining lights of piety and learning, Hergenröther, Denzinger and Hettinger. Before the troubles of the Schell affair broke out the Bishop was transferred to the Archiepiscopal See of the capital of Bavaria. In Munich the discrepancy between the Bavarian Concordat and the Bavarian Constitution makes administration difficult; and the number of parishes in the city is utterly insufficient, there being only twenty for four hundred thousand Catholics. The Archbishop did his best, but the obstacles were so great that substantially the question remains to be solved by his successor.

George Meredith, the English novelist, died on May 17, at his residence in the South of England aged 81 years. His books had considerable vogue on this side of the Atlantic and "Diana of the Crossways" may be said to have set the literary fashion in fiction for his generation. His death removes another link from the little pre-Raphaelite coterie that stirred the Victorian age.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

St. Michael's Rectory, Sunbury, Pa.
To the Editor of AMERICA:

I regard your issue of May 15 as worthy of special mention because of the wide range of interesting and profitable subjects treated therein. To me, however, the article on "Missions for Children" was particularly pleasing and I am delighted that AMERICA saw fit to publish that article. A few years ago a young, zealous priest of the Passionist Order was engaged in this work. He conducted a mission for the children of my parish, and the results of the mission are as evident to-day as on the day of its close. It was a great success. The good done during that week was so great that I could not exaggerate it even if I wished to do so. For some reason or other this young priest has not continued his work, and the same is a pity. I also understand that some member or members of the Society of Jesus devoted some time to this work with great results. To my mind a mission for children, especially in places where there is not a Sisters' school, is well nigh indispensable. Such a mission should be given every two years and during vacation time. Apart from the actual amount of knowledge acquired and the particular good accomplished the mission leaves a general lasting impression on the minds of the little ones; and I dare say that in after years, when they have grown into manhood and womanhood, the mission of their childhood days—the instruction, the stories, the early morning Mass—yes, even the garb of the missionary, will have a stimulating effect, and save them from many a snare and pitfall. May God inspire some good priests to take up this glorious work. A great harvest awaits them.

Very truly yours,

REV. T. F. X. DOUGHERTY.

May, 16, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Allow me to congratulate AMERICA. It is excellent. Let me offer a suggestion: We priests on the mission field are constantly exhorting the people to read Catholic literature; we see the need of it. But what is the result? We often open the way for good, pious people to be imposed upon. Knowing that good Catholics will buy books because they are Catholic, and recommended by bishops (Imprimatur means for them complete recommendation), publishing sharps put on the market at exorbitant prices books in heavily gilded covers, thickly padded with cheap pictures, and containing less useful knowledge than can be found in a nickel Catechism; and our poor people buy them because they abound in names and pictures of ecclesiastics. In a little fishing hamlet in my territory a hundred dollars worth of such Catholic (?) literature is gathering dust. The agent gathered his "dust" a couple of years ago. But those who paid on the instalment plan and who refused to pay when they found how they had been imposed upon, were brought to time by the threat of a lawsuit.

Just now a worse fraud is about to be sprung on just such people. I have received several urgent requests to write the history of this parish and send my photo to a company that is getting out a "monumental" history of the Church in this country. What interest is it to my people when the church lot was bought in Dinkville, or when the church site was moved from Cowpen Branch to Moccasin Creek? It is useful to the publishers, and my picture would help to sell the "monumental" work in my parish. This scheme has broad ramifications and some one should come out and denounce the outrage, and save the people from the fraud. No wonder our people are slow to purchase Catholic literature.

AMERICA can do good service by putting our people on guard against such publishers and publications.

REV. M. MAHER, D.D.

Jacksonville, Fla.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

God bless the work.. "Literature and Dogmatism," in AMERICA, No. 4, has a freshness, force and pungency that whets the appetite for another morsel from the same hand.

"Workingmen's Retreats in Belgium" has brought back a wish I have often entertained for Laymen's Retreats in America. Not one Catholic in 10,000 knows what an economic and helpful vacation he can have while making such a retreat. I had this experience as a layman. God will reward AMERICA if it makes Catholics realize the immense value of an "indoor" retreat. I would suggest that the place, time and conditions be made widely known. Nor can I see any valid reason why such a retreat should be limited to Catholics. I believe there are many sincere non-Catholics who would avail themselves of its advantages, if it were properly brought to their notice. . . . I am glad you are keeping at the heels—should I say the hoofs?—of the Digest. It needs to be shadowed.

R. WHITE, S.J.

. . . AMERICA . . . covers completely my fullest anticipation . . . and in my humble opinion it is just what the Church in America needs. I will consider it my duty to recommend it to both clergy and laity of the Diocese of Seattle.

RT. REV. EDWARD J. O'DEA, D.D.

Although I am an old subscriber to the dear old Messenger, I gladly welcome the change and hasten to avail myself of the opportunity to be a charter subscriber of the new Review.

. . . I enclose check for another year's subscription in advance. I shall be very glad to do anything in my power to insure the success of this magazine, and from conversations I have had with people in Brooklyn, believe it will be a great success.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

It is to be cordially welcomed and its influence will no doubt be helpful to the entire American Catholic press.—Catholic Citizen.

The initial number of the new publication is so strong that it is safe to say that there can be no doubt of its success.—The Tidings.

AMERICA appeals to the great number of educated Catholics throughout the country who have long been hoping for a general weekly review in which they could find a discussion of actual questions and of vital problems from the Catholic standpoint. . . .

No professional man should miss it.

All Catholics can help the great work by seeing that it is taken by the public libraries and put on the tables of reading rooms. As an apostolic agency capable of doing untold good in the cause of religion, the success of this review will be dear to the Associates of the Apostleship, an intention for earnest prayer and hearty support as far as their circumstances will allow.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

AMERICA will fill a much needed want among American Catholics. There are hundreds of local Catholic weekly newspapers, but not one general Catholic weekly review. * * * There is no paper in North or South America similar to this great English Catholic weekly, and the editors in bringing out AMERICA, have determined to give American Catholics, what has so long been a real need.—The Church Bulletin.

The initial issue of AMERICA, the new Catholic weekly, which supplanted the popular monthly, The Messenger, seems to be all the most discriminating might desire in the way of a first-class up-to-date journal or weekly paper. Practical in arrangement and well filled with articles on varied subjects, it is neither tedious nor too erudite for simple tastes and plain readers, yet withal it has much to satisfy the minds of the scholars too.—Catholic Tribune.

The initial number of AMERICA, it is high praise to say, quite fulfils the by no means modest expectations aroused by the announcement that the Messenger was to give way to a "Catholic Review of the Week." Among the needs which the new weekly purposes to supply are: "A review and conscientious criticism of the life and literature of the day, a discussion of actual questions and a study of vital problems from the Christian standpoint; a record of religious progress, a defence of sound doctrine, an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, a removal of traditional prejudice, a refutation of erroneous news, and a correction of misstatements about beliefs and practices which millions hold dearer than life." All these needs were evidently in mind while the first issue of AMERICA was being prepared, and they are supplied in a way to make us hope that it may have an extended and most successful career.—The Ave Maria.

In letter press, arrangement of topics, tone and contents, it gives every promise of becoming a model presentation of Catholic truth and opinion.—The Ecclesiastical Review.

The need in our country of an able Catholic weekly is a most pressing one. To AMERICA, which aims to fulfill that need, The Catholic World extends a cordial welcome and its heartiest wishes for a long, prosperous and successful life.—The Catholic World.

AMERICA has been greeted with a chorus of praise and thanksgiving on the part of the Catholic press, which would indicate that it really fills a long felt want. AMERICA, both the country and the periodical, are to be congratulated.—Herald, Sacramento.

If the new weekly will succeed in forming and consolidating the public opinion of Catholics upon this continent it will do a great work. Its start is made in the greatest centre of a great nation. Its road to success may be long and wearisome. The standard under which it marches, the hopes which animate it in its first steps, the cause it has in hand will, by stimulating its courage, make up for trials and discouragement which too often mark the career of Catholic journalism in broad America. We wish it many years of success.—Catholic Record.

		WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA195-196

CHRONICLE

The Mississippi.—Capt. Fremont's laconic telegram: "Natchez-Mississippi," informing the Navy Department of the safe arrival of the Battleship Mississippi in Natchez, 300 miles inland, caused great satisfaction in that portion of the South. It proved that the Mississippi River is navigable by the largest vessels up to Red River, and probably farther. Notwithstanding the misgivings of some members of the Navy Department, the battleship met with no accidents of any kind through the entire trip. Capt. Fremont ordered a salute of twenty-one guns when passing Port Hudson, La., where the old Mississippi, the flagship of Commodore M. C. Perry in the Mexican War and in the Japanese expedition, and then at the head of Admiral Farragut's squadron, was sunk by the Confederate batteries in 1863. It was an auspicious circumstances that the silver service of the Mississippi State Commission was presented to the new Mississippi by the daughter of the Confederate Commander who sunk its elder namesake. Capt. Fremont's saying in reference to Jefferson Davis' seal on the silver service, "the Navy knows no sections," has made him a general favorite in the South.

The Georgia Railroad Strike.—The strike of the white firemen on the Georgia Railroad, which has practically stopped the train-service on that important line for several days, has been accompanied by much violence and damage. The sole complaint of the strikers seems to be that some negro firemen are given "better runs" than the whites, thus producing "negro equality." Mr. Ball, a Canadian, the vice-president of the firemen's union, went down from Toronto a few weeks ago and ordered the strike in the name of "White supremacy." Manager Scott replies that whites only are eligible to become engineers, and that "better runs" are only given to negroes whose greater experience and length of service have rendered them more efficient. Mr. Scott has requested Governor Smith for protection by State troops, instancing many cases of violence to white and negro employees, the enforced delay of passenger and mail trains and the complete stoppage of freight, but so far the Governor has declined to interfere. Mr. Scott has appealed to the Federal Board of Mediation at Washington, with the result that Dr. Charles P. Neill, Federal Commissioner of Labor, has gone to Atlanta to confer with representatives of both sides and reach, if possible, an amicable settlement.

Home Review of the Week.—Senator Cummins declared that seventeen Republicans will vote with the Democrats to pass an income tax bill which is to be introduced. His opponents affirm that the attempt to pass the bill will fail because of an adverse decision of the Supreme Court in the matter of the last income tax bill. —Senator Bailey made a bitter attack on Governor Johnson of Minnesota for his criticism of the votes of some of the Democratic Senators on tariff schedules. —Admiral Dewey claims the American Navy to be the peer of any in ships, officers and men, and deprecates criticism which he holds to be unjust. —Provoked by an acrimonious debate, Senator Aldrich announced that he will take further steps to expedite tariff legislation.—Speaking at Charleston, N. C., President Taft aroused an immense audience to enthusiasm by declaring that he will appoint to office in the South only the best men, regardless of party.—H. H. Rogers, late active head of the Standard Oil Corporation, was buried at his old home, Fairhaven, Mass.—President Taft is gathering exhaustive tariff data of his own to be in position critically to examine the Tariff bill when it reaches him for approval or rejection.

Taxing Wealth in England.—By a vote of four to one the British House of Commons last week passed the bill taxing incomes above $15,000 at the rate of 5.8 per cent, and above $500,000 at 8 per cent. By varying votes of more than two to one it agreed to the new death, settlement, legacy and succession duties. The death duties are placed at 6 per cent. on estates of $100,000, 10 per cent. on $5,000,000, and 15 per cent. on all excess above that sum. Legacy and succession duties will range from 5 to 10 per cent. As is clear, a very large estate may thus pay to the nation nearly one-quarter of its value in passing from one generation to another. An automobile tax was adopted without a division. Besides a heavy tax on gasoline, an owner of a 60 H.P. machine will be taxed hereafter $200.

A British Labor Exchange.—Mr. Winston Churchill, President of the English Board of Trade, introduced on May 20 a bill creating a system of labor exchanges, with a view to reducing the number of unemployed in London and other cities. The scheme includes also a policy of unemployment insurance to which the workmen, the employers, and the State will contribute. Following the German plan, insurance books will be issued, to which stamps will be attached each week. The worker on losing his employment will take the book to the nearest labor exchange, which will either find him work or pay him an allowance.

Hispano-Moroccan Negotiations.—The Sultan is anxious to bring the Spanish occupation of the Riff coast to an end as soon as possible, and relations with Spain are in consequence somewhat strained.

Señor Merry del Val, the Spanish Minister at Fez, having been asked whether Spain would consent to withdraw her troops in the event of the Moorish Government finding itself able to maintain order in the Riff country, replied that he had no instructions on the point. Thereupon the Sultan declared he could not continue negotiations so long as a settlement had not been reached on this most important question. The British Minister, Mr. Lister, offered his services for the settlement of the difficulty, but the Sultan would not accept them. It is rumored that Spain will make a military demonstration in the Riff country in answer to the Sultan's attitude. The Sultan's repeated breaches of diplomatic usage are resented by all the European Cabinets. On the strength of his promise made last year to carry out the provisions of the Algeiras Conference the European powers recognized his succession. Mining and other concessions have been taken up in the Riff country by various syndicates on the guarantee of Spanish protection contained in the Algeiras stipulations.

Canada.—The capital of the Dominion has been stirred lately by the Oblate Father Lejeune, who preached on the vital question of objectionable books in the Carnegie Library. He said that some, both French and English, had been brought under his notice, which he held to be either positively immoral or inimical to all revealed religion. The subject, taken up by the secular papers, has called forth a protest from the librarian, Mr. Burpee and other members of the Library Board, who are men of the highest standing and no doubt sincere in their declaration that they have striven hard to keep out of the library, and especially out of the hands of the young and immature, works which they considered pernicious. At their request Father Lejeune has promised to furnish a list of the works to which he takes exception. Hard, indeed, is the way of the modern librarian who seeks to provide his readers with current literature that is neither false nor foul, especially when the false and foul kind is eagerly sought by the very youngest readers who have been told by hoary corrupters of youth that such literature is "true to life."

Cognate to this question of books is the very live question of immoral dramas. His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal, who never ventures on a public pronouncement without carefully forecasting its probable effect, issued, on May 10, a circular letter to his clergy, forbidding the Catholics of his archdiocese to attend any performance in the Theatre Royal. This prohibition is the outcome of repeated complaints made by fathers and mothers to His Grace of the scandalous scenes represented in that Montreal theatre. In thus using his spiritual authority for the moral welfare of his flock, Mgr. Bruchesi is merely carrying out in his own sphere what the Mayor of Boston has lately done with the resistless might of the secular arm, when he forbade the production there of the play, "The Queen of the Moulin Rouge," recently on exhibition in New York and Brooklyn, on the ground that it is immoral and indecent. His Grace also reminds the newspaper editors that they have no right to give publicity to such theatres or even to advertise immoral or questionable plays. This is a matter of conscience which sets the principles of morality above monetary considerations.

Filipinos Again Ask Independence.—A resolution calling for independence for the islands was adopted in the closing hour of the year's session of the Philippine General Assembly. In terms it varies but slightly from the resolution adopted at the close of the Assembly a year ago. The resolution was introduced by Speaker Osmena, who said that the policy of the Assembly has been to work in harmony with the Government and to support it in all measures calculated to advance the interests of the Filipinos, yet the members have not ceased to aspire to independence, and he moved that the Filipino delegates to the United States Congress be instructed to present the question to that body whenever an opportunity occurs. All the Nationalists then voted for the resolution, the Minority party asking permission to refrain from voting.

The Opium Trade.—Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King, the distinguished ex-Deputy Minister of Labor for Canada, who, it is expected, will take his seat in the next session of the Canadian Parliament as Minister of Labor, has just returned from China, where he represented the Canadian Government at the Congress for the suppression of the opium trade. That truly international conference was attended by forty delegates from fourteen nations, who were as one in desiring the abolition of the iniquitous traffic. Restrictive measures were adopted in the closing of several dens and the issuing of prohibitive edicts. Mr. King, though hopeful of the ultimate success of the movement, is convinced that it will take many years to eliminate so lucrative a commercial article from the trading lists of even the most civilized nations.

The Philippine Tariff Bill.—The pending revision of the tariff through the Aldrich-Payne bill necessitated a readjustment of tariff relations of the Philippine Archipelago with countries other than the United States. A bill to revise the Philippine tariff in accordance with this readjustment and to raise the needed revenue for the Islands was, on Monday last, passed in the House. The new bill places petroleum and its products on the Philippine free list. A clause introduced in the enactment imposes an export tax on commodities shipped out of the Philippines.

Porto Rico.—Immediately after the passage of the Philippine Act it was announced that a bill drawn in conformity with the President's recent message to Congress relating to conditions in Porto Rico would be considered later in the week. As will be remembered the President urged the passing of a law clothing the Executive Committee of Porto Rico with authority to make appropriations for Governmental purposes in the absence of such action by the island Legislature. Owing to conflict with the Executive Council no appropriations were made during the last session of the Legislature for Governmental uses in the fiscal year beginning on July 1.

Transvaal - Mozambique Agreement.—The importance of Delagoa Bay to the Transvaal was apparent to everyone who followed the events of the late Boer war. It is also the cheapest and most natural trade outlet of the Transvaal colonist. Imperialist orators have been appealing for favors for the Cape Town, and Durban routes, but the Johannesburg citizen finds the already high cost of living interferes with imperialist ideas. Moreover, workers for the Rand mines had to be considered. The Chinese are being deported, the Zulus refuse to work in the mines, the other tribes are unfitted for mine-work. The best Kaffir labor comes from the East-Coast around Lorenzo Marquez. So the Transvaal Government has entered into an agreement with the Portuguese Government whereby she guarantees a certain percentage of her carrying-trade to various Portuguese Ports and railways in return for permission to recruit native labor for the Rand mines from Portuguese territory. In Natal, opposition to the scheme is so great that it threatens to endanger the prospects of the South African Union. The Transvaal has contracted the agreement without reference to the other colonies, because she felt that a Federal Parliament would make the matter a party question and put off its settlement indefinitely.

Egypt and the Soudan.—AMERICA for May 1, gave a short summary of the political situation in Egypt. What is diplomatically known as a White Paper issued on May 5, containing Sir Eldon Gorst's report on Egypt and the Soudan, confirms that summary. The White Paper sets forth that "the total population of the country, enumerated and estimated, amounts to 11,287,359, divided into 5,667,074 males and 5,620,285 females. Of these the number of persons returned as Mussulmans at the census of 1907 was 10,269,445, forming 91.8 per cent. of the population.

"The general movement against autocratic government in the neighboring Mahometan countries, which has been the main political feature in the East during the last year, has not been without effect upon the state of public opinion in Egypt. That opinion has, of course, been more especially impressed by the revolutionary changes which have occurred within the Ottoman Empire itself. There exists amongst the better educated sections of society a limited but gradually increasing class which interests itself in matters pertaining to the government and administration of the country. This class aspires quite rightly to help in bringing about the day when Egypt will be able to govern herself without outside assistance.

"Some of the more sanguine members of this class are, however, of opinion that Egypt has already reached the stage when a constitutional system based upon Parliamentary institutions could be introduced without endangering the existence of the reforms achieved in the past quarter of a century. When it can be shown that the existing institutions by which the people are already associated with the functions of government are working in a satisfactory manner, it will be time enough to consider the question of a further advance in the desired direction."

Austria.—The prevailing sense of peace and satisfaction which followed upon the settlement of the difficulty with Servia has deepened if anything during the past month, helped on, beyond doubt, by the formal consent of the Powers to the nullification of Article 25 of the Berlin Treaty. Whatever political activity there was centred about the opening of Parliament, which event took place the last week of April. On Sunday, April 18th, 70,000 residents of Vienna gathered in the garden of the palace at Schönbrunn to congratulate Kaiser Franz Joseph on the conclusion of the peace with Servia and to express their loyalty to the "Friedeaskaiser." The address was made by Dr. Karl Lueger, Burgomaster of Vienna, who was accompanied by the entire city government. The Emperor replied feelingly, after which he stepped out upon a balcony to receive the homage of the vast crowd of his subjects. Thereupon a chorus of 4,000 voices sang a patriotic air, and the crowd added the national hymn of Austria, ending at Dr. Lueger's suggestion with a thunderous "hoch!" for His Majesty.

From Tirol comes the good news that the Old Conservative party and the Christian Socialists are to signalize the year of jubilee by making a permanent peace. Nothing could be happier than such a consummation. The Old Conservatives are loyally Catholic with an avowedly Catholic program. They are fewer in number than the Christian Socialists, who, although not a religious, but a political party, are a political party that rests on a Christian basis. It is to all intents and purposes the Catholic party, and to it is due the present great religious revivalism in Austria. One section of the party is avowedly non-clerical, but by no manner of means anti-clerical. It defends the clergy against the Liberals and Social Democrats. The presence of this section is what the Tyrolese Conservatives do not like. They have demanded as a condition for peace with the Christian Socialists that they profess a distinctly Catholic programme. To this the Christian Socialists have replied that their programme is essentially Catholic in principle and in its results, and that it has the support of Catholics, both clergy and laity, everywhere. To an outsider it would seem that the reply should suffice, and it is to be hoped it will. The Catholic cause has suffered grievously in Tirol from this division in the Catholic ranks of which the Socialists and Liberals have not been slow to take advantage. It is to be feared that the great assembly of the Catholics of Tirol, planned for the end of May of this year, will be largely ineffective of substantial results, if political harmony does not exist between the two Catholic parties. Similarly the jubilee of the "Freiheitskriege" of 1809, to be held next August, undoubtedly will suffer.

Despite Francis Joseph's visit to Budapest, whither he went in order to bring, if possible, the Hungarian political crisis to an end, there has been no new Hungarian Cabinet formed and there is no immediate prospect of its formation. It must be confessed that the difficulties are great. The Emperor does not wish to sanction the separate bank and it was on this the last government split. Further, he desires that German shall be the official language of the Hungarian portion of the imperial army. This proviso, which is perhaps justified from a disciplinary and business viewpoint, is easily seen to be a hard one for such a highly patriotic people as the Hungarians to accept. In addition, the new ministry would have to agree to an increase in the number of troops with its accompanying increase in the budget. All these conditions make the formation of a cabinet a delicate task, to undertake which no one seems at present inclined.

It is gratifying to report that in the elections held during the middle of May in upper Austria, Salzburg, Sheiermark and Voraulderg, the Christian Socialist party has been victorious. In the upper Austrian "Landtag" they now possess thirty-seven out of fifty-five seats.

Frontiers in Tropical Africa.—Last year a German-French Arbitration Commission marked off the frontier limits between the French Congo and the Cameroons. A similar Commission is now sitting in Berlin to determine the boundaries between the Cameroons and British Nigeria. The labors of the Commission are almost complete and the treaty containing its findings is ready for signature.

The Ruthenian Catholics.—With regard to the Ruthenian petition to Rome referred to in last issue, it may be observed that the temporary dissatisfaction with the "Ea Semper" of 1907 was manifested chiefly by some of the laity and diligently fostered by the Russian "Orthodox" Bishop. The grievance was not because of the withdrawal of the marriage privilege as such, but because this and other "immemorial customs" of their people were taken away from them.

A New Kensit Agitation.—While old-fashioned Protestants are agitating the question of the coming Church Pageant at Fulham Palace, Mr. Kensit is organizing a great counter demonstration. He proclaims that the pageant is a project of "the Romanizing Bishop of London" to make men forget the Reformation. Lest they forget, he is to have meetings, lectures, magic lantern displays, and distribute Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Mr. Kensit and his friends have logic on their side, and are doing a useful work, in so far as they insist that the English Reformation was a very grim reality, and that Dr. Ingram cannot bridge over the gap separating the pre-Reformation Church of England, that looked to the Pope as its head and counted the Mass the chief act of Christian worship, from the modern Established Church with royal head, and its Book of Common Prayer and Communion service.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Anglican Gropings for Unity

In the proceedings of the recent Church Congress of the Episcopalians at Boston, frequent reference was made to the ever pressing "Church Unity." In this connection there is special interest in a communication sent from London to AMERICA by a correspondent, describing a meeting held there under the auspices of the Society of St. Thomas of Canterbury:

The very name of the "Society of St. Thomas of Canterbury" would make one think it was a Catholic organization, but one of its rules lays down that it is "an association restricted to members of the Anglican Communion." Another rule explains that "no restriction of this kind applies to guests, whether invited to lecture or merely to be present in the audience," and it is added that "their presence is not to be understood as necessarily lending any sanction to the Society's aims or to the opinions of its individual members." On May 12 I had the interesting experience of being present as a "guest" at the half-yearly meeting. I was one of about a dozen Catholics who enjoyed the same privilege, and I believe the only press representative present.

The audience was made up of about a hundred men. Half of them were clergymen of the Established Church. Most of the others were Anglican laymen. An Anglican rector presided. And the remarkable feature of the gathering was that they had come together to hear and discuss a lecture on the Reformation under Elizabeth, by the Benedictine Dom Norbert Birt, the author of a remarkable work on the "Elizabethan Religious Settlement." Mgr. Noyes, of Westminster Cathedral, the Jesuit Father Sydney Smith and the Dominican Father Vincent McNabb, were also invited to take part in the discussion. From some of the society's literature, I gather the following points as to its aims and its record. Founded on October 20, 1903, its object is thus set forth in an official document:

"The society, which is under the protection of St. Thomas of Canterbury, is primarily an association of students, clerical or lay, and restricted to members of the Anglican Communion; its aim being to promote the cause of Catholic Unity by proposing and making some attempt to pursue courses of study, having for their scope the history of the Church in the West; by organizing meetings for the purpose of conference and mutual edification; and by cultivating in its members a spirit of charity and loving kindness."

That the society is made up of the extreme type of high churchmen is shown by the rule that "priests undertake to offer and laymen to assist in offering the holy sacrifice once a month for the intention of the society." The committee is at present made up of six clergymen and two laymen. The president is Rev. Spencer Jones, M.A., Anglican rector of Moreton-in-the-Marsh, a country parish in Gloucestershire. A few years ago Mr. Spencer Jones startled Protestant England by publishing a book on "England and the Holy See," in which, setting out from the historical fact that till the Reformation unity with the Holy See was a vital principle of Christianity in England, he urged that in reunion with that See lay the best hope for the future. This is the ideal of the society over which he presides. It is very forcibly set forth in one of its official publications. After noting Our Saviour's prayer that "all may be one," the writer goes on to point out that, "as every Church Congress proves," the Church of England is a house divided against itself, and holding communion with no other church in East or West. There are efforts at reunion with the Dissenters, talk of reunion with the Eastern Church, but strange to say the chief link in any possible scheme of Christian unity is left out of account.

Father Birt's lecture was an attempt to bring clearly home to his audience the completeness of the break with the old order of things effected by Elizabeth. Briefly, the chief points he insisted on were these: The decisive year of the English Reformation was 1559, the "First of Elizabeth." The acts of Henry VIII and of Edward VI were the prelude. They were reversed under Mary. Elizabeth made a new beginning and a very complete one, because she reenacted the Royal Supremacy of Henry VIII by the Act of Supremacy, and by the Act of Uniformity brought forward again the Prayer-Book and Ordinal elaborated under Edward VI, substituting them for the Missal and the Pontifical. When Henry asserted the Royal Supremacy all men were not clear as to what it meant. Convocation and many of the bishops thought they could accept it under the safeguard of such added clauses as "so far as the law of God permits." But in 1559 there could be no mistake, for there was the whole Protestant evolution under Edward to show the real significance of the change. So men, who under Henry had tried to compromise, boldly withstood Elizabeth, and Convocation declared openly against her Church policy. The Royal Supremacy was proclaimed distinctly with a view to enforcing the new Ordinal and the new Prayer-Book.

What was this Prayer-Book? High church divines, past and present, try to read into it a Catholic sense and to find the Mass hidden away in the Communion service. But, first, let us take up the writings of the men who drew up the Prayer-Book. We find that in the book itself there is a studious elimination of everything that implies priesthood and sacrifice in any Catholic sense. Then take the writings of its composers. Father Birt read a long series of extracts from their official writings, their correspondence and their theological tracts, all pointing the same way, all inspired with a thorough hatred of the idea of the Mass, some of them pouring out upon it blasphemously scurrilous abuse. And the men who drew up the Prayer-Book were the same who substituted the new Ordinal for the old Pontifical, with the obvious purpose of substituting the setting apart of ministers of the Gospel for the ordination of "Mass priests."

These changes—vital changes—were made by Act of Parliament; the Prayer-Book is itself a schedule to the Act of Uniformity. What prospect was there that a modern Parliament, made up of men of all religions and of no religion, could be asked to reverse what had been done? "We," said the lecturer, "who are safe in the Barque of Peter have no illusions on the subject. All we can do is to throw life lines to individuals." Corporate reunion, for which so many men of good-will among the Anglicans wait, is beyond the range of practical things.

The members of the society listened attentively to Father Birt's matter of fact demonstration that though their rules pledge them "to offer the holy sacrifice" for reunion, the very title deeds of their church show they have no sacrifice to offer. The only attempt made by any of them to meet the point in the discussion was a suggestion made by one clergyman that the intentions of the authors of the Prayer-Book were of less importance than the actual meaning of its words and formularies. The obvious reply was that the Catholic meaning has been read into the Prayer-Book at a much later period by straining its sense in defiance of the obvious meaning of the words, and the argument from the writings of the English reformers does but confirm that obvious meaning. As one Catholic speaker put it, the denial of the validity of Anglican orders rests not on the question of Barlow's consecration, but on the fact that the new Ordinal showed no intention of doing what the Church does in ordaining priests, and the Prayer-Book and the whole history of its origin confirm this argument.

In the discussion very few of the Anglicans spoke. They were obviously anxious to hear the Catholic speakers, so Mgr. Moyes, Father Sydney Smith and Father McNabb addressed the meeting. The Dominican, Father McNabb, drove home some forcible arguments. "Look at the question of jurisdiction," he said, "the right to give a command. If I tell some one what he ought to do, if it is in a house of my Order, I speak by authority given by the Master General, who has his authority to command me from the Pope. If I am ministering to the faithful in some church I have authority from the bishop, and he has it from the Pope. Whence comes your right to give a command?"

Then he took up the continuity question. "I am a Dominican," he said, "Dom Norbert Birt, a Benedictine. Both of our Orders existed in England before the Reformation. The succession is unbroken. Here are the Roman and the Anglican Communions facing each other in modern England. We Benedictines and Dominicans find ourselves in unbroken Communion with Rome, fitting into its system just as we did in the Middle Ages, with nothing to explain away." The appeal to an obvious fact showed on which side lay the break with the historic past of Christianity in England.

From one point of view nothing could be more encouraging than this spectacle of a number of earnest Anglican clergymen and laymen meeting to hear the Catholic view explained by some of its most capable champions. But there is another aspect of the matter that is a little depressing. Here is this society going on for five or six years studying and discussing. It gets so far that it expresses a longing for reunion with the Holy See. Last Christmas, on the occasion of the Pope's Jubilee, it sends an address to Pius X congratulating him and thanking him for the decree on daily Communion and for his defence of the Holy Scriptures against Modernism. But it still goes on "studying."

One would think that having got so far each and every member would make it his business to clear up his position, and soon take hold of one of "the life lines flung from the Barque of Peter" of which Father Birt spoke. But the chimera of corporate reunion appears to block their way. Mr. Spencer Jones once said, I believe, that he could not take the individual step of leaving his own people to go astray, while he himself came over alone. So he remains in the Establishment, hoping for a general move Romewards, and meanwhile in communion with men who are like himself Anglican clergymen, but who rival the Reformers in their detestation of the very idea of the Mass, and some of whom do not even believe in the Divinity of Christ. To put it at the very minimum, he and his colleagues have doubtful orders, and therefore doubtful sacraments. Yet they stay on "studying" and praying for reunion. But one remembers how Newman and his colleagues of the Tractarian movement clung to a hopelessly illogical position, and at last took the great step, and so one hopes that these good men of the Society of St. Thomas of Canterbury will before long see through the fallacy of waiting till others act, before themselves embracing the Truth, and will leave mere study of the Church of the past for active work in the living Church of the present.

Wise in Their Generation

At the annual general meeting last week in New York of the Marquette League, the Rev. William H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, read a paper on "The Indian Rights Association vs. the Rights of the Indians." As is well known, Congress, in 1895, began to reduce the amount of assistance it had been accustomed to set apart for the education of Indian children in sectarian schools, and in 1899 it made what it designated the "final" appropriation for such purpose. It appears now that several schools, conducted by Protestant denominations, which previously had enjoyed their share in the annual appropriations, changed the sectarian names of their schools to other names of a non-sectarian character, and under the new names, without any change in the denominational management, continued to receive support from the tribal funds as if their schools were wholly secular.

In the report of the Indian Rights Association it is said: "The Baptist Church has always been opposed to the use of public funds for sectarian education." Yet the table of contracts with Protestant schools among the Choctaws of Oklahoma, shows that the Atoka Baptist Academy had and still has a contract by which this institution is paid for the instruction of Choctaw children out of the tribal funds. In the table, however, furnished by Mr. John D. Benedict, Superintendent of Schools in the Indian Territory, the name of this institution, beginning with 1904, is changed from Atoka Baptist Academy to Murrow Indian Orphan Home. In like manner the Presbyterian schools have been and are holding contracts payable out of the tribal moneys of the Choctaws, Chickasaws and Creeks, and, stranger still, one such contract was in force in 1905, the very year in which the Presbyterians made such a vigorous protest against President Roosevelt's policy of treating Catholics in exactly the same manner in which they themselves had been and were being treated. Father Ketcham mentions three of these Presbyterian schools, the Nuyaka, the Hargrove School, and the Calvin Institute, now the Durant School. "The Nuyaka school," to quote Superintendent Benedict, "belongs to the Creek Nation, but its employees have for many years past been paid by the Presbyterian Church;" and again: "Hargrove College was established by the Presbyterian Church at Ardmore, but was destroyed by fire some time last year," which, says Father Ketcham, "accounts for the fact that at the present time no Presbyterian school receives support from the tribal funds of the Chickasaws." The Episcopalians were willing to use Indian rations in their schools, although they protested against the use of Indian money for educational purposes by Catholics and Lutherans.

The Bureau of Catholic Missions does not contend that these various Protestant bodies should be deprived of their contracts because they are denominational or conducted as Baptist or Presbyterian institutions. Its Director maintains it is but right that the funds of the Choctaws or the Chickasaws or the Creeks should be used for the care and education of the children if the Indian tribes so desire it, in accordance with the decision handed down by the highest court in the land. But he insists that Protestants and Protestant associations should work in the open and not be afraid "to make public declaration of their aims and motives. They should not change the names of their schools and thus conceal their religious identity," nor profess one thing while doing another. Father Ketcham concludes with the statement that the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions stands ready to work for the welfare of the Indians in harmony with the Indian Rights Association, or with any other organization, and has more than once demonstrated its willingness to do so. If, however, at the present moment it manifests a hesitancy to join forces with the Indian Rights Association, it is because it finds itself in the predicament of a man who is invited to clasp the right hand in fellowship by one whose left hand is clutching the while a dagger for his "brother's" back.

George Meredith, the Novelist

George Meredith, whose death occurred recently, is an enigma to the critics. For the last twenty years they have been sorely puzzled to find his proper niche in the literary temple of fame. His ingenuity and surpassing cleverness in human analysis, his verbal brilliance and god-like aloofness from the commonplace, would seem to make their task of classification easy; but when they try him alongside the great ones—Thackeray, Dickens, Eliot, Scott—he does not seem to fit into the general scheme of the arrangement as it has been made by the universal verdict.

We entertain a dim suspicion that the trouble comes from considering Meredith as a novelist, and there may be some value in the suggestion that he be placed next to Carlyle. The "Egoist" and "Diana of the Crossways" surely would be in more congenial company with "Sartor Resartus" and "Past and Present" than with "Pendennis" or "Middlemarch."

We cannot understand how Meredith can ever rank high among English writers of fiction. He despised anything like a plot. He was satisfied to let his genius spin its magnificent web over a framework of incident worthy of the "Duchess" or "Rhoda Broughton," in some such way as Stevenson transfigured the penny dreadful. The comparison is not quite fair to Stevenson who, for all his elaborateness, always kept well within the limitations of his art. Meredith, on the contrary, raked heaven and earth, philosophy and science and history, to overburden with stiff cloth of gold his slender nucleus of story. He becomes in consequence a sort of glorified "Duchess." As a novelist he is top-heavy with Jovian grandeurs. Indeed, was he a novelist at all?

Readers of Meredith do not remain in his company long before discovering that he is laughing at something. But whether it is at them, or his characters, or the world at large, it is impossible to determine securely. It is not a pleasant doubt for the reader. We find in this peculiarity of Meredith another argument in favor of our point of view. The author obviously is laughing at the gentle reader who thinks he is reading fiction. But the author knows better. It is a treatise interspersed with dialogue on snobbishness, or egoism, or the absurdity of certain social conventions and traditional ideas. The reader is being fooled to the top of his bent, and the author chuckles cryptically through some score of volumes.

Meredith might have been a great novelist, or a great philosopher in the literary and ethical signification of that much abused term. He tried to be both and fell between two stools. His profound reflections upon life—and he had a startling clearness of vision—are robbed of much of their inherent force by an air of insincerity which we can account for only by the trivial occasions which inspired them. Searching studies of human ambition and honor and strength and weakness, cast into quaintly carved moulds of speech, are hung from pegs too frail to hold them.

The huge smithy of Meredithian philosophy is a most unusual and uncalled-for structure in an establishment devoted to the winged Loves that draw the car of Venus. We may admire the products of that forge but we cannot help wondering what it is doing there; and the absurdity of it is not unlikely to overwhelm all other impressions.

The same incongruity and appearance of disproportion confront us when we approach Meredith from the side of his fiction. It is marvelous what rich stores of learning and just observation and deep reflection and spoil of language he brings to the discussion of some simple incident in the career of his Daphnis or Chloe. What extravagant waste! What wanton prodigality! Whole parks of intellectual artillery are hurried into action; epical squadrons of glittering phrases and resolute words are wheeled into position; rapid-firing epigrams break loose, scattering broad destruction—and all this to furnish forth a tea-party in an English garden, or a chance conversation in a drawing room. Artistically, the disproportion is painful. The fly surely can be broken on the wheel, if so it must needs be, without all this bother. The game may be worth a candle; but all this blinding electricity is certainly superfluous. Horace told us that we should not make our mountains labor without something to show for such Titanic efforts: Meredith believed that the mere sight of the mountains laboring is worth while.

Of course, this kind of writing is clever. But cleverness is not literature at its best. And even Meredith's cleverness is of a sort. From underneath all the magnificence and mental splendor of his fabric, an impression sometimes rises to the surface bringing to our minds the figure of an elderly maiden aunt whose leisure and preternatural accomplishments and detachment from the common things of life make her a very Cassandra for tracing significances of far-reaching import and discovering momentous texts in the trivial occurrences of the daily household.

Meredith's principal asset, it is needless to observe, is his mastery of English prose. The young language of Ascham and More reaches its limit of sophistication in the novels of Meredith. He has had few if any equals in the power of producing subtle and delicate effects, tender nuances of coloring in the domain of sentiment. It is true that he sometimes loses, or seems to lose, the management of his medium when he ventures into the deep quagmires of his philosophy, and he has earned for himself the reputation of being our Browning in prose; but when he deigns to dismount from his hobby and to write like a novelist and man of letters, no one can exhibit courtlier grace nor exercise more powerful witchery by rich and gentle music of phrase and Arcadian sweetness of imagery.

We need not delay upon his famous dialogues in which the interlocutors say what they do not mean and the reader's intelligence is put to trial in determining the ebb and flow of passions and emotions surging underneath the calm and smiling cover of casual conversations.

The two chapters on "The Battle of the Bulldogs" in "Evan Harrington" furnish a remarkable instance of his power to handle a dramatic—even a melodramatic—situation with a lightness of touch that leaves the reader wondering how it was done. It is a description of an outing in an English park in which the lord of the manor, his guests and his tenants take part with charming patriarchal simplicity. There are games, luncheon in the open air, innocent flirtings and interchanges of pleasantries. These are the points emphasized in the author's narrative; and yet when the chapters are finished we find that the atmosphere is charged with lightnings, that a mighty tempest formed and burst with devastating fury, and the nerves tingle with the excitement of it. It is no idle task to follow the ricocheting of such a nimble intellect. It is like crossing a stretch of thin ice. Your safety depends upon keeping the muscles tense—lifting your weight off your feet, as it were—and hurrying forward. Any relaxation of strained attention in pursuing the author through his devious dialogues, and the reader is lost.

As for Meredith's religion there is not much to be said. His tone and his principles are those of the society which he describes. His mimic world like its prototype acts only upon the three concupiscences which the Divine Founder of Christianity denounced. Its only recognized restraints are the esthetic values of purity and noble living. Disciples of what is called "new thought" will not find Meredith an alien. Whilst he has little if any of the direct Gallic appeal to loose imaginations, there is in his pages a certain calm indifference to eternal truths and sanctions which repulses confidence and trust. Sin and scandal are, so to speak, always in solution. The atmosphere is murky with baleful moisture which a breath from the North is enough to transform into a torment of visible snowflakes. Coventry Patmore's observation, that love must be something more than human if it is not to degenerate into something less, is the best and severest criticism of novels like Meredith's.

In these remarks we have not touched upon Meredith's poetry. We consider his novels as the basis of whatever reputation he will succeed in maintaining among the readers of the future. And we venture once more to suggest that, if he is to be placed among the immortals, he be put in position, with a slight touch of motley for distinction, in the vicinity of Carlyle.

The Development of Christian Socialism

I. IN CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

Shall Christian religion and Socialism go hand in hand as brother and sister, or shall they oppose each other in deadly strife, is a much mooted question of the day. Prominent authors have argued for the feasibility of a reconciliation. For, say they, Socialism as an economic system is not opposed to religion, whilst as an attempt at the alleviation of misery and oppression it is at one with the God-given command: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Social reformers, putting theory into practice, have organized numerous associations which professed Christianity and at the same time embraced Socialism, because they discovered the solid basis of the latter in the principles and institutions of the former. Have the acumen of philosophers and the skill of ingenious reformers combined been equal to the task of cementing friendship between Christ and Marx, between the faithful Christian and the revolutionary Socialist?

Before entering on any inquiry into this subject, let us take a historical survey on the development of Christian Socialism. We need not for this purpose go back farther than fifty or sixty years. For it is within this period that socialistic reforms have been broached, in order to reconstruct modern society on the basis of Christianity.

We should, however, from the outset bear in mind that such a development could not be uniform or organic, nor a successive and coherent realization of one idea, since Socialism varies in meaning. It was originally taken for any system or theory which had for its object the amelioration of society and especially the elevation of the working class. After a time a more definite meaning was attached to it, that of collective possession and production; and only of late was it conceived by Marx as an economic and political system advocating collective ownership of all productive means as also collective management of all industry by the entire people constituted into a democratic commonwealth. On the other hand Christianity also has different meanings. It is not the same within the Catholic Church and outside it. In the manifold non-Catholic denominations it is subject to continuous changes. Among them the dogmas admitted as revealed truth are differently interpreted and even gradually decrease in number, and the moral code varies in its extent as well as in its force of obligation. Thus while Socialism admits of different meanings and Christianity is professed in diverse forms, Christian Socialism cannot be one harmonious system, but is a multitude of systems differing from one another and with no other connection than a vague concept of the mind, and its development is the growth not of one but of many independent organizations, of which one is possibly more perfect and farther advanced than the other.

Christian Socialism, conceived as a system of social reforms based on the principles of Christianity, sprang into existence soon after the effects of unrestricted competition in industry and commerce began to be felt. For it was at once understood that the wounds inflicted on society by this new kind of liberalism could be healed only under the influence of Christianity, instituted by God for the elevation of social as well as individual life. When, therefore, in the preceding century capitalism was about to reach the height of its power in continental Europe, and when, protected by liberal governments, it seemed to preclude all hope of redemption from the evils brought by it on the masses, priests and laymen commenced, under the guidance of the churches, to denounce the unfair conditions of labor and to demand the suppression of unjust methods in the accumulation of wealth. Movements of this kind rose in France as far back as in the thirties of the last century. After the Franco-Prussian War, Count de Mun organized the "Oeuvre des Cercles Catholiques des Ouvriers," an association which had for its object the bringing together of the workingmen on a church basis, the making up of a counter-revolution in social life in the name of the Syllabus of Pius IX, and the re-establishing of Christian order in the world of labor. In 1890 Bishop Freppel founded "La Société Catholique d'économie politique" in direct conjunction with the Church, and with him worked a number of prominent Catholic men, such as Claude Jauvel, Charles Périn, the Jesuits Forbes and Caudron, for the introduction of thorough social reforms. Outside the Catholic Church the "Protestant Association for the Practical Study of Social Questions" spread all over the country under the direction and co-operation of the Protestant clergy. The Review of Practical Christianity served as the organ of the association.

In Germany, the late Bishop of Mayence, William E. von Ketteler, as early as 1848, raised his voice for social reforms in harmony with the teachings of the Catholic Church. Together with other German reformers he demanded legislative protection of the rights of labor, pecuniary State subsidies in aid of co-operative associations, reduction of the burdens of taxation and military service, restrictions of the power of capital, and the removal of the evils arising from usury and over-speculation. The "Christian Social Workingmen's Associations," which were founded in consequence and are still in existence, have ever since struggled successfully for the betterment of the laboring classes, using as their organ the Christlich-Soziale Blätter. The Catholic Centre party in the Reichstag effectively supported the movement and obtained a series of legal enactments for the rights and protection of labor. Among the German Protestants, Court Chaplain Stöcker and Pastor Todt were social reformers.

In Austria, a movement for Christian social reforms, first started by the Prince von Lichtenstein and the Counts Blome and Kufstein, was organized by the Baron von Vogelsang. Quite recently the party of the "Christlich-Socialen" was formed by Dr. Lueger, the Catholic mayor of Vienna, for the purpose of exterminating corruption, breaking the power of corporations, reorganizing charities, and ensuring the freedom of municipal administration. Similar movements sprang up in Belgium and Switzerland.

Christian, undoubtedly, the reforms enumerated are in a preeminent sense. But socialistic they can be termed only if, as originally was the case, Socialism is conceived as a system attempting the amelioration of society and especially the elevation of the working classes. With Socialism, however, in its modern and specific conception they have no kinship whatever. They have neither aim nor object in common with it. For they do not aim at the abolition of private property in the means of production, nor at the establishment of cooperative communities under democratic governments. They neither promote class struggle and extermination of class difference, nor are they revolutionary in that they are calculated to overthrow the present civil order and the present civil powers. In all these respects they are opposed to the specific tendencies of contemporaneous socialism and directly counteract them. For this reason the socialists of to-day, far from recognizing them as flesh and bone of their body, characterize them as sham Socialism.

Hence, it seems, we should infer that nowadays, when Socialism is commonly understood to advocate socialized ownership and production and emancipation of the proletariat by revolutionary methods, the term Christian Socialism cannot be applied to social reforms which, like the above mentioned, are essentially opposed to collectivism and revolution. If applied, it is a misnomer apt to produce confusion and misunderstandings in the minds of the less instructed.

Saint Clement Mary Hofbauer

With the imposing ceremonies that the Church has enacted for such occasions, Blessed Clement Mary Hofbauer, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (beatified January 29, 1888), was canonized in Rome on May 20. The members of the General Chapter of the Congregation, with the Most Rev. Patrick Murray, the recently elected Superior General, at their head, were present in St. Peter's.

St. Clement, a second Liguori, was born December 26, 1751, at Tasswitz in Moravia, and was baptized on the same day, receiving the name of John. It was not until 1782, when he embraced the life of a hermit at Tivoli in Italy, that Barnaba Chiaramonti, bishop of that town, afterwards Pius VII, gave him the name of Clement Mary. His father, a poor peasant, originally bore the name of Dvorak, but according to a custom then in vogue changed it into its German equivalent, Hofbauer, when settling in a German neighborhood.

Clement had scarcely completed his sixth year when his father died, and his life was an unbroken series of contradictions, persecutions and disappointments. His one earthly ambition was to be a priest, but everything seemed to conspire to foil this aspiration. His only comfort was the prediction of his mother: "God will yet make a priest of you." At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to a baker, with whom he spent three years, and was then employed in a Premonstratensian Abbey at Bruck from 1771 to 1775, where he devoted all his leisure time to study. On the death of the abbot he withdrew from the monastery. Clement, now in his twentieth year, became a hermit. But when hermitages were suppressed by Joseph II he repaired to Vienna, where he again plied the baker's trade; yet he felt all the time that he was not in his proper vocation. Two pilgrimages to Rome followed, but seeing no chance to become a priest, he resumed the life of a hermit at Tivoli in Italy. However, he soon felt an internal assurance that he must be a missionary, and not a hermit. He returned to Vienna, and while there attending the university one of the professors advanced heretical doctrine. Clement fearlessly arose and said: "Sir, what you have just propounded is not in accordance with Catholic teaching," and instantly left the room. The professor was amazed and indignant, but after studying the subject anew confessed that Clement was right. In 1784 Clement went again to the Eternal City, where he asked to be admitted into the Redemptorist Congregation, and was received by Father Landi, one of its pioneers. The next day, Thaddeus Hübl, Clement's friend, followed him into its ranks.

When St. Alphonsus heard of the reception of the two German novices, he was filled with joy. While the Neapolitan Fathers ridiculed the proposal of the two novices to evangelize the countries beyond the Alps, the venerable founder uttered these prophetic words: "God will not fail to promote His glory by their means. In the midst of the Lutherans and Calvinists these good priests will do a great work."

Few details of Clement's novitiate have reached us. On March 19, 1785, he made his profession and a few days later he was raised to the priesthood. Towards the close of the same year the saint and his companion were sent to unfurl the banner of St. Liguori beyond the Alps. Finding it impossible under Joseph II to establish a house in Vienna, they went to Warsaw in Poland. Here Clement began his apostolic labors, which lasted from 1786 to 1808. No race, no sect, no class was excluded from the great heart of this apostle. There were daily instructions for Protestants and Jews; orphanages, schools and colleges were established, and the saint and his community undertook labors almost beyond human endurance. From Warsaw Clement founded houses in Courland, Poland, Germany and Switzerland, but only to see them suppressed by hostile governments after doing untold good. Clement himself and his companions were ruthlessly expelled from Warsaw and imprisoned in the fortress of Küstrin in Germany. Soon, however, orders came for their dispersion, and Clement with one companion went to Vienna, where he spent the last twelve years of his life and became "the Apostle of Vienna."

The Saint's power over the hearts of men, high and low, rich and poor, lettered and unlettered, young and old, was remarkable. He was neither philosopher, poet, scholar, nor orator; he was without much literary training or brilliant accomplishments. His chief weapons were his breviary and his rosary. Yet his greatest conquests were among men and women of superior intellectual endowments. His converts and penitents included Adam von Müller, court councillor and author; Frederick Schlegel and his wife Dorothy; Zachary Werner, poet and orator; the Princesses Jablonowska and Bretzenheim; Francis de Paul Szechenyi, privy councillor; Count and Countess Frederick von Klinkowström; Anthony von Pilat, court councillor, and his wife; Frederick Schlosser, linguist and poet, and his wife; Dr. Emmanuel Veit; Professors Ackermann and Zängerle; Bishop Ziegler; Baraga, first Bishop of Marquette, Mich.; and Cardinal Rauscher.

At Vienna, nobles, military men, artists, men of letters, students, young men of all ranks crowded his little parlor. But he achieved his most signal triumph at the time of the Congress of Vienna. The Josephist party openly proposed in the Congress to establish a "German National Church," independent of the Holy See. But they were foiled chiefly through the labors of Clement, who was the soul of the Catholic cause. The representatives of the Holy See consulted the humble religious at every turn, and Cardinal Rauscher declared: "At the time of the Congress, Father Clement was the centre round which all earnest, learned Catholics were gathered, and by his aid they were able to defeat the schismatics who strove to form a new National German Church independent of the Pope."

After the Congress Clement followed up his victory by providing Catholic literature and Catholic education in Vienna. He encouraged his literary friends to issue Catholic publications and newspapers and to inaugurate circulating libraries. Unable to establish a regular house of the Redemptorists in Vienna, he devoted his apostolic zeal in a special manner to the education of children and the training of young men. During the whole period of his stay in that city he was the victim of atrocious persecutions, and finally he was ordered to leave the country. When asked: "Whither will you go?" he replied: "To America; only give me time till spring, and do not compel an old man to travel in mid-winter." But the archbishop obtained justice for him at the hands of the emperor. When Clement rendered his soul into the hands of his Maker in Vienna, March 15, 1820, Pope Pius VII exclaimed: "Religion in Austria has lost its chief support," and during his lifetime the same Pope had styled him "a true apostle, a real saint, a column of the Church." Interesting lives of the saint have been written by Father Michael Haringer, translated by Lady Herbert; by Mother Austin of the Sisters of Mercy, and by Father O. R. Vassall, C.S.S.R.

A Serious Charge

At a celebration in Chicago on May 11, the public schools of the city were severely criticized by Mr. David R. Forgan, president of the National City Bank, who said: "We business men are in a position to see what sort of young men and women the Chicago public schools are turning out, and a good many of us do not like what we see. The three Rs are being crowded out and the graduates show the results. The boy comes out of school and he cannot write an intelligent letter. His work is ungrammatical, it is illegibly written, and half of the words are spelled wrongly. Schools that cannot teach a boy to write a letter, spell it properly, and phrase it grammatically are failures—and the Chicago schools are not teaching this." It is an act of lèse majesté to say aught in criticism of our public school system. If there be matter of pride to Americans, it is the system of common school education which has grown to be almost a religion among us. Yet criticism like that of Mr. Forgan is coming to be an old story, and his high standing in the community and his position as a leading banker lend a weight to his remarks not to be ignored. Presumably he expresses a conviction which is general and not individual, his position among his fellows forbids us to suppose him capable of loose and easily refutable charges touching a sacred institution such as the public school. And if we are to measure our boasted system by results—a standard common enough in our national ethics—what a humiliation for us there is in Mr. Forgan's conviction thus openly expressed, because the charge he brings has its echoes in many other cities of our land in which the like conditions are verified. And if the charge stands against high school graduates what shall one say of the thousands whose school work carries them no farther than the grammar school grades?

Is it politics that has played havoc with the old school routine which provided the essential practical training in the elements so sorely missed to-day? Is it the selfish instinct of many modern educators who seem to accept the school as a means to advance their own individual interests? Is it "theory run mad" and specialization without regard to the simplest principles of pedagogics? We spend many millions every year on our common schools and it is but just that a fair return be expected from an investment generously made. And surely the return is lacking when keen business men unite with the scholarly members of college and university faculties to denounce the ordinary results achieved in common school training.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Louvain Jubilee—May 9-11

The dawn of Sunday, May 9, saw the eyes of all Belgium turned on the old university town of Louvain, for on that and the two following days, the "Alma Mater," as they love to call it here, was celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of her restoration. The fête was not to be especially gorgeous—not nearly so elaborate as was that of the golden jubilee in 1884—for Louvain is not rich, and a wise discretion dictated a not too lavish display. But the celebration, such as it was, was none the less fully worthy of her.

Many representatives had responded to the invitation to be present. The University of Paris had refused, it is true, but it was a refusal that brought as much honor and sympathy to Louvain as dishonor to Paris. Of the American Universities three alone were represented, Columbia by Mr. Munroe Smith, LL.D., Madison (Wisconsin) by Mr. Evans, and the Catholic University of Washington by Dr. Pace. Archbishop Bourne of London was there, and Dr. Chisholm, Archbishop of Aberdeen; Dr. Casartelli came as representative of London and Manchester Universities, and Dr. Mahaffy from Trinity College, Dublin. Besides these there were many others from German, Austrian and Swiss Universities.

The festivities began on Sunday morning with a general distribution of help to the poor of the city, which was followed by the formal opening of the new Chemistry Building, given by the Duke d'Arenberg. At the same time and in the same building was inaugurated an exhibition of the works of the famous Louvain sculptor of the miner, Constantine Mennier.

At one in the afternoon was held the principal function of Sunday, the unveiling of the statue of Justus Lipsius—Louvain's greatest professor—given to the city by the government. It consisted of a speech of presentation by M. Descamps, Minister of Arts and Sciences, that of acceptance by the Burgomaster, and an allocution by the Rector Magnificus. Then followed what was probably the most striking part of the whole celebration, the procession of banners. These latter were borne by the delegations of the various Catholic societies of Belgium grouped according to provinces. There were three thousand of them and they formed an inspiring sight as they marched past the reviewing stand to the accompaniment of the music of eighty bands. After a march all around the city the column halted in the campus of the Josephites' College to receive their prizes.

Here the sight seen from the reviewing balcony was unforgettable. Nearly eight thousand men, students and visitors, were crowded into the square, and above their heads floated the gayly-wrought silk banners, the lion of Flanders and the red, yellow and black of Belgium mingling with the Papal white and yellow and the blue and white of the University, all wrought into a riot of purple and red and gold. It was like some medieval meeting of knighthood. There were speeches in Flemish and French, M. Schollaert using French. This latter spoke in a high strain directly to the students, asking them, with much emotion in his voice, as a personal favor, to be ever united in spirit and deed for the Catholic cause, and to remember that they were, before all, Catholic Belgians, and closing with an exhortation to Christian piety.

In the evening there was a general illumination of the city, and the dingy old town was for a few hours changed into a fairyland by the festoons of Japanese lanterns, the transparencies and the long rows of candles that adorned the houses along the principal streets.

Monday's festivities, the most important, began in the primary church of St. Peter with a solemn Te Deum, sung by Cardinal Mercier, surrounded by the Bishops of Belgium in mitre and cope. Thence the whole procession of the guests filed into one of the college halls, where was to be held an academic séance and conferring of degrees. Here was a brilliant spectacle. Cardinal Mercier sat on a raised platform at a red-covered table, at his right the Apostolic Nuncio, Mgr. Tacci-Porcelli, at his left the Rector, Mgr. Hebbelynck, and M. Schollaert. Around him were grouped the Bishops of Belgium, with Mgrs. Bourne, and Gabriels of Ogdensburg, U. S., the only American Bishop present, while to left and right rose two tiers containing the delegates from the universities, and in front sat in a semicircle the other invited guests. The Cardinal's flaming red, the Bishops' purple, the varied shades of the academic gowns, the glint of the gold and silver of countless decorations, all united into a gorgeous blaze of color.

After a brief word from the Nuncio, and the reading of the Holy Father's greetings and of those of the King, there came the presentation of the engraved addresses. This was the signal for much enthusiasm on the part of the students—René Bazin, of the French Academy; Mgr. Bourne, Mgr. Bandrillart, Rector of the Catholic University of Paris; M. Beernaert, the veteran statesman, and Dr. Pace, being greeted with especially loud acclamations. The Rector followed with a long address, going over in detail the various steps of progress made in the past seventy-five years. Then came addresses on behalf of the Walloon and the Flemish students and the Alumni Association, and finally a stirring and impressive address by Cardinal Mercier, himself a distinguished former professor in the University.

Towards the end of his address an interesting ceremony took place. It was known that the University had been founded, in 1425, by a Papal Bull, but that interesting document was nowhere to be found. Lately, however, it was recovered, in Holland, by the Bishop of Bois-le-Duc, who, with exquisite consideration, withheld the news for this occasion. Accordingly, at a preconcerted moment, the Dutch prelate's delegate handed the precious document, wrapped in silk, to His Eminence, who, in his turn, solemnly restored it to the Rector Magnificus amid a frenzy of enthusiasm from all present, who thus testified their devotion to the Holy See and the University alike.

The presentation of honorary degrees followed, and was the cause of a new ovation for René Bazin and Mgr. Bourne. Among those thus honored were President Lowell of Harvard, and Father Ehrle, curator of the Vatican Library. The presentation of Edgar Tinel's masterpiece, "Katharina," was to follow, but before that the party adjourned to the "Halles," where his portrait was presented to Mgr. Hebbelynck, the Rector, who then entertained his guests at luncheon.

"Katharina" followed and was received with great enthusiasm, the more so as the distinguished composer is a Belgian and was himself present, as he had been at the Academic meeting, where he received an honorary degree. The day ended with a banquet for the guests and professors.

The third and last day ended with a Solemn High Mass coram Pontifice sung by Mgr. Stillemans, Bishop of Ghent and dean of the Belgian hierarchy. At it assisted the same brilliant assembly of the day before. In the afternoon there took place the rendition of César Franck's "The Beatitudes" in French, as "Katharina" had been in Flemish. The festivities closed with a banquet of the students and alumni.

Such was the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the University of Louvain, modest enough in duration, but dignified and solemn, entirely worthy of the great institution, and a complete success. What is more, the liberal press, to judge by its tone, was evidently much impressed, and did not hesitate to approve of the sight of a liberal Burgomaster arm-in-arm with a Catholic Cabinet Minister, and to pronounce the great University the backbone of the Catholic party. Indeed, it is not too much to say that this great manifestation of Catholic activity and unity will go far towards gaining victory for the Catholics when they go to the polls next year to elect a new house of representatives.

The Story of an Escaped Nun

LONDON, MAY 12.

There is at East Bergholt, in Suffolk, a convent of Benedictine nuns. Among the Sisters, many of whom are members of the oldest Catholic families in England, there was, until last February, a lady who appeared on the platform of the Protestant Alliance at its recent meeting dressed in the Benedictine habit and was introduced to the audience as Miss Moulton, the "escaped nun." She is, however, a very disappointing specimen of the species, from the Protestant Alliance point of view, for she has no "horrible revelations" to impart. From the little she has said to reporters it appears she found convent life very monotonous and began to tire of it. She spoke to superiors of her difficulties. Now the last person an enclosed community of nuns wants to keep within its walls is a Sister who, for any reason, finds that she is out of her element. Under the Church's actual legislation and practice there are no vows taken by religious women which cannot be dispensed on due cause being shown. In a case like Miss Moulton's, care is taken that a Sister does not act on a mere passing impression, to her own subsequent unhappiness, but a deliberate petition for release from the vows is never refused.

The question of Miss Moulton's departure from East Bergholt seems to have been actually under consideration, when on the afternoon of February 15th she was missed from the convent. It was known that she had no money with her, and considering her recent fits of depression and hysterical excitement it was feared that some mishap might befall her. The abbess, therefore, very properly sent out two lay Sisters to make enquiries and look for her. They overtook her on the road near the railway station at Manningtree village, the nearest station to the convent but at some distance from it. The story told in the newspapers was that the nuns laid hands on her and tried to force her to return with them, but that she was "rescued" from her would-be captors by the station master and some of the railway men. The plain facts are that the nuns advised her to come back to the convent with them, but she refused, and on the invitation of the station master (who, as a good British Protestant, was suspicious of the nuns) she went into a room at the station, telling him she wanted to go up to London by the next train to rejoin her mother there. He kindly gave her the price of her ticket and a few shillings, and she reached her home that night.

In the House of Commons on April 6th, Mr. Gladstone was questioned on the subject by Mr. T. H. Sloan, one of the small group of Irish Orangemen who are Members of Parliament. The Home Secretary said:

"I have made inquiry and have received a full report from the Chief Constable of Suffolk, from which it appears that no attempt was made to use force to bring the lady back to the convent, and that she did not in fact return. Two Sisters overtook her when on the way to the railway station and tried to induce her to go back with them, but she refused to do so. The chief constable tells me that the reports of this case, published in the press, were of a garbled and sensational nature. There is no ground for any further action on my part."

He added that the chief constable had been in communication with Miss Moulton herself before sending in his report. The lady and her mother had been talking to newspaper men. Miss Moulton kept in the background and said that she did not want to be interviewed. Her mother speaking for her said her daughter was sorry she had acted impulsively and so given rise to scandalous talk, but she had been unhappy, and found the life at East Bergholt wearisome and monotonous. She had now been given by the Bishop of Northampton a prolonged leave of absence from her convent pending the arrangement of her case. She did not expect to return there.

So far it would seem she was anxious to set things right. But meanwhile, Mr. Sloan and his friends of the Protestant Alliance were trying to work up a sensation. A meeting was held at Manningtree at which the Alliance denounced convents in general, and presented to the station master and his men as a reward for "rescuing" Miss Moulton, gold watches and copies of the Bible and of Foxe's "Book of Martyrs." Then they put themselves in communication with Miss Moulton, and persuaded her to appear last week at their annual meeting in London wearing the habit in which she "escaped." So far she has said nothing more than that she was unhappy in her convent and impatient to leave it. But she has drifted into very doubtful company, and there is a living to be made by supplying platform revelations. That inducements are being held out to her is suggested in the press by a non-Catholic journalist, who, whatever may be said of his career as a financier, politician and the rest, is a hard-headed man of the world without the least prejudice in favor of Catholics or of nuns. In the current number of his lively weekly review, John Bull, Mr. Bottomley, M.P., addresses an open letter to his fellow Member of the House, Mr. Sloan, in which he says:

"MY DEAR SLOAN:—You are a very decent fellow—one of the best—your Protestant Alliance and United Kingdom Alliance proclivities notwithstanding. I am therefore surprised to hear that in your capacity as chairman of the former body you have been doing your best to bribe the young lady who recently 'escaped' from a convent, under circumstances that were made the most of by the sensational press, to appear on your platforms. I presume the limitless funds which scattered gold watches among the railway porters will quite admit of the offers that have been made to Miss Moulton. If, however, that lady has any complaint to make against convents—and I am told she has not—she would do well to make it under other auspices, and to make it 'without money and without price.' Some of us remember Ellen Golding, 'the rescued nun,' whose tale your society vouched for, and which turned out a tissue of falsehoods. Is it not playing the game a bit low down to bring pressure to bear upon a young woman in this lady's circumstances? Be careful how you move. I have no interest in the matter, but I know more about your activities in this affair than you may imagine."

This is very plain speaking, and it will be interesting to see what reply Mr. Sloan or his Association will make.

The Western Catholic Summer School

The prospects for the continuation, at least for the present, of the Western Catholic Chatauqua, at Spring Bank, Oconomowoc Lake, Wisconsin, are not of the most encouraging. The Western Catholic Summer School has been itinerant, at one time holding its sessions at Madison, Wis., at another at Detroit, Michigan. Then there occurred a hiatus in the sessions for some years, until last summer, when the school was held successfully at Spring Bank, which is situated about twenty-eight miles west of Milwaukee on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. The sessions commenced on August 3 and continued uninterruptedly until August 29.

Spring Bank is an ideal location for a Summer School. It occupies over one hundred acres of beautifully timbered and parked land, with 1,400 feet of lake frontage. Eight large buildings, several of them of stone, afford accommodation for 250 people. Each room is provided with lavatory, running water and gas. Beside the main buildings there are a club house, a Swiss cottage, dining room and separate kitchen, and a large assembly room for lectures and entertainments.

The entire shore line of Lake Oconomowoc is occupied by the summer villas of wealthy residents of Chicago and Milwaukee, thus precluding the possibility of any objectionable feature being introduced into the locality. The property, at a very conservative estimate, is said to be worth $250,000, and last year, His Grace, Archbishop Messmer, of Milwaukee, secured an option at the remarkably low figure of $50,000. This option expired in the autumn, but the property is still purchasable at the figures then offered. It has been proposed by those interested in the welfare of the summer school to form a stock company for the purpose of raising $100,000 at $100 per share, to provide a fund for the purchase of the ground, to make the necessary improvements, to secure lecturers and to meet other necessary running expenses. Twelve hundred dollars is all, up to the present, that has been subscribed, owing, perhaps, to the fact that no systematized plan has yet been initiated for the disposal of the shares. J. G. Kelly, Esq., City Attorney of Milwaukee, and secretary of the Western Catholic Chatauqua and an enthusiastic worker in the cause, gave much time and labor, as well as cash, in making last year's sessions a success, but owing to the multiplicity of his duties as a city official and the demands of his own private law practice he has been compelled to relinquish his position as manager for the forthcoming season. He is, however, very sanguine as to the ultimate acquisition of the Spring Bank property as a permanent home for the Western Catholic Summer School.

It would be a grave mistake for the Catholics of the Middle West to allow the opportunity of purchasing so suitable a property and on such reasonable terms to go by default. The buildings are in good condition and almost too lavishly furnished. In the early years of last century they were erected by a wealthy western railroad man—a sort of incipient magnate of those days—but the venture resulted in a species of Blennerhasset fiasco. The value of property at this beautiful summer resort is constantly increasing. There is not another foot of purchasable land on the shore line of Lake Oconomowoc which is perhaps the most charming of all the lakes of Wisconsin. The estate, in its present condition, is admirably adapted to the purpose of a Catholic Summer School. Its substantial buildings, its grand old trees, high banks and rich lawns, and its fine bathing beach, make it an ideal spot. It will be a subject of sincere regret if there be not found sufficient public-spirited Catholic men in Chicago, St. Louis, St. Paul, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Detroit and other places in the Middle West, to take up all the available stock of this enterprise which, under ordinary management at Spring Bank, should soon be interest-bearing.

The Mid-April Massacres in Cilicia

TARSUS, CILICIA, APRIL 23, 1909.

The Ottoman Constitution was thought to be a pledge of civilization and freedom, yet massacre is the order of the day. For four days we were cut off from all communication with the outside world by post or rail, and the most rigid government censorship of all telegrams was exercised.

Easter Sunday this year fell on April 11, for the Eastern as well as for the Latin Church, and in honor of the feast as well as to celebrate the new Constitution, much powder was fired off in good Oriental fashion. By Tuesday all was quiet and business was going on as usual.

There were vague whispers of unrest on Wednesday, and when the evening train did not come in from Adana the whispers grew to a report that at Adana an Armenian had killed a Mussulman, and that the mob was bent on lynching the murderer. The reserves were called out, and from all parts soldiers were flocking to Adana. On Thursday the governor ordered arms to be supplied to every reliable man in Tarsus, and as a matter of fact every non-Christian who presented himself at the barracks received a Mauser and five rounds of ammunition. Many of them had never seen a Mauser before, and did not know how to load one. The town looked as if in a state of siege. The Governor had it patrolled by bodies of regular troops, a Christian or a Mussulman of influence accompanying each section. The shops were shut and the timid took refuge in the Consulates.

On Friday morning some Armenians, making their way towards the railway station, were met by a body of Afghans and two of them were shot in sight of a patrol. The Kaimmakan or Governor had given orders to shoot all law-breakers at sight, but Afghan vengeance is proverbial and dreaded. The commander of the patrol made a feeble effort to save the Armenians, but when the Afghan leader called him a giaour he hurried away. Thereupon the Afghans hoisted a flag and to the shout of "Allah" marched into the town to start a Holy War. The Armenian quarter was wiped out and the Afghan Mosque filled with booty. A few Europeans ventured to inspect the neighborhood on Saturday evening, but on Sunday the troops barred all approaches.

At Adana the massacre began on Wednesday, May 14, at 11 A. M. and lasted until Friday. Flames destroyed 1,500 Armenian houses, 300 Chaldean houses and the Syrian Jacobite Church. The number of slain is put at 10,000 in Adana alone. The British Consul had his arm broken by a bullet and may die of blood poisoning. Two Protestant missionaries were killed by Turks while trying to save a Turkish house from burning. The Armenians defended themselves bravely. In the country places, Christian farmers and farm hands were shot by passing bodies of troops, and whole villages were wiped out. At Baghtche the holocaust included four Germans, and at Tchougour-Ova, two Frenchmen.

The arrival of men-of-war has quieted the panic. At Adana the price of bread has gone up 300%, and at Tarsus, 200%. The European houses are filled with refugees, and the tales of torture and brutality are unfit for publication.

The fact that the uprising took place at the same time in various points, not only in this village but in other provinces, would seem to show that the Government is responsible for it. But here we know almost nothing of what is going on outside our immediate neighborhood. In some places the authorities opposed the outbreak. Thus, at Mersina the Vice-Governor threatened to shoot anyone creating disorder. At Tarsus a Mussulman of rank saved the lives of many Christians, and the troops are continually escorting refugees from the country places to the towns. Nevertheless, it is a war of the Crescent on the Cross. Nothing but the occupation of the whole country by some Christian power can save the ghaous. Half-measures are useless. The Constitution can never bring peace where race hatreds are so marked and so many. Meanwhile the need of financial aid is urgent.

Opportuneness of the Latest Encyclical

ROME, MAY 15, 1909.

The Encyclical "Communium rerum" is the bone of contention just now. It is frankly opposed to Freemasonry and Liberalism (in the continental sense of the word), which it brands as the causes of all social discontent.

As was to be expected, the liberal and masonic press cry out upon it as obscurantist. It is not easy for Americans to realize the opportuneness of this Encyclical for Europe, and especially for Italy. In former letters I have tried to make clear the position of Catholics here, and the cleavage between those who lean towards political makeshifts and the loyal supporters of unrestricted freedom for the Church. Fear of displeasing non-Catholics is paralyzing Catholic activity. Some are weary of the long struggle; others assume an attitude of neutrality; among others indifference has crept in. So that if the recent Encyclical did nothing more than upbraid our supineness it would have done much. On this account weak-kneed Catholics are offended by its direct outspoken tone; the Liberals are furious over its revelation of their illiberalism; and the Masons for want of arguments are hurling abusive epithets at it.

There is a rumor of the foundation at Rome in the near future of a great central Ecclesiastical College devoted to assisting specialists in the various branches of study. The new institution must not be confounded with the New Dominican University. Rumor (it would be unsafe to give it a more serious name just now) goes on to fix the date of the opening as next November, and the site of the historic Apollinare College.

Yesterday a pilgrimage came from Nola to assist in the translation of the body of the great Bishop St. Paulinus, who thus after 1500 years goes back to his old home.

The Blocards at the Campidoglio are making themselves heard. They are a motley crowd of all shades of political feeling. The former administration had voted $100,000 towards an Exposition to be held at Rome in 1911, commemorative of the New Capital of Italy. Of course the sum was ridiculously small; and when recently a motion to increase the vote came up, Syndic Nathan (formerly Grand-Master of the Freemasons) opposed it on the ground that the municipality was bankrupt. "If the government wants an exposition," said he, "let it pay for it. Workingmen's houses are more needed than expositions, and," he added (one can almost see the grin), "dispensing with the exposition will be sparing the Vatican a fresh cause of complaint." The Campidoglio is against the monarchy, and the Masons rule the Campidoglio. Gossip has it, moreover, that Nathan is very bitter at having being passed over recently in the nominations to the Senate. But the collective action of the municipal cohorts is a sign-post on the road of ideas which are abandoning anti-clericalism and are fast heading for anti-monarchism. It is a case of the snake biting the juggler, or the devil working for God, but I really do not know which.

The Propaganda Fide printing press passed into the hands of a joint stock company last January, and now the Libreria or publishing business of the Congregation has gone into private hands. It is rumored that the Osservatore Romano is now also a private concern, though the Vatican uses it for publishing official documents. This rumor is, however, open to doubt.

Austrian School Reform

Austria, in common with other countries of Europe, has felt of late years increasing pressure for greater consideration in the schools of the claims of modern languages and natural science. This resulted in the appointment to inquire into the need for reform of a governmental commission, which held its sittings in January of last year. The question led to the publication of numerous brochures and gave birth to a notably fine discourse by Robert Pattai before the Inquiry Commission, and a warm defence of the Gymnasium by Dr. August Scheindler in his "Pro Gymnasio." The question was further complicated by the demand for admission to the universities after the completion of the Realschule course. In this respect the issue has a certain likeness to the struggle still going on in England for the abolition of Greek as a condition of entrance to the older universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

The Austrian Education Department has now determined on what is perhaps the wisest way out of the difficulty. It has refused to modify substantially the programme of the Gymnasium and has subjected it merely to certain minor internal reforms concerned mainly with improved methods of teaching. It has further introduced similar minor modifications into the Realschule without granting admission from these schools to the universities. By the side, however, of these have been set up two new types of school, both granting the right of entrance into the universities. The Realgymnasium retains Latin, but does away with Greek, hence setting time free for modern languages and a fuller study of natural science; the Reform-Realgymnasium, however, is intended chiefly for those who wish to pass from the lower classes of a Realschule into a school that will admit them to a university course. Thus the claims of those who called for admission to the universities without a purely classical school course have been to a large extent satisfied.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

M. Loisy's Professorship

The appointment of M. Loisy by the French Government to the chair of History of Religion at the College de France was, in the opinion even of freethinkers in France, an injustice to more worthy competitors, and in more than one way discreditable to the University staff, of which he is now a member. On the day of his opening lecture it was expected that Catholics would flock in crowds to make demonstrations against him. Great precautions, therefore, were taken by the Government to prevent disorder; a large police force surrounded the building where the new professor was to lecture; a contingent of gendarmes escorted him from his apartments to the lecture room and back again to his apartment. But the day passed without disturbance. Mgr. Amette, Archbishop of Paris, had warned Catholics that no one should be present at the lectures of M. Loisy, on any pretext, as he had been excommunicated by name. The Lanterne announced that the members of the Catholic Students' Association had prepared to demonstrate against him. The students hastened to send this reply: "Your information is without the least foundation. There is no one who does not know that the members of our Association have officially determined to obey scrupulously the note which His Grace communicated to the Semaine Religieuse. There will be no demonstrations from the College of France except on the part of the republican federation of students. These will applaud, not the professor, for he will be just himself, but the unfrocked, the interdicted, the excommunicated priest."

M. Loisy's lectures, writes the Echo of Paris, go on untroubled. The Archbishop by interdicting Catholics from attending them, has prevented new scandals à la Thalamas, and has at the same time dealt the severest blow to the Professors of the College of France, who had provoked and defied demonstrations.

Even Le Temps reluctantly deprecates the blunder the Government has made in this instance. It points out how but lately Father Scheil had been designated for the chair of Assyriology, both by the College and by the Academy of Inscriptions. His preeminence as an Assyriologist is acknowledged by all, and still he was excluded because he was a Dominican. M. Brunetière, though recommended by the Academy for the chair of Literature, and a man without rival in this line, was ostracized for no other reason than that he had Catholic views.

Our Central American Neighbors

"Why do so many missionaries go to Japan, China, India, Turkey and Korea and so few to Central America?" asked Frederick Palmer in a recent article in the New York Times. The answer is not far to seek, although Mr. Palmer barely hints at it. Illiberal atheistic governments prohibit, except in a few favored instances, religious of either sex from living in communities. Such regular clergy as are tolerated by the civil authorities are instructors in the diocesan seminaries. In Costa Rica there are now nine regulars, members of the Congregation of the Mission, and the Fathers of Charity. The first bishop of San José, the capital of Costa Rica, was a Lazarist, and he was banished for presuming to openly express his sympathy with the Jesuits who had been driven from that State. There are one hundred secular clergy there. In Guatemala there are twelve regulars to one hundred and twenty seculars. In San Salvador, one hundred and thirty secular priests minister to the wants of the faithful in two hundred and ninety-five churches. In the three countries mentioned there are, all told, about seven hundred churches for a Catholic population of about two millions. And the secular clergy are a hard-working, efficient body of men who, often in direst poverty, labor faithfully in God's vineyard. If they could be aided in the propagation of the Faith by the establishment of religious communities, not necessarily composed of regular clergy, an impetus would be given the Church in the outlying districts. But hostile governments bar such organizations.

Mr. Palmer's ignorance of the countries which lie between Mexico and Costa Rica is well illustrated by the heading which he displays over one of his paragraphs: "Women Object to Marriage." As a matter of fact, concubinage is unknown and the very few fallen women are those who have violated their marriage vows. Strict compliance with the laws of the Church regarding marriage is the invariable rule among the Catholics of Central America. Where a civil marriage is rendered necessary by the law of a particular jurisdiction, society does not regard a man and woman as married if they have not gone through the requisite religious formalities. We cannot measure spiritual advancement, which is always personal, in vessels of dry statistical clay. But where the education of the people is questioned, numbers are convincing. In Guatemala as far back as 1895 there were 64,015 pupils in 1,284 schools. In Honduras, in 1901, there were 800 primary schools, 700 of which were aided by the State, with an attendance of 29,000 pupils. Ten years ago there were in Nicaragua 1,030 schools with 20,000 pupils. In 1902 Costa Rica had 17,000 pupils at 307 primary schools alone, while San Salvador's 600 schools house 33,000 pupils. These figures, which indicate that over five per cent. of the entire population is attending the primary schools alone, make a very fair and convincing showing in comparison with the figures in some of our Western and Southern States, especially when the lack of transportation facilities and the sparseness of the settlements is borne in mind.

School Teachers' Congresses in Paris

France is interiorly rent by parties, republics within the Republic. Perhaps the most powerful of these is a school teachers' association. From it more than from any other source the country is threatened with disturbance. The State functionaries and the labor unions have not the influence of the teachers, men and women; these have the tongue, the pen, the opportunities of the hour. Two congresses of teachers have been held simultaneously in Paris. In the one the Confederation of the Teachers' Syndicates was represented, in the other the French Pedagogical Union. These two bodies with contrary tendencies agree on one point only. In 1906 they grew out of the formidable Amicales des Instituteurs, and in time they have devoured their progenitor. In waging war against the religious free school, the Government was forced to be very condescending to its lay teachers, enlarging their powers, exaggerating their importance. The result was the formation of the Amicales d'Instituteurs, consisting of head teachers of primary schools, who have developed an excessive idea of their own importance, and whose pride is out of keeping with their modest functions. They consider the school as their own property and subject entirely to their influence, exclusive of the parents and the State. Having united together, their solidarity enabled them to resist dictation. Things were in this state when some of them did not find the others bold enough to shake off the yoke of public authority and to effect a mutual combination of their forces with those of the Confederation of Labor. Determined to push on, they formed syndicates. Seeing the Amicales making light of the principle of authority and renouncing principles of patriotism and moderation, some were frightened, and formed the French Pedagogical Union.

Wonderful to say, when these syndicates were formed, their greatest encouragement came to them from the Government. This encouragement looked like an approbation, and it was taken as such. The Government, however, soon had reason to perceive that the teachers' syndicates were a threat to the State. The leaders were suspended from office, and the syndicates were pronounced illegal, but the Government dared not dissolve them. Affiliation of teachers to labor syndicates was interdicted, yet the fight on this ground has been going on, and it is safe to say that the syndicates have won. Last year a mixed congress was proposed, which would be opened to the workmen syndicates, and where pedagogic questions would be treated. The Minister of Instruction threatened with severe penalties all teachers who should take part in it. At first there was dismay in the ranks; but soon the party rallied, with the result that instead of one congress there were two at the same time in Paris. The delegates of the syndicates met in defiance of the Government. Delegates of the labor unions had the prominent seats. They have proved their strength and are joyous over the victory. The Government, feeling its own weakness, took the Pedagogical Union under its protection, or rather tried to strengthen itself by forming an alliance with it. The Government and the Pedagogical Union had their congress, the former being represented by the inspectors of primary schools. Apparently the teachers' syndicates will not be ruled by the Government, and the Pedagogical Union in principle, at least, rules the Government.

The Dominion of South Africa

No measure has been more criticized by the Unionists in England than the grant, largely through the efforts of the late premier, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, of a Constitution to the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony, formerly the Orange River Free State. The Opposition went so far as to prophesy at the time the imminent decline and fall of the British South African Empire. Last week the answer was given to these forebodings by the signing at Bloemfontein of the amended edition of the South African Act of Union.

The new Constitution provides for a governor-general, with an executive council; a Senate of thirty-two elected members and eight nominated members, and an Assembly of one hundred and twenty-one members elected by the four provinces, Cape Colony, the Transvaal, Natal and the Orange River Colony, in proportion to their white population. The convention has succeeded fairly well in safeguarding alike the secure establishment of equal rights of representation, which the British have fought for, and the protection of the Boer language, which tends to disappear before the English tongue. The executive administration of the new dominion will be carried on in Pretoria and its laws will be passed in Cape Town. Cape Town will have fifty-one members of the Assembly, Transvaal, thirty-six, and the Natal and the Orange River Colony, seventeen each. The old provinces will retain their manner of local administration after the "State's rights" sentiment of America. The question of franchise, which will inevitably occur to those interested in social problems across the Atlantic, is left unanswered by the Act of Union. In Cape Colony a native franchise on a property basis now obtains, and it will continue. In the other colonies the question will have to be met and settled. Undoubtedly the amended Act of Union will be accepted by the various states soon to be provinces, and when the next Imperial conference is held in 1911, South Africa will take part in it as a unit fit to be counted with Canada and Australia.

The Republic of Liberia

Nowhere is so much interest felt in the fate of the Republic of Liberia as in Alabama and adjoining commonwealths. This section of the South has contributed a large number of negroes to the little republic, and at one time it seemed as if the movement would reach the proportions of a general exodus. Had the Government of Liberia not encountered financial stress it is probable that the movement would have caused considerable labor shortage in the South, for the Liberians had devised an attractive scheme to induce immigration and conditions in the little republic were favorable for putting it in successful practice. The Legislature of Liberia had offered extraordinary inducements to prospective settlers, and about fifteen years ago an alliance was formed with a colonization society having its headquarters in Birmingham, Alabama, under which it was hoped to turn a steady stream of negro colonists toward Liberia. The hope was strengthened by the attitude of certain leaders of the black race in America. These, noting the narrowing horizon of the negro in the Southland, advised their people to seek in Liberia the liberties denied to their people here. A shipload of colonists actually sailed from Charleston and upon their arrival in Liberia the Government there made good its agent's promises. One reason or another prevented the development of an auspicious beginning, chiefly the financial difficulties of the Liberian Republic which became acute five or six years ago. Should the struggling Government be placed upon its feet through the efforts of the special Commission from the United States now in that country, the dream of Liberia may come true in part, if not in full. Therefore it is, that much interest is felt in the fate of the republic by those of the South who might, in the event of an exodus, feel the shortage of labor resulting therefrom.

Death of Von Holstein

Geheimrat von Holstein, who died May 9, for thirty years held a high position in the German Office of Foreign Affairs. During the Franco-Prussian war he entered the service under Bismarck, and when the war was over he was made secretary of Count Henry von Arnim, the German Ambassador at Paris, who, as representative of Prussia in Rome had tried to induce his government to interfere with the liberty of the Vatican Council. In this capacity von Holstein gave secret information to Bismarck about his chief, and Arnim was recalled and condemned to nine months' imprisonment on the charge of having suppressed important documents. Von Holstein was promoted in Berlin, and under four imperial chancellors remained to a large extent the power behind the throne in foreign affairs. The French press says of him that he was a very capable man, an indefatigable worker and deeply devoted to the welfare and glory of his country. Yet the policy which he advocated was disastrous. It was his fault that the Morocco affair has turned out so unfavorably to Germany. He planned the Emperor's visit to Tangiers, but only in Lisbon did the Emperor find out how matters really stood. Had von Holstein's policy been followed, there would have been another Franco-Prussian war. He thought to scare France, says the Berliner Tageblatt, but he forgot that nowadays civilized nations are roused to opposition by brutal conduct. When Bülow fell ill and left the management of affairs to Tschertschky, Holstein tried his old game of keeping himself in office by tendering his resignation. But this time the resignation was accepted. Henceforward he lived only for revenge, avoided by all except the Chancellor, in whose rooms he was frequently seen. It is said that the Harden-Eulenburg-Moltke scandal which did a thousand times more harm than good to the whole Empire, was instigated by von Holstein. He thought, perhaps justly, that Eulenburg had something to do with his dismissal.

The Task of the Present Administration

Mr. Taft is in power long enough to permit shrewd observers to forecast the general policy which he is likely to follow in his administration. According to them the keynote of the Taft administration probably will be financial, or at least economic, and will concern itself mostly with things which touch immediately the daily life of the people.

In working to a purely administrative and business reform in the interest of legitimate commerce the President is fortunate in finding the time particularly propitious. As matters stand there seems to be no occasion to apprehend the continued depression in business which many feared would surely follow the financial panic of 1907. With the return of confidence, say the forecasters, the administration will be justified in pursuing the program of general financial and economic reform. This will include, first, the revision of the tariff, then postal savings banks, and a reorganization of the banking and financial system of the country on a scientific basis. No one, so the opinion appears to be, is better fitted than is the President, because of the evident confidence of the people in his calm judicial temperament, to inaugurate a financial policy which shall wipe out forever the results of the frenzied legislation of the Civil War period and replace our patchwork system with one that shall stand the test of scientific analysis.

LITERATURE

The Revival of Scholastic Philosophy in the Nineteenth Century. By Joseph Louis Perrier, Ph.D. New York. Columbia University Press and Macmillan Company. 1909. Pp. VIII-344. Price $1.75.

This is a very useful and in many respects a remarkable contribution to the literature of Neo-Scholastic philosophy. The bibliography alone is worth more than many a more pretentious study of scholasticism. It extends to almost a hundred pages, and contains the names and a list of the writings of all those who in any way contributed to the revival of scholastic philosophy in our day. Indeed, if any fault were to be found with that part of Dr. Perrier's book, it would be that he includes in his bibliographical list some names and some titles which one does not like to see in any list. Too much wealth of detail is, however, a very small defect in bibliography. The exposition of the contents of scholastic philosophy under the subtitles "Scholastic Logic," "Scholastic Metaphysics," "Scholastic Cosmology," "Scholastic Psychology," "Scholastic Natural Theology" and "Scholastic Moral Philosophy," is clear, sympathetic and on the whole, accurate. This is followed by a chapter on "The Forerunners of the Neo-Scholastic Revival," and separate chapters on the revival in Italy, Spain, Portugal and South America, Germany and Austria, France, Belgium, other European Countries, and the United States and Canada. In this account the author shows an intimate acquaintance with the events, the institutions, the persons and the writings which are associated with the revival of scholasticism since the accession of Leo XIII. He is frankly and, so far as one can judge from his comments, sincerely sympathetic. For instance, his defence of the earlier Roman Thomists against the sweeping condemnation of M. Besse (p. 169) would do credit to one of the Roman Thomists themselves. The following passage shows that Dr. Perrier does not underestimate the importance of the Neo-Scholastics in the general history of philosophy: "For too long a time it has been believed that the monks of the Middle Ages were unconcerned with science, and, regardless of the data of experience, built their systems a priori. This view cannot be held to-day. It is well known that the great scholastic philosophers were enthusiastic investigators of nature . . . Neo-Scholasticism strives to keep abreast with modern scientific progress. In so doing, it does not precisely depart from the attitude of the Medieval philosophers." (p. 39.)

It would be unfair as well as unkind to pick flaws in a book that is certain to prove a positive delight to the friends of Neo-Scholasticism. Still one cannot but express the hope that a few peculiarities of style, and an occasional slip in translating proper names of places (Persia for Perugia, Bologia for Bologna) will be corrected in a future edition.

WILLIAM TURNER.

The Works of the Right Reverend John England, First Bishop of Charleston. Edited, with Introduction, Notes and Index, under the direction of the Most Reverend Sebastian G. Messmer, D.D., Archbishop of Milwaukee. The Arthur H. Clark Company, Cleveland, O. Seven volumes, octavo. Price per set, $30.00, net.

Among the pioneer bishops of this country, John England, the first incumbent of the See of Charleston, S. C., will ever be regarded as one of the most prominent. A man of prodigious intellectual attainment, a profound scholar, and a dauntless, aggressive champion of the Faith at a time when Catholics were few and their tenets misunderstood and often grossly caricatured. Dr. England was a man providentially raised to defend the cause of Catholic truth and brush aside many a cobweb of error, and to clear a portion of the vineyard wofully overrun with the weeds of bigotry and misconception. He stands out as one of the really great figures in the history of the nineteenth century.

North and South Carolina and Florida, which comprised his diocese, were sparsely settled with Catholics, and these were mostly of the illiterate class, without social standing and unable to defend their position, even if the majority cared to do so. When John England assumed charge of the new diocese, in 1820, it contained in all its vast territory, but two priests and two churches. Appalling must have been the prospects to the saintly bishop who now stands out in the pages of history as a giant amid pigmies.

In those pioneer times we find him teaching and catechizing the negroes in his "cathedral," founding and personally conducting a theological seminary, opening and maintaining at an enormous expenditure of energy a philosophical and classical school for the sons of the leading citizens of Charleston, and traveling long distances amid hardships which we, in our easier times, are scarcely able to comprehend. This was a wonderful seed time, and the first fruits of the harvest this saintly prelate had the satisfaction of reaping in his own lifetime. Twelve years after the erection of the See of Charleston the Catholic population of the diocese was estimated at eleven thousand souls, notwithstanding the majority of these were without social, commercial or intellectual prestige, and were generally discredited by their more or less bigoted neighbors.

It is perhaps too early to define the place Dr. England will hold in American history. His greatest fame will rest, not upon his apostolic labors, great as these were, but chiefly upon the salutary influence he exercised in and far beyond the confines of his own immense diocese of Charleston, by establishing and for years conducting with an ability amounting to genius, the first Catholic newspaper published entirely in English in the United States. Its publication imparted a far-reaching impetus to Catholic journalism.

The United States Catholic Miscellany was a weekly paper, the purpose of which was to uphold the cause of Ireland at home and of Irishmen abroad, and in particular to defend the Catholic religion throughout the world. It was printed on a large sheet of eight pages, and contained twenty-four columns of reading matter. Into its pages, for years, the bishop poured the seemingly inexhaustible treasures of his well-stored mind. Few men have written more than Dr. England, and very few have exhibited such evenness of logic, grace of style, or such broad erudition. Articles from his pen embrace almost every conceivable topic that would be of interest at that period.

These writings were collected and published after his death by Dr. Reynolds, his successor, and they have ever been regarded as among the choicest literary possessions of the American church. In the course of half a century these volumes have become rare, and under the editorship of his Grace, Archbishop Messmer, of Milwaukee, the Arthur H. Clark Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, has published a new edition of the works. Most of the writings of Bishop England were in the form of letters to his paper, either signed by his own name, or written under a nom de plume. In every case the letters were continued until the subject defended was exhausted. As an example of the thoroughness of his literary work, on the subject of the Catholic doctrine of Transubstantiation he writes no less than twenty-one letters which occupy two hundred and thirty-one pages of the first volume of the new edition. The work is replete with information on doctrinal, ecclesiastical, historical and literary subjects, with papers on travel, countries, peoples, and many other topics. All give evidence of the bishop's marvelous versatility, as well as his profound and general scholarship.

There are no better sources than these works of Bishop England to which to go for a true summary of the conditions which confronted the pioneers of Catholicity in the United States in the early part of the last century. The literary, historical and theological value of these writings is attested by nearly the whole hierarchy of America. So great a storehouse of information, by the very reason of its abundance, would lose much of its real value were it not for the painstaking work of His Grace of Milwaukee and his corps of assistants, who have supplied us with no less than seventy-one double column pages of indices.

The field and time of Bishop England's apostolic ministrations were not inviting, but as seen in these volumes, we have in this remarkable prelate a brilliant example of what may be accomplished with the pen by one zealous priest animated with zeal for souls and equipped mentally and morally for the great work Providence intended him to accomplish.

J. E. COPUS, S.J.

Mélanges Japonais. Sixième année—janvier 1909. Librairie Sansaïska, Tokyo, Japan.

Published in Tokyo under the auspices of the Catholic missionaries, Mélanges Japonais of last October has an exhaustive criticism of Gotama's Immyo, which antedates the syllogism invented by Aristotle and was therefore supposed by some modern Orientalists to have suggested the latter. L. Balet showed how the Buddhist pseudo-syllogism is utterly lacking in that grasp of general notions which constitutes the distinctive merit of the Aristotelian syllogism, and went on to point out that this Gotaman scheme of reasoning, being indefinite and inconclusive, is responsible for much of that mistiness and imprecision which characterizes the average Japanese thinker and which is gradually being cleared away by the cloud-dispelling influence of the positive and precise Occidental mind.

The January number of this learned review opens with the history and present status of the Konko sect, a modern phase of Shintoism. The founder of this sect died in 1883 at the age of sixty-nine. His followers were officially ranked as Shintoists in 1885; but, as their doctrines did not agree with Shintoism, they became independent in 1900, and have since steadily grown in numbers. The writer of this clear and interesting article, J. B. Duthu, attributes this temporary success to the shrewd common sense of the peasant Bunjiro, who, finding his countrymen worn out by the load of superstitious fears laid upon their shoulders by the accumulated myths of past centuries, openly proclaimed that there was no real cause for their childish terrors, that the five elements of Chinese philosophy, viz., metal, wood, water, fire and earth, were not, as had hitherto been believed, at war with each other, that there was no such thing as lucky and unlucky days, and especially that the god Konjin, who dwells in all metals and whom all the Shintoists had hitherto striven to avoid if they were laymen, and to exploit if they were bonzes, as the most terrible and horrible of divinities, was really full of love for mankind.

Bunjiro, who by dint of self-deluding spiritual exercises had attained to the ecstatic condition in 1853, at the age of thirty-nine, then gave out that he was the chosen representative through whom the heart of Konjin was to manifest itself directly to men. He was to inaugurate the reign of love and faith. There was to be no more shuddering consultation of the calendar to see if unlucky days would not interfere with building, work in the fields, marriage contracts and innumerable other details of daily life. Away with fear! Life is at last free.

The mysticism of Bunjiro, who now changed his name to Konko (metallic sheen or the splendor of metal, i. e., illuminated by the god of metals, Konjin), bears a striking resemblance to modernism in that it relies on sentiment for its knowledge of the Divinity. Chinese philosophy, with its theories on the heart, has brought this method of acquiring knowledge into favor in the dreamy East. Granted that the heart is the only organ capable of attaining to the truth, then by the heart alone can man approach the Infinite. Thus imagination, which is the heart's dominant partner, leads the poor intellect captive and points out the way to truth. Reflexion is condemned as impious. Religious excitement and mystic frenzy are dignified with the name of faith.

Shallow and unreasonable as this mysticism is, it struck a responsive note in Japan, where most of the peasants have no other religious practices than those which tend to allay their superstitious dread of the terrible Konjin. Many of these simple peasants were delighted to be at length freed from those endless formalities required to propitiate the invisible world. It was a great triumph for Konko when, in 1872, an imperial edict abolished the old calendar with its lucky and unlucky days and adopted the Gregorian calendar. For almost the only original idea in Konko's system was the denial of any malevolent intentions on the part of Konjin and the consequent disappearance of the ill-luck bugbear. Konjin was henceforth to be loved as the god of good luck.

Konko, who could neither read nor write, communicated orally to his disciples eighty-two maxims which they now explain or amplify to their taste. Among the Konko maxims thus developed—and it is impossible to verify the original message of the founder—are to be noted a few Christian ideas, such as the forgiveness of injury and patient trust in Konjin during persecution. These ideas are probably borrowed from the teachings of the Christian world by friends of progress. Despite the elements of truth which the Konko sect holds, Mr. Duthu thinks it will not last long because it has no ritual, no exterior worship of any kind.

There are, in this number of the Mélanges, five other instructive papers, all on Japanese life, and all deserving careful perusal by students of that unconventional civilization; but the limits of our space permit of but one quotation from the last article, "Japoneries d'Automne." The following passage, at the very beginning of the article, is a decidedly clever sketch of that most interesting of Oriental nations:

"Japan is ready to believe itself and would like to be the centre of the world. This is, to say the least, a noble ambition: the English have it, the Germans have it, the French have it, and naturally the Americans. What is certain is that Japan has become a power to be reckoned with, a first-class power. That does not win her more love, probably less; but Bismarck cared less to make his country loved than feared and respected by outsiders, and the Japanese, as a nation, are proud of being strong, proud of being feared. Unhappily, or rather happily for them, they have not the iron cuirass of the terrible chancellor. For the Japanese is a sentimental being, an impressionable being.

"This nation of warriors is also a womanly nation (une nation-femme). . . . Japan wants to be loved, this is incontestable, and its smile is not an artificial smile: see the reception Japan gave to the American fleet, to Hedin the explorer; see the spontaneous generosity it shows to the victims of the Sicilian earthquake, in spite of the precarious state of its finances! It is one of the drawbacks of our age, alas! that questions of sentiment must be relegated to the background in this busy world, and nations as well as individuals who wish to make themselves conspicuous must needs listen to the groans of those whom they bruise as they elbow their way to the front."

Reviews and Magazines

In a second paper on Historic Phases of Socialism in The Irish Ecclesiastical Record, the editor, Rev. Dr. John F. Hogan, deals with "Socialism and Protestantism and Socialism and the Eighteenth Century Revolution." He finds no great difficulty in linking the story of Luther's rebellion with the sowing of the original seeds of Modern Socialism. Anarchy was introduced into the Christian organization, since, in Luther's revolt, each individual was to be a law unto himself. Subversive doctrines applied to the Church to-day are applied to the State to-morrow, and when men began to exercise private judgment, without reference to the guiding light of the Church, they made strange and contradictory discoveries. The Anabaptists speedily found, for instance, that "property was a myth," and even Luther's friends wrote him that the cruel outrages of the "Peasants' War" which followed were but the fruits of his principles.

Little wonder, then, that we should find modern socialists proclaiming their indebtedness to those disruptive principles which levelled religion and practically made every man his own pontiff, and that they should recognize as their ancestors the founders of the Reformation. Step by step Dr. Hogan traces the justice of this recognition as he follows the years in which the evolution of Luther's principle made headway in religion in Germany, in philosophy in England and in politics in France.

In the second portion of his paper the author gives a luminous exposition of Rousseau's "Contrat Social," which in its central doctrine that the majority can regulate rights and confer them at its pleasure, provided it does so in the interests of equality, found ready application in the days of the French Revolution. In an unusually keen analysis of the historical growth of its principles Dr. Hogan grants that the development does not connote socialism in the modern sense of collectivism; but he points out how it is essentially socialistic in its fundamental principle, and not only makes collectivism possible, but naturally leads to it.

In McClure's Magazine for June a scathing indictment is presented of the present day Tammany Hall system and the methods by which the machine retains its hold on New York City. George Kibbe Turner, a writer already well known through his picturesque sketching of alleged political corruption in Chicago, asserts that the Tammany organization has not won honestly more than one city election since 1892, that it is directly in league with the worst elements of the underworld and that its power is based on the help which the lawless classes give to it at election. One may question whether any considerable good results from papers of the kind, in which there is much assertion and little proof. That there is corruption of a nauseous sort in the political life of our large cities is unfortunately a fact to which no one can be blind. But a parade of wild charges, drawn frequently from startling headlines and unproved assertions of sensational newspapers opposed to political leaders can have little effect in the working of a cure.

"The Animal Mind From the Inside" is an exceptionally clear development of the thesis which Mr. Brewster lays down in his opening paragraph. "Animals do not reason. If any truth has come out of all the critical study of the animal mind that has been going on since this century came in, this is it. Animals do not reason; they never have reasoned; they never by any possibility can reason. The wisest of them do, indeed, get into the border-land that separates reasoning from other mental processes; but no living creature, except man, ever gets unequivocally across the line." The clearer his exposition of this thesis, however, the more one wonders at the lack of common sense the author manifests in a secondary thought contained in the paper. By a curious failure to grasp the distinction between explicit and implicit reasoning, between intuition and deduction Mr. Brewster following the "new psychology," whatever that may be, endeavors to show that "reasoning is a somewhat uncommon process" even among us men.

"The Conservation of the Defective Child," presents an interesting survey of the aid rendered to the mental development of so-called "mentally deficient" children by the knowledge that has come to us through the laboratory work of experimental psychologists such as Dr. Witmer, of the University of Pennsylvania and others of his school.

Mr. Taft's paper on "Judicial Decisions as an Issue in Politics" is, as he tells us in a word of introduction, the first of two articles on this topic prepared at the request of Mr. McClure after the convention of last summer and before the electoral campaign had been actively begun. As might be expected the President's discussion of his own labor decisions whilst acting as Judge of the Superior Court of Cincinnati and later as United States Circuit Judge, is a calm and able study of the points involved.

The apparent contradiction between the verbal permission granted by the Holy Father to the Archbishop of Milwaukee with regard to women in the Gallery choir and the formal letter of the Papal Secretary of State, is explained in Church Music for May. No general dispensation from the "Motu Proprio" has been granted to the United States or elsewhere in respect to women; however, when the singing of High Mass becomes impossible without their assistance, women might be permitted in the choir under certain conditions. When the Archbishop represented that it was impossible at present to have male choirs in many country parishes, or children capable of singing at liturgical services, and that it would take years to accustom the people to congregational singing, the Holy Father replied that under these circumstances women's voices might be retained, provided good behavior was maintained and theatrical or worldly music excluded. It is clear from the Cardinal-Secretary's letter to Bishop Canevin that this favor is granted temporarily and only where circumstances make the full execution of the decree impossible.

In the same number Mr. W. H. Grattan Flood concludes his instructive papers on "Church Music in Ireland." The Motu Proprio found Ireland in a receptive mood, and especially Dublin, where by direction of Archbishop Walsh, a boys' choir had been singing the Solesmes Chant for years. The entrusting of the Vatican Edition of Liturgical music books to the Solesmes Benedictines "was cordially received in Ireland, the birthplace of St. Gall, whose monks founded a world-famed school for the cultivation of music and the transcribing of liturgical music books." Plain chant has been sedulously taught and practised in Maynooth, All Hallows and most of the diocesan seminaries and colleges. Mr. Grattan Flood recommends a training school, preferably at Maynooth, for Catholic organists and choirmasters. Such a school should prove a "nursery of church musicians who would be fully equipped to execute the provisions of the Motu Proprio."

The Allgemeine Rundschau, in No. 17, defends the Dominicans against the charge of having caused the death of Jeanne d'Arc. The fact is that only one Dominican was present at the sessions of the ecclesiastical court, and it was a Dominican who whispered to her to appeal to the Pope. When twenty years later the acts of the process were revised nobody was more active to see the maid vindicated than the Dominicans.

A German, who resided for many years in China, writes on the Yellow Peril question. "Civilization in China will mean disruption of the Empire. There is too much hatred between the provinces. The Chinese learn not only the virtues of the Europeans but also their vices. Europeans not only teach Orientals how a race can become great, they vaccinate them also with the virus of decay."

SOCIOLOGY

When an Englishman of some prominence recently attacked the Irish priesthood for alleged indifference to their country's industrial development and the economic advancement of their people, Mr. Stephen Gwynn, M.P., made a very effective reply. He showed that the priest was behind the convent and cottage industries, which are finding profitable employment for thousands of girls in the poorest districts, and that in nearly every local enterprise, cooperative or otherwise, the priest was the initiator, adviser and mainstay. He emphasized particularly the work of Father Dooley in his own parliamentary district of Galway. The following letter from the manager of the Manufacturing Co. that Father Dooley inaugurated throws light on many similar enterprises in Ireland during recent years:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

About fourteen years ago it occurred to Father Dooley that the space occupied by an old flour mill might be turned into a woolen factory. He consulted the Bishop on the matter and they both went to work with very small capital; in fact $12,500 was the sum on which they started, employing twenty-five hands. To-day the place is worth $200,000, employing 150 hands, using nothing but Irish wool, which means that $40,000 annually is given to the farmers around Galway for their wool. The wages paid amount to about $500 weekly, which must bring comfort to many a home in Galway. These people would be badly in need were it not for money earned by the young women and boys, who would be without employment were it not for the woolen mill. This company is regularly paying an 8 per cent. dividend, thereby showing the Irish people that if they had only confidence in themselves, they could invest their money to their own and their country's advantage.

Father Dooley and the Bishop have also started a hosiery factory adjacent to the woolen mill, which gives employment to sixty young girls; this is altogether managed by Father Dooley, merely to give much needed employment in Galway, while the woolen mill is a public company. The products of both places find a ready sale all over the world, particularly those of the woolen mills, on whose books are the names of traders in Germany, America, Australia, but the bulk of the trade is with London and other parts of England. A large quantity of woollens is also sent to Scotland. We could supply a much larger demand from America.

THOS. MURRAY, Manager.

A postscript from the venerable Father Dooley, whose eighty years have not slackened his energies, indicates some of the causes that have made his enterprises prosper.

"The success of this effort is mainly due to the great ability and special talents of Mr. Murray, the manager, who is a Tipperary man, an excellent Catholic, and a total abstainer. Nearly all the workers follow the example of the manager. Nearly all are monthly communicants."

As illustrating the development of Canada, the fact has been recently observed that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, of Toronto, builders and proprietors of the Canadian Northern Railway, now control a railway system extending over five thousand miles, to which they propose to add this summer five hundred miles through the wheat fields of the Northwest. To complete their transcontinental project of uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, Sir William Mackenzie declares that they will have to build only one 500-mile gap to connect their eastern and western lines and another 500-mile gap to the Pacific. With a view to this latter achievement the enterprising firm has already surveyed a route through the Yellow Head Pass in the Rocky Mountains. There is also a scheme on foot, or so it is rumored, to construct three hundred miles of railway between Montreal and Boston, thus making the latter city the eastern outlet of the C. N. R., the other winter ports being already occupied by the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk. It may be of interest to our readers to learn that, although Sir William Mackenzie does not belong to the household of the Faith, Lady Mackenzie and all the children are Catholics.

The German government taxation scheme which put the main burden on the poor and middle classes is persistently opposed by a majority, consisting principally of the Conservatives and the Centre. On the latter party a correspondent of the New York Evening Post (May 24) remarks: "If he gives way to the Conservatives, Bülow can hardly face the Reichstag again, for his surrender will have been to the Clerical enemy. . . . Ever since the Reichstag was dissolved on a flimsy colonial pretext, the real object being to break the Centre supremacy in the House, that great party has bided its time. Now its hour of triumph is near. . . . Strictly internal, as this financial question seems to be, it may yet have an entirely unforeseen influence on the politics of the world. The Centre party in Germany is the only party really in favor of some arrangement for the restriction of armaments, and once it comes back to power it will use its influence to oppose the introduction of another huge navy bill which should fall due in 1912. It was the Centre which Admiral von Tirpitz had to combat in former years when the development of the German navy had hardly begun, so it is on the cards that Germany's financial troubles may exercise a wholly incalculable influence on the future trend of German policy."

The Centre party should not be called the "Clericals." No other party is so perfectly representative of the people. It is the only one in the Reichstag in which the duke and the workingman sit side by side. Neither its principles nor its practice exclude Protestants and Jews.

It is very gratifying to learn from the pen of a Deputy of the Prussian Landtag that by far the larger part of the mining population of Prussia does not believe in Socialism. In the Ruhr District, on the borders of Rhineland and Westphalia, one-third of the miners are Socialists; but in the large iron, copper and lead mines of Siegen in the south of Westphalia, in the coal mines of Silesia and other important mining regions the Socialists are a weak body. Along the Saar, on the confines of Lorraine and the Rhineland, where the Government owns many mines, the Socialists spent thousands of dollars to gain a foothold; they started two papers, but they failed. Their efforts were frustrated by the Christian Unions, which unite both Catholics and Protestants for the fight against Socialism. The Christian Unions number more than 10,000 members in that region. Lately Pope Pius recommended that the Catholics should combine their forces with non-Catholics against the common enemy.

Lady Aberdeen will lecture at the Catholic Club, New York, on the evening of Saturday, June 5, on what is being done in Ireland to stamp out tuberculosis.

Chicago capitalists are interested in a project to bring a colony from Italy during the coming year, which will be settled in the Southwest on small irrigation farms. A colony of about two hundred Italians was established some time ago in Colorado on irrigated farms. They were successful from the beginning, and since their arrival in America many have largely increased their holdings. Because of their success the project appeals to the Chicagoans, who are operating with a number of wealthy men of Milan, Italy. These latter have agreed to loan the colonists sufficient money to establish themselves on their farms. Representatives of this Italian syndicate have been in America looking over the proposed site for the colony.

Immigration which fell off for a time last year is, according to the official reports of the Commissioner, reaching normal again. From July, 1908, to May, 1909, inclusive, the net increase of population by this means was 165,483. During February it was 67,974. In April 116,754 immigrants were landed. Of these 89,042 were male and 27,712 were females, and during April 1,283 aliens were turned away. Three times as many immigrants reached the United States in April of this year as in April one year ago. Southern Italy contributed the largest number of aliens, 34,856 from that section of Italy, while from Northern Italy came but 4,504. There were 10,798 Polish immigrants, 6,762 Scandinavians, 5,821 Irish and 4,817 English, other portions of the globe contributing varying numbers; Japan among others contributing 223. One Pacific Islander is recorded. From 1820 to June 30, 1908, the total of the immigrants landed here is 26,100,937.

The American Consul at New Brunswick reports that negotiations for a commercial treaty between Canada and Germany have advanced to a favorable stage. Under the proposed treaty Canada will grant reductions on imports from Germany of high-class textile products, and Germany, in return, will grant to Canada reduced rates on agricultural implements and agricultural products. Heretofore, as the Consul points out, Great Britain enjoyed the advantage of bringing her goods to Canada under the preferential tariff, while Germany was compelled to pay a surtax over and above the duties under the general tariff schedule. The new treaty will promote more friendly commercial intercourse between the two countries.

The Catholic Congress held in May at Oaxaca, Mexico, made the following recommendations to mine owners and employers of mine-workers.

- (1) The age of employees shall be not less than fifteen or exceed fifty-five years.
- (2) The maximum of labor per day shall be nine hours; for those who work from 3,000 to 5,000 feet beneath the surface, eight hours; and for lower depths, seven hours. Mines should be closed on Sunday.
- (3) Dynamite should not be overcharged with glycerine or exceed a potency of 40 per cent., nor should entrance be permitted soon after an explosion.
- (4) There should be a double exit and frequent inspection of machinery.
- (5) A prudent and zealous chaplain should be in charge of the native miners, who are all Catholics. There should be also provided a Catholic school for each sex, and honest recreation on Sundays and Holidays. Moreover the Congress suggests that the pastor of mining parishes give the miners frequent and practical instruction.

SCIENCE

That electricity should be used in an astronomical observatory for lighting not only the building but also the various parts of the instruments, such as the circles, the reading microscopes, and even the wires in the field of view; and that it should be applied to turning the dome, to raising and lowering the floor of the observing room, and even to moving the large telescope about and directing it upon a particular celestial object, are well known facts to all that have ever visited a large observatory. But it may come, perhaps, as a surprise even to professional astronomers to read in the Electrical Review and Western Electrician of April 10, which itself quotes from the Boston Transcript, that the electric motor has been applied in the Harvard Observatory to the direct propulsion of a large telescope in the motion with which it follows a star in its diurnal orbit and keeps its image immovably fixed upon a photographic plate. A telescope of this class must be turned about an axis parallel to the earth's axis of revolution, and is then said to be equatorially mounted. As this motion must be continuous and absolutely uniform, it was heretofore always produced by a clock which had a so-called conical pendulum, that is, a pendulum whose bob swung in a complete horizontal circle instead of in the vertical circular arc as we see in a common clock.

The only application of electricity to such a clock consisted in winding-up the driving weight and in controlling the pendulum. This latter effect was obtained, for example, by placing one or more small pieces of iron in the most rapidly revolving wheel of the clock, and allowing it or them to pass in close proximity to an electromagnet through which an electric current was made to flow at regular intervals under the control of a sidereal clock. When the wheel revolved too rapidly, it was held back by the magnet, and when it revolved too slowly it was accelerated, so that its motion could be made very uniform. Such a driving clock is said to be electrically controlled, the true driving force being an ordinary weight. But in the new arrangement, which is now used at the Harvard Observatory, and which entirely replaces the usual driving clock, an electric motor is directly connected to the driving gear of the telescope. The current supplied to this motor is controlled by the sidereal clock as well as by the telescope itself in such a way that a flywheel on it is given well-timed impulses and by being thus set in absolutely uniform rotation, communicates its motion to the telescope.

The chief advantages of this new driving mechanism are its simplicity, its automatic controlling devices and its elimination of the expensive and cumbrous old form of driving clock.

This new method had been in such successful use in the Harvard Observatory for about a year on a 24-inch reflecting telescope, that it was applied lately to the propulsion of the large 60-inch telescope. This telescope is at present the largest in the world. While Lord Rosse's instrument in Ireland has indeed an aperture of 72 inches, it is not mounted in a modern way and can follow a celestial object only for about an hour or so on either side of the meridian. Its mirror moreover is made of speculum metal, which cannot be polished when tarnished except by practically regrinding it. The Harvard 60-inch, like all modern reflecting telescopes, is made of glass which is silvered on the outside. The silver on the hard glass can be polished without injury and can be renewed by chemical means. But as a 60-inch mirror must be made about a foot thick in order to retain its shape unimpaired, it weighs several tons. To lighten the weight in the bearings, the mirror is mounted in a steel tube which partially floats in water. This 60-inch concave mirror receives the light of a star from a second and plane mirror which may be directed to any part of the heavens, and then sends it along the polar axis, at the lower end of which it is rigidly mounted and about which it is made to turn into an eyepiece permanently adjusted upon a table in a closed room, so that the astronomer may remain in the same position and in a comfortable temperature at all seasons and for all stars. He can there electrically direct his telescope to any heavenly body and see its exact position indicated upon proper dials.

As the mechanical difficulties of this form of mounting are reduced far below that of other forms, astronomers may confidently look in the near future to an ever-increasing size in their telescopes. The contract has already been signed for a 100-inch mirror for the Mount Wilson Solar Observatory in California, and although the large glass delivered has proved to be defective upon grinding, another will soon replace it.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The science of astronomy is making such rapid progress that it is continually calling for an increase in the size of its telescopes. This increase in size gives rise to new problems in optical and mechanical construction, in the handling and moving of the instrument, in its mounting and in its housing, and even in the care to be taken of it when not in actual use.

Telescopes, as we know, are divided into two general classes. One of these is the refractor, in which the parallel rays of light coming from a star, are brought to a focus by means of a lens. This lens must be achromatic, that is, it must consist of two lenses of unequal density, the second of which undoes the dispersion or color separation caused by the first without destroying its refraction, which is the essential function of a lens and which gives this type of telescope its name. As the dispersion caused by various kinds of glass is neither uniform nor even proportionate, is irrational as opticians call it, it is impossible in principle for one lens to undo perfectly the color separation of another, that is, it is impossible in principle to construct a lens that shall be perfectly achromatic and absolutely free from color, that shall not add to the image any color effect of its own. Hence all that an astronomer can require of an optician, is that he shall combine into a common focus certain two colors or spectral lines which he may select and which shall unite to form an image that is practically achromatic. The optician may thus succeed in producing an image whose visual or photographic distinctness leaves nothing to be desired, but whose coloring is so strong as to highly disappoint an unprofessional observer.

As this color effect increases with the size of the lens, there is good reason for the saying that the practical size limit of lenses has been reached. Moreover, as the achromatic lens has four surfaces to be ground instead of one, the expense of its construction is increased in proportion. However, as such a lens transmits more light than a mirror of equal size reflects, as the whole aperture of the lens is used without the obstruction of secondary mirrors or lenses, as a lens seldom deteriorates and is always ready for use, as the telescope is pointed directly at the object aimed at, and for other technical reasons, refractors will always remain in favor, and are actually preferred to reflectors by many professional astronomers.

The second class of telescopes is called the reflector, because the parallel rays of a star are reflected to a focus by means of a mirror. This mirror was formerly made of speculum metal, a certain alloy consisting of two parts of copper to one of tin, which however, when tarnished could hardly be repolished without injury to its shape. Modern mirrors are made of glass silvered on the outside. When this silver tarnishes it can be easily brightened or renewed. A mirror is much less expensive than a lens of equal size, and is superior to a lens inasmuch as it has but one surface to be ground, and this surface reflects all rays of whatever kind, visual as well as photographic, to a common focus, and is thus in principle as well as in practice perfectly achromatic. There is, therefore, no size limit. For these reasons the largest telescopes of a century ago were all reflectors. Herchel's largest telescope had an aperture of 48 inches, and Lord Rosse's of 72 inches. Then as the making of large lenses progressed, refractors gradually forged to the front until they reached an aperture of 40 inches in the Yerkes telescope. Now reflectors are again increasing in size. The Harvard and Mount Wilson reflectors are 60 inches, and an order has already been given for a 100-inch on Mount Wilson in California.

In the Yerkes' telescope the moving parts weigh 20 tons. This includes the enormous counterpoise necessary to balance the 6-ton telescope. In the Mount Wilson telescope there is no counterpoise. Fully 95 per cent. of its 23 tons is taken off the bearings of the polar axis by a hollow disk of steel 10 feet in diameter and 2 feet thick, which partially dips into a castiron trough filled with mercury. This trough is so well made that there is a space of only about one-eighth of an inch between it and the steel disk. But even with this precaution the mercury in the trough weighs 650 pounds.

The dome which covers the telescope is of light steel construction. It is 58 feet in diameter. The walls are of sheet steel and are double, about two feet apart, the outer one serving merely as a protection against the heat of the sun. The dome for this same reason is overlaid with a system of steel pipes about two feet above the surface, upon which canvas may be stretched, while the inside is lined with granulated cork. During the day the dome is closed air-tight, and cool air, of the expected right temperature, is made to circulate about the great mirror. About an hour after sunset, 16 sheet-metal windows in the side walls, 12 trap doors in the floor, and the great slit 16 feet wide and 45 feet long, are opened together in order to equalize the temperature.

The design of the whole instrument, as well as the actual figuring of its great mirror, is due to G. W. Ritchey, from whose article in the April number of the Astro-physical Journal these items have been taken. The heavier iron parts were made by the Union Iron Works Company of San Francisco, but the final finishing, as well as the mounting, was done in the machine shop in Pasadena belonging to the Observatory.

No one can read Mr. Ritchey's account of his work on the mirror, which was published by the Smithsonian Institution in 1904, Vol. XXXIV, No. 1495, nor of his construction of a complete 24-inch reflecting telescope at the Yerkes' Observatory and of the exquisite photographs he secured with it, without feeling convinced that this giant 60-inch reflector is the crowning effort of his life, and that he, better than any other living man, will use it with a success worthy of himself and of the instrument.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The catalogue of "The Wheeler Gift" of books, pamphlets and periodicals in the Library of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, edited by William D. Weaver, with an introduction and descriptive and critical notes by Brother Potamian, Sc.D., Lond., Professor of Physics at Manhattan College, has just been issued by the American Institute of Electrical Engineers in New York. "The Wheeler Gift" consists of the very remarkable collection of electrical books made by the late Mr. Latimer Clark of London which Mr. Wheeler in his deed of gift rightly declares to be the most complete electrical library in the world. He adds that "there are among its 7,000 titles many books which are not to be found in either of the famous libraries with which it has been compared and there are even some of the earliest examples of printing." As will be readily understood this library is a distinct contribution to American science, and it was only fitting that the books should be properly catalogued and that the catalogue should call attention to the comparative value of the books and to the special feature of each of them to students of electrical courses.

The work of annotation has been thoroughly accomplished by Brother Potamian, and anyone who has to consult the catalogue will agree with the editor in the preface that "it is difficult to find terms in which to express adequately the debt of gratitude that the members of the institute owe to Brother Potamian for his devoted labor in their behalf as represented by the descriptive and critical notes accompanying the title entries of the catalogue." The catalogue is really a bibliographical history of electricity. Brother Potamian has made it a point to note in every case the works by Catholic clergymen that are of distinct value in the history of electricity, a fact not discoverable elsewhere.

Abbé Menon and Abbé Nollet who made the first experiments on the effect of electricity on animals and plants, Professor George Gordon, the Benedictine, who was the first to use a cylinder of glass in order to produce frictional electricity and who invented the first electric chime, Father Kircher, S.J., who wrote several striking books on magnetism, Father Divisch who almost at the same time as Franklin drew lightning from the clouds, Father Strada, S.J., who described a sympathetic telegraph by which friends using a pair of magnetic dials with letters on them were able to communicate at a distance, are typical examples. Many other interesting features of electricity were thus illustrated in the works of these clerical amateurs and professors in the science of electricity.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—The clergy and laity of the Archdiocese of Mexico have formed a society, modeled on the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul. It will consist of active and honorary members; the former meeting fortnightly. The dues will be optional and secret, each member contributing what he pleases to the common treasury. The Patrons are Our Lady of Guadalupe, St. Joseph and St. Vincent de Paul. The visitation of the sick is a special feature. Several well-known medical practitioners have offered their services gratuitously. The society has the warm approval and support of Mgr. Mora, the Archbishop of Mexico.

—More than 2,000 friends gathered at the dock on May 20 to say good-bye to the members of the Alumni Association of the North American College, Rome, who headed by the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Falconio and Archbishop Farley, left to attend the golden jubilee celebration which will take place in June.

—The Brooklyn Navy Yard, the largest naval station in the country, was the scene on Sunday, May 23, of the annual military Mass for the soldier and sailor dead. The U. S. marines, sailors from the warships, delegations from the local militia, civic societies and civilians made up a congregation of 12,000 persons who were ranged twenty deep on the three sides in front of the temporary altar erected on the parade ground. The Rev. Eugene McDonald, U. S. N., Chaplain of the receiving ship Hancock, was the celebrant of the Mass. The Rev. John P. Chidwick, who was on the Maine when she was blown up in Havana harbor, now rector of St. Ambrose, Manhattan, was deacon, and the Rev. Matthew C. Gleason, Chaplain of the Connecticut, was the sub-deacon. The Rev. John F. Nash, rector of the Church of the Sacred Heart, whose parish includes the navy yard, was the master of ceremonies.

The Rev. John L. Belford, rector of the Church of the Nativity, Brooklyn, preached the sermon. He told the navy men and the members of the military organizations that peace cannot be hoped for as long as human nature is what it seems to be, but that it was the thing that a nation of the righteous must work for and keep.

—The Archbishop of Westminster has been invited to celebrate the pontifical Mass in the Cathedral at Rheims, on July 19, when the celebration in honor of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc will take place.

—It is proposed to complete the crypt in the Church of San Silvestro in Cassite, Rome, as a memorial to the late Rev.

William Whitmee, P.S.M., who was for many years stationed there. Cardinal Vanutelli, Archbishop Stonor and Archbishop O'Connell are at the head of a committee asking the English-speaking Catholics to become specially interested in this work.

—The Maryland Pilgrims' Association celebrated the 275th anniversary of the landing of the Calvert colonists in Maryland on May 23. An improvised altar was constructed near the Jesuit villa at St. Inigoes and solemn high Mass was celebrated in the presence of the Pilgrims and people from the surrounding country. The Rev. F. X. Brady, S.J., president of Loyola College, was celebrant. The sermon was preached by Father Matthews, of St. Inigoes. The procession from the steamer that carried Pilgrims from Baltimore was headed by a cross-embazoned banner. The Naval Academy band played and a large choir composed of picked singers from Baltimore churches sang the music of the Mass. Following the Mass there was a civic celebration in Old St. Mary's city. The address of welcome was delivered by C. S. Grason of St. Mary's and an address on "The Early Maryland Settlers" was delivered by Judge Charles W. Heuissler of Baltimore.

—A large tablet erected to the memory of the pioneers and explorers, Father Marquette and Louis Joliet, by the Franco-American colony of Chicago, Ill., was unveiled there, on May 17. It is set on the "high ground" where Father Marquette spent the winter of 1674.

—The Rev. John C. Burke, director of the mission work among the colored people, is vigorously promoting a scheme to secure one hundred thousand persons, each subscribing one dollar every year for a fund to erect and maintain schools and churches for the propagation of the Faith among the nine millions of colored people in the United States.

—The will of the late Rev. John Gruender, of Loose Creek, Mo., bequeaths $25,000 to Archbishop Glennon for the new cathedral in St. Louis; and $25,000 to the Immaculate Conception Church, of which he was pastor.

—On May 13 the cornerstone was laid of a new addition to the Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis., by the Right Rev. J. J. Schwebach, Bishop of La Crosse. Addresses were made by the Very Rev. Rudolph J. Meyer, Provincial of the Missouri Province of the Society of Jesus; the Rev. Rob. B. Condon, of La Crosse, and Mgr. Abbelen, of Milwaukee. The latter said: "Since my own college days which are now nearly fifty years past, I never more keenly regretted any event than the temporary closing of this college in 1838, and so you can imagine how joyfully I greeted its reopening in 1898, and how happy I feel over the cornerstone laying of the new building of a college which bids fair to be one of the finest and grandest of the entire Northwest." After speaking with enthusiasm on the education given in Catholic colleges, he encouraged the students to become, by their conduct, the advertisers of their Alma Mater and to bring it about that the new building might be soon too small for the numbers that flocked to the historical place, which was hallowed, if not by the footprints, at least by the very near approach of Father Marquette on his route of discovery.

—The largest diocese in the world is the Archdiocese of Mohilew, which comprises all Russia outside of Poland and the vast territory of Siberia. It has about a million Catholics, fifty thousand of whom are scattered over the thirty-five million square miles of Siberia. The Archbishop resides in St. Petersburg. Until recently Siberia has never had the benefit of a canonical visitation. It was therefore an important event when on April 30, the Auxiliary Bishop of Mohilew set out to visit the Catholics of Siberia. It means a journey across the continent of Asia. To invoke the protection of the Almighty for the perilous undertaking a pontifical High Mass was celebrated, attended by the clergy and all the prominent Catholics of the city. A large crowd assembled at the railroad station when the Bishop with his companions boarded the train. The government put a parlor car at his disposal for the whole trip.

EDUCATION

A very important innovation has been made for the "Abitür," the final examination of the Prussian Gymnasium. Those who know of the rigor with which this greatest act in the life of a Prussian student was carried on will be surprised to learn the way in which "compensation" of the different branches is now permissible. The new regulation says: "The examination is passed if the average results obtained in the obligatory branches is pronounced 'satisfactory.'" The board of examiners is free, however, to use their own judgment in accepting satisfactory results in optional branches as compensation for deficiency in obligatory branches.

Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis., will have a summer school opening on June 28. The courses will include elementary history, elementary mathematics, French, German, general chemistry, analytical chemistry, higher mathematics, drawing and surveying. Instructions will be given in day and night sessions, and the students may enroll in both. The summer school will last eight weeks.

ART

At the Colony Club owners and dealers have arranged several salons of eighteenth century French art. Great interest attaches to the objects loaned by members as many of them come from the Royal Palaces of France and a few bear the monograms of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette. Tapestries, furniture, and bibelots predominate, but sculpture by Houdon and panels by Boucher appertain to the fine arts.

Twenty-one Tanagra figures, donated by Mr. A. A. Healy, are to be seen at the Brooklyn Institute. Coming in great part from the Lecuyer sale (1905) and having been catalogued by competent authorities, they are probably authentic—a fact of which one may sometimes doubt concerning Tanagras. There is a great fascination about these lovely little forms, with their sharp edges rubbed off and their rare plastic impressions. Some have traces of polychrome decoration. In the groups of boys and girls at play, the very breath of their own poets seems to sway the beautiful Greek heads to rhythmic movement and to wave among the fluttered draperies.

ECONOMICS

Forestry is attracting wide attention among the schools of the United States. Not only have many colleges and universities introduced courses and even professional schools of forestry, but elementary phases of the subject have been introduced into hundreds of the graded and high schools, and teachers give enthusiastic reports of the success which is attending the new study. Public school teachers say that they have found in it a subject interesting to children, and one which furnishes much attractive, tangible material to work upon, developing the child's observation, and being at once acceptable to the young mind, and most practical.

Plans and specifications have been adopted for the "Phipps Institute for the Treatment and Cure of Tuberculosis" which will soon be built in Philadelphia and for which Henry Phipps of New York has given $1,250,000. The new building will be the best institution in design and equipment for the treatment of tuberculosis in the United States. The plans selected by Mr. Phipps and Dr. Flick provide for a structure unique in architecture. It will be three stories in height and constructed on the receding style, thus providing balconies on which patients may be kept outdoors, and each floor so exposed to the light that the light and ventilation of the floor below it will not be shut out or interfered with.

The entire front will be thus terraced, with a large roof garden crowning the structure. Dormitories for the nurses will occupy one of the wings and a museum and lecture room will be placed in the other. A garden will surround the institute. The laboratory will be equipped in the most complete manner and facilities for investigation provided which will bring men prominent in various branches of medicine from all parts of the world.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the recent meeting of the Catholic Union of Missouri, held in St. Louis, a resolution adopted at a meeting of St. Anthony's School Society of that city on May 2, 1909, was introduced to the effect that each congregation should establish a school society for the purpose of raising a fund, "by means of monthly contributions, gifts and legacies, eventually to make the parochial school practically a free school. The school society, however, should not attempt to meddle in the administration of our parochial schools."

During the debate on the resolution, Mr. Gustave L. Gortz, of St. Louis, laid before the delegates a comparative statement of the cost of conducting the public schools of St. Louis and the parochial school of Sts. Peter and Paul's congregation.

The report for the Sts. Peter and Paul school is for the year ending April 1, 1909, and shows an enrolment of 1,203 pupils, divided into nineteen classes. The salaries paid were to

Two Brothers of St. Mary @
$375.00	$750.00
Twenty-three Sisters Notre Dame
@ $300,000	6,900.00
Expenses for janitor, coal, light, taxes and insurance.....	2,762.00
Total	$10,412.00
The per capita cost for each child was $8.65.

This does not include the capital invested in buildings, amounting to at least $150,000, nor an indebtedness of $12,000, with interest accruing.

Of the 1,203 children enrolled, 295 were unable to pay for tuition, leaving 908 pupils who paid on an average fifty cents per month, or $5.00 annually, amounting in all to $4,540. Deducting this from the expenses, $10,412, there was a deficit of $5,872, to be covered by the congregation.

"Comparing the cost of maintaining Sts. Peter and Paul's Parochial Schools with the public school system of St. Louis," said Mr. Gortz, "I take the fifty-ninth report of the Public Schools of the State of Missouri for the year ending June 1, 1908, and on page 80 find: 'Children enrolled in St. Louis during the year, 86,877. Salaries paid, $1,870,223.80; per pupil, $21.52. Incidental expenses, coal, insurance, janitors, taxes, light, etc., $635,728; per pupil, $7.32. Total per pupil, $28.84. This would make for 1,203 pupils, the number enrolled in Sts. Peter and Paul's School, $34,694.52, whereas this school is run at an expense of $10,412, a difference of $24,282.52 over and above our cost.

If we had to pay salaries like those paid to teachers of the public schools and the heavy incidental expenses, we should have to close our parochial schools. Fortunately the Catholic Church has, for the training of the children, religious orders whose members take the vows of chastity, obedience and poverty, and while she has these devoted teachers there will be no danger of closing our parochial schools on account of the cost."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

A comparison between the cost of the parochial and the free school system, based upon the Census of 1899 for the State of New York was made a short time ago by His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons. The value of the school property, computed by the average attendance, was $117.00 per head; the cost of instruction, $21.00 per head; including the incidental expenses, $38.86 per head. The Catholics of New York as well as in all parts of this country pay their share for the maintenance of the public schools, besides educating 1,300,000 children in their parochial schools, without any aid whatsoever from the State. Taking New York's figures of cost of public schools as a basis, the Catholics save the country annually $50,000,000, or enough to build five men-of-war of the Dreadnought class. "And," says His Eminence, "if we take into consideration the value of the school property, estimated on that of New York, the Catholics have saved the country $1,000,000,000 alone since the Civil War by taking care of their own schools." S. L. M.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am heartily in accord with the substance of an article in your last issue on Children's Missions. Having had some experience in this species of work, I willingly add my quota in assisting to make so valuable a work known. Perhaps an outline of the method pursued in a triduum for children may be of interest.

The children are on the ground for the half past eight o'clock Mass, and remain until three, or half an hour later, during which time they are carried through five or six meditations or instructions. The first exercise takes place immediately after the Mass, and it sets the little ones talking and asking countless questions.

"How many in this church, if all died now, would appear before God with a title to Heaven?"

Then comes the explanation of "title;" their father's title to houses and land; and how these titles are kept in safes, and how men are employed by the insurance companies to examine titles and report if they are bad.

From this pass to the manner in which God generally gives a title—the baby is brought to the baptismal font, and here follows a description of the ceremony of baptizing, and then of the infusion of grace with the three precious jewels—Faith, Hope and Charity. A word about these three virtues and how the title may be lost leads the little ones to enquire if they have lost their title to Heaven. This instruction sobers children.

The End of Man and the End of Creatures come next, and the children are made to see that nothing in the world can impart the rest and happiness for which they crave. Since nothing in the world can give happiness we turn to God and find out that He has shown people, both young and old, that there is just one way of securing perfect happiness, that is, by believing things, doing certain things, and by using certain helps. Here follows a series of questions: What things are to be believed? Why? What things must be done? What helps must be used? The children learn that the Creed tells us what to believe; that the Commandments tell us what to do; and that prayer and the Sacraments are the great helps. Three instructions on the Creed are given. Article after article is taken up and many sins against Faith are pointed out.

There are many ways of doing this interestingly. One will take a boy on his way to school. A tall gentleman meets the youngster and asks what he is studying. Then may follow a skilful dialogue. Some questions are put to the children before they leave for recess, and during that time they strive to get the answers. After the Creed has been well explained, meditations or instructions are given on the sin of the Angels, on our First Parents' sin, the sin of a boy, or a girl, who deliberately misses Mass on Sunday and dies suddenly. Then follows the practical conclusions which must be couched in language easily understood by the children. The Commandments are taken up one by one, and the Second, Third, Sixth and Seventh emphasized.

Two meditations on Hell are given; one with proof from Scripture, insisting upon the fact that what God says is so, no matter what any man may say to the contrary; a second, an application of the senses, where much of the Creed is repeated. Here the sins against the Fourth and Sixth Commandment are insisted upon.

I will continue the subject later.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

. . . I beg to thank you sincerely for the copies of your new paper, AMERICA. I have read the first numbers with much interest, and I desire to congratulate you on the success which has attended your new venture. AMERICA is worthy of its name, and will, I am confident, not only continue the good work of its predecessor, but surpass it in usefulness and influence.—His Excellency, The Most Reverend Diomede Falconio, Apostolic Delegate, Washington, D. C.

. . . The undertaking will result in much good to the cause of holy religion.—Rt. Rev. H. J. Alerding, Bishop of Fort Wayne.

. . . AMERICA promises to be a very important and useful publication, and I hope it will do much good, and prevent much evil in correcting error, and setting forth the truth in its true colors.—Rt. Rev. T. Heslin, Bishop of Natchez, Miss.

. . . His Lordship is most pleased in seeing, by this first number, how fully your review, true to its program, will meet a want of the country, and how mightily it will help to create a plain and correct Catholic opinion.—Secretary, Rt. Rev. A. X. Bernard, D.D., St. Hyacinthe, Quebec.

. . . The Messenger was a very instructing publication, always treating of very important subjects, but you could not extend yourselves, and touch on the many important matters of the day. I congratulate you on the selection of the name, AMERICA; it will attract and move the non-Catholics to read it, and it will nullify the excuse of many lukewarm Catholics whose usual criticism of the average Catholic periodical is "There is nothing but religion in it."—Bishop Verdaguer, Laredo, Texas.

. . . The spirit and temper of the new weekly are admirable, while in contents and form it leaves little room for improvement. It is destined to wield an exceptional influence once its editorial machinery is in good working order, and it has had time to profit by the advice or suggestion of experienced friends. It ought soon to reach regularly every hamlet in our land as an excellent Catholic newsletter, and a sane and helpful commentary on current events and ideas.—Thos. J. Shahan, Pro-Rector Cath. Univ.

An excellent earnest of good things to come.

THOS. F. WOODLOCK. New York.

. . . I am only too pleased to avail myself of the privilege of having your new periodical sent to me.

Yours truly,

JESSIE M. H. BREWER, (Mrs. D. H.)
16 John St., Brookline, Mass.

Wishing you every possible success in this new undertaking and a long and prosperous life to our young AMERICA.

Yours most sincerely,

BROTHER CYRIL,
Assumption Community, Xaverian Brothers, East Boston, Mass.

. . . We are glad you have completed your arrangements for this new magazine, and hope your labors will be crowned with much success.

Very respectfully yours,

SISTER M. ALBERTUS,
Tyler School, Providence, R. I.

. . . I am delighted to become a charter subscriber, and wish you the greatest possible success in your new undertaking.

Very sincerely yours,

MRS. JOHN DEVLIN,
25 East 128th St., N. Y. City.

. . . It takes time and brains to help AMERICA. I have neither. Pass on. Did you ever see people suddenly fall asleep during a penny collection?

BROTHER HENRY.

Honolulu, S. I.

. . . I am very much pleased with it, and I shall look forward to every number with anxiety.

REV. EDMUND BASEL, O.S.B.

Farmingdale, L. I.

. . . Allow me to congratulate you upon the publication of your new review, AMERICA.

JAMES CLARKE.
New York.

. . . His Lordship sends his best wishes and blessing for the success of the new review.

A. J. LEYES,
Secretary, Bishop of Hamilton, Canada.

. . . You have made a fine start, and there is not a shadow of doubt in my mind but that you will make good your splendid promise. I would love to see your esteemed journal in every Catholic home in the English-speaking world.

REV. JOHN F. MULLANY.

Syracuse, N. Y.

. . . One thing that attracts most is the paragraphs, and the headlines. A busy man dislikes a solid print like the pages of a book. We wish some windows in the text.

REV. JULIUS E. DEVOS.
Chicago, Ill.

. . . I rejoice that we have at last a first-class and representative Catholic periodical. Its publication will be an epoch in the history and progress of the Church in America. RT. REV. M. F. BURKE, D.D.
Bishop of St. Joseph.

. . . I have read AMERICA, and say with my whole heart: "May God bless you and AMERICA." As a missionary, I know that the priests and people of our country were starving for the new food it gives.
C. M. RUENTO.

Oakland, Cal.

. . . No. 2 is far in advance of No. 1. May God prosper the work..

J. A. DOONAN, S.J.

Washington, D. C.

. . . I congratulate you that the first issue of AMERICA, as well as the subsequent numbers meets every just expectation. We have waited long for a paper of this high class and character.

WILLIAM J. ONAHAN.

Chicago.

. . . I have succeeded in getting the public library to subscribe for it.

WILLIAM D. HICKEY.

Dayton, Ohio... Pastor, St. Joseph's.

. . . Monday being the day when I received the first copy was a particularly beautiful day, and as I took up the review, the words of Sam Adams to John Hancock on the 19th of April, 1775, occurred to me, "What a glorious morning is this for AMERICA!" May it prove equally so in this case.

H. S. CARRUTH.

Dorchester Center, Mass.

. . . I congratulate you in giving to the American people a high-class Catholic weekly, worthy of our Faith and traditions.

T. P. MCGOWAN.

Portland, Me.

. . . You must make it show the high-water mark of Catholic journalism,—yes, of all journalism..

REV. J. T. DURWARD.

Baraboo, Wis.

. . . I have received and appreciated very highly the first two numbers of AMERICA.
REV. P. A. ARCHAMBAULT.
Montreal.

. . . The articles are timely and most instructive. God speed your great work.

REV. ODILO OTOTT, O.S.B.

Atchison, Kan.

. . . I find AMERICA a most welcome companion.

P. LOUIS FOX.

The Boston Globe.

. . . The weekly, like other things long coming, will surely prove to have been worth waiting for.

MATTHEW P. TULLY.

New York.

. . . Its substantial meaty interior is full of healthy and nutritious mental bread,—a veritable "Literary Digest," with the objectionable features of the latter eliminated.

REV. EDWARD BARRY, S.J.

. . . I greet AMERICA with a very hearty welcome, and sincerely hope, that it will prove an unparalleled success in the extension of truth, the removal of prejudice, and the promotion of the greater glory of God.

REV. EDWARD H. AMSINGER.

The Catholic University.

. . . I received the first number of AMERICA, and congratulate you on your initial success.

RT. REV. AURELIO TORRES, D.D.

Bishop of Cienfuegos.

. . . Your first number is admirable. I wish you every success in your enterprise.

REV. M. M. HASSETT, D.D.

Harrisburg, Pa.

. . . We are all delighted with AMERICA.
REV. J. P. SCHLEUTER, S.J.
Boston, Mass.

. . . However much I shall miss the Messenger, I am delighted to receive AMERICA.

REV. B. J. FROEGEL.

Brighton, Colo.

. . . I am extremely delighted at the appearance of this weekly. It will be the powerful Catholic organ of this country. It is something we sorely stood in need of.

REV. T. M. HANSELMAN.

. . . AMERICA is just the kind of publication that I have been wishing for, and I am sure, judging from the interest shown here in your publication, it must prove to be a successful undertaking.

B. G. TRAUDT,

*Chancellor, Archdiocese of Milwaukee.
Milwaukee, Wis.*

. . . AMERICA furnishes substantial, varied and most interesting information, just what we want, the best of everything in one review. Social and religious questions are treated with a non-biased, and non-prejudiced mind that must appeal to all sincere hearts. It is destined to bring light and truth to many quarters still in the dark.

BROTHER NEIL.

Montreal.

. . . I am very much pleased with the copy received. It is just the kind of a review that I have been hoping to see published in the interests of Catholic principles, and I hope and pray that the intelligent Catholics of America will appreciate AMERICA so well that they will give it the largest number of subscribers of any review or magazine in America, and by so doing help you to make it the most influential review in the English language.

E. BASSETT.

Linlithgo, N. Y.

. . . It is a great pleasure to me to hear people talk so confidently of the success of AMERICA. The Catholics of the United States need such a paper, and they will have it in AMERICA.

REV. DAVID B. WALKER, S.J.

. . . I am delighted with the movement, and will do all in my power to help your paper, for I believe it is one of the needs of our people, and destined to do unlimited good.

REV. EDWARD MALLEN.

St. Joseph, Mo.

. . . Best wishes for the success of your noble and grand work for the diffusion of true Catholic principles.

RT. REV. N. Z. LORRAIN, D.D.,

Bishop of Pembroke, Ontario.

. . . The much needed Catholic review, AMERICA, is a valuable acquisition to the English literature of this country. It supplies the great need felt alike by the clergy and laity of a wise and able discussion of the grave and important questions of the day.

RT. REV. A. VAN DE VYVER, D.D.

Bishop of Richmond.

. . . In this broad land of ours and among Catholics, it is my belief that your review can be made the most influential one of our day for the dissemination of truth, be it of fact or doctrine.

REV. J. F. REILLY.

Elkader, Iowa.

. . . This is a step deserving encouragement.

REV. A. C. ZOELLER.

Raywick, Ky.

. . . Allow me to congratulate you upon the initial number of AMERICA. I read it with the greatest pleasure and profit, and wish it all possible success.

RT. REV. MGR. JOSEPH FRERL.

New York.

. . . The first number of AMERICA is certainly splendid.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

.....224

CHRONICLE

New Biblical Institute at Rome.—By cable from Rome, dated May 31, AMERICA learns that a Bull has been published establishing an International Biblical Institute to replace similar foundations of Pope Leo XIII. The Bull goes on to declare that the object of the new Institute will be the right direction of studies so as to form able writers and professors on all biblical matters who will combat and refute the errors of Modernism; further, the Bull suggests various practical measures, such as the starting of a Biblical Library, the giving of public conferences, the publication of popular scientific works, as being within the scope of the new Institute. The rector and professors are to be chosen by the Pope, and the rules, students and curriculum of studies are to be subject to Papal sanction. The new Institute is to be entrusted to the Fathers of the Society of Jesus, in connection with the Gregorian University.

According to rumor the first rector will be the Rev. J. C. L. Fonck.

Home Review of the Week.—The Senate disposed of the sugar and tobacco schedules of the tariff bill. Much difficulty is found in pushing the bill to a conclusion. Because of the strife engendered during the discussion, party discipline seems helpless to expedite legislation. A special meeting of the Finance Committee was called to devise means to hurry action on the bill.—Members of the Senate sharply criticized Germany's move to influence tariff legislation. Senator Aldrich, especially, characterized the efforts of Germany to sway legislation by supplying anonymous information as to wages paid to German workingmen "as impertinent to say the least." Count von Bernstorff explained Germany's action: "As I understand the matter, the American Ambassador in Berlin last December requested my Government to have the German Chambers of Commerce, which are official bodies in Germany, provide certain information concerning German wages for the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. Accordingly, this information was provided and sent to the State Department through Ambassador Hill." Evidently the Senators uttering the strictures were unaware that the information of which they complained was strictly official, and that it had been transmitted as confidential matter to Congress after it had been specifically requested by representatives of that body."—Patten's May wheat deal closed last Saturday with price held firmly at $1.34 throughout the session.—Fifteen persons were killed in a tornado that devastated the Oklahoma towns of Key West and Depew. Many more were injured. Floods caused by a deluge of rain added their terrors to the situation.—A conference on the status of the American negro, called to meet in New York City on Monday last, met with opposition from several prominent men who were asked to give their support. Seth Low voices the general reason of their opposition: "I like always to emphasize the great progress made by the colored race since their emancipation, but I cannot think it helpful to emphasize only the points of offense."—George Young, commercial secretary of the British Embassy in Washington, published a report based upon investigations made in the United States and in Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, Australia and New Zealand, the main sources of the English meat supply. The report throws light upon the efforts of Chicago packers to organize a world meat trust. It is reported that if the existent high prices of meat continue without better reason than has been given thus far, the Beef Trust will be called upon to explain to the Government why it has continuously advanced the prices of beef since January without corresponding advances in the price of cattle.—In his speech at the opening of the Exposition at Seattle, Mr. J. J. Hill joined issue with what is vaguely known as "our complex civilization." "We have complicated our educational system," he said, "and made it superficial. The just complaint everywhere is that there is no thoroughness, no wholesome mental discipline for the young. . . . We have complicated our industrial organization at both ends of the scale until the great middle class which represents labor uncombined, a fine energy, and modest accumulations of capital, finds many of its rights invaded or destroyed. And we complicate all these complications by incessantly passing more laws about them."—The middle-class Philadelphian whose modest accumulation of capital does not afford a motor car, is having some of his rights invaded just now by the strike of the employees of the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company. The latest report announces a sympathetic strike on the part of the power-house engineers and firemen to enforce the demands of the motormen. On the whole the public sympathizes with the men, all the more because the company recently abolished six for a quarter tickets.

New Census Director.—"On account of conditions existing and likely to continue" in the bureau, S. A. North, Director of the Census, has resigned, and his successor has taken over the duties of that office. It might be opportune and practical to impress on the new incumbent that Mr. North's idea that the Catholics of the United States consist only of "all who are entitled or privileged to participate in the ordinance of Communion," as he put it, is a very erroneous one, and that if the present director desires to have his coming census tables complete and reliable it will have to be revised in accordance with a more canonical interpretation of what constitutes a Catholic in the eye of the only authority competent to give an exact decision on the issue.

The Georgia Railroad Strike.—As announced in last issue, Mr. Neill, Federal Commissioner of Labor, went down to Atlanta and Augusta in the hope of adjusting the difficulties that tied up all traffic on the Georgia Railroad, suspended the transmission of mail and caused much disorder and commercial loss. This, together with the fear of Federal interference enabled Mr. Neill to effect a settlement. The terms have not yet been published, but it is understood that the strikers resume work on former conditions except that white firemen will in all cases have precedence over negroes. Further details will be decided by arbitration. The original demand was an increase of wages, but Mr. Ball, the Canadian labor leader, failing in this, and learning that Gov. Smith of Georgia floated into office on an anti-railroad and anti-negro platform, raised the anti-negro cry and thus secured a doubtful victory. It is feared that the Firemen's strike preludes a movement to drive the negro out of the industrial as well as the political field. That this is not the universal sentiment in the South is indicated by the statement of Judge Hammond of Augusta, Ga., appealing to the white men of the South for a fair chance for the negro.

Co-Partnership in Collieries.—The name of Sir Christopher Furness, M.P., has long been happily associated with co-partnership in the ship building business at the Hartlepoons. He and his associates have now secured the Wingate Colliery (Durham, England), and his proposal is that the officials and men employed in the mine should subscribe for one-fourth of the shares, payment to be made by a five per cent. reduction from their wages. The labor co-partners are to participate to the extent of their shareholdings in the profits of the company. The Colliery is to have a Council composed equally of representatives of the directors and employees to settle all matters of controversy. Whatever be the immediate result of Sir Christopher's efforts, his action is commended as giving form and substance to a new and better spirit between employer and employee.

Protecting Immigrants.—New York used to have a State board that was charged with the care of aliens landing here. The courts decided that this was infringing on the Federal domain, so its duties lapsed when the supervision of the incoming thousands was taken over by the Washington officials. Recently, however, there has been a State Immigration Commission investigating in this direction, and its report asks for the establishment of a State Bureau of Immigration and Industries, which it believes would be a cure for all the social and economic evils now threatening the morals and prosperity of the new arrival. One member of the commission, Edward B. Whitney, however, protests that such a bureau is unnecessary. The report alleges that last year 19.9 per cent. of all persons confined in penal institutions of the State were unnaturalized foreigners; and that they also made up 24.4 per cent. of all the inmates of the State Insane asylums; and 10.4 per cent. of those in the charitable institutions.

German Markets Closed to American Meat.—Evidently the ambition which American packers have cherished of regaining the rich annual trade which formerly they enjoyed in Germany will not be realized.

The latest reports affirm that the Kaiser's Government under no circumstances will consider letting down the bars which now shut out American meats. There is at present a tax amounting to an average of $4\frac{3}{4}$ cents a pound on meat entering the German markets. This is largely made up of heavy inspection charges at the German port of entry. The Teuton authorities insist upon a rigorous microscopical inspection in their own entry ports, regardless of the fact that the meats arrive with the United States Government inspection certificate already on them. This tax, of course, is prohibitive, and the American packing trade has, in consequence, almost disappeared. Should Germany consent to grant any favors, these will, reports declare, take some other form than relaxation of the prevailing exclusion laws against American meats.

Scholastic Ideals.—Professor Isaac Franklin Russell, who is one of the leading Methodist laymen in this vicinity, and has been for a number of years one of the faculty of the New York University Law School, spoke on May 29, at a conference held to discuss athletics in schools and colleges. The professor is a college man himself, but he is evidently far out of touch with the trend of "education" in colleges to-day. "Athletics have captured the boy," he said, "and it's high time for a revival in secondary schools and colleges of high scholastic ideals. Young men go to college in these days to have a good time and for the family and social distinction that comes from academic associations. They are not hard pressed by study, and they find themselves bound, as it were, to enter into student 'activities,' so called, no doubt to distinguish them from pursuits of learning, which on the whole are regarded from the student viewpoint as the statics rather than the dynamics of college life.

"Physical exercise has its great place. But all must deplore the excessive devotion now paid to competitive athletics. The men who should exercise daily in the gymnasium are not there. The apparatus is monopolized by athletic experts preparing for exhibitions. These men amount to little in later life. Moreover, they imperil health, and particularly the normal action of the heart. No permanent benefit results to general health from hardening the muscles of the shoulders and arms. Many a man, like Senator Evarts, has honestly ascribed his long years to the fact that he took no exercise."

Belgium Is Disappointed.—Early in February news was cabled to Brussels that favorable action would be taken by Congress in response to the invitation extended to the United States to participate officially in the Brussels international exhibition next year. Then, a few weeks later, came the cable that Congress had rejected the measure making a grant for the organization of an American Section; consequently there would be no national recognition on the part of the mighty industrial empire of the new world of Belgium's great economic and industrial achievements. The decision has caused widespread disappointment in Belgium, as it had counted upon a fine showing on the part of the United States to enhance in every way the commercial entente between Belgium and this country.

A Lesson from Jamaica.—Sir Sidney Oliver, Jamaica's Governor-General, has written a work entitled "White Capital and Colored Labor," which is an indirect condemnation of the American treatment of Negroes. He points out that while the English in the West Indies have demonstrated to the negro that they are his superiors, they have not dinned it into his ears by perpetually expatiating on his inferiority. Insistence on the negro's inferiority prevents his good qualities from getting a fair chance, and arouses his worst passions. He urges courtesy as essential to the proper treatment of the negro.

News From Italy.—A cable despatch to the Sun, May 31, states that Premier Giolitti has rebuked the attitude of the Socialists towards the Church. They had made violent attacks on the Church and in self defence the priests had urged their flocks to vote against anti-clerical candidates. It was grossly illiberal, says the Premier, to denounce any section of the nation because it voted as it chose.

Apropos of our Austrian correspondence in this issue of AMERICA, news comes from Rome, May 31, of violent speeches being made in the Chamber of Deputies expressing distrust of Austria and appealing for preparations against the foreigner. The speeches, it appears, made a great commotion and were editorially endorsed by the Messagero. The Messagero, however, does not favor the Government, but has republican tendencies.

The streets of Messina will not be clear for four months yet. The plan of the new town has not yet been completed, hence no houses have as yet been built. The people are living in temporary huts or clamoring for shelters of any kind.

The Situation in France.—The strike of the Postmen is over—it closed as expected, with a victory for the Government. It failed, says the general verdict, because the Government had taken strong measures and was fully prepared to meet it. It failed, say the men engaged, because the plan was immature. It failed, as all can see, because there was lack of decision in the ranks of the employees themselves; for while some among them, chiefly the leaders, were pushing on to Socialism, others, and these were in the majority, had no mind to turn to Socialism or to revolution, but merely desired to vindicate their rights against the encroachments and vexations of Clemenceau's government. The press is unanimous in placing the responsibility for the strike on the Government, and all seem agreed, too, in the view that the difficulty has passed but for the moment. Better plans and more resourceful measures will be prepared for another test of strength by the men defeated for the time being.

The Venezuelan Congress.—The proposed scheme of business to come up in the session of the Venezuelan Congress which reassembled last week for the first time under the administration of President Gomez, is published. It provides for a liberal revision of the Constitution and a series of laws modifying the position of foreigners in the republic.

Irish Affairs in Parliament.—While Mr. Asquith spoke warmly in favor of Mr. Redmond's Removal of Catholic Disabilities Bill and it passed a second reading by a narrow majority, his action finally tabled it, for the present. The bill authorizing the visitation of convents was refused admission. The discussion on Irish Old Age Pensions drew from the Government the frank admission that the charges of fraud were false and unfounded and the absence of records up to a certain period rather militated against the Irish poor than otherwise. Many deserving people were denied pensions for want of documentary evidence. The budget continues to be warmly discussed in and out of Parliament, and the Dreadnought scare helps to weaken the attacks of the opposition. A circular from the British Naval League, urging further Dreadnoughts on the ground that "we cannot rest at nights for fear of German invasion," drew a reply from Mr. Wm. Redmond, M.P., which explains the Irish attitude. Ireland, he says, needs not Dreadnoughts, but modern fishing boats to enable her fishermen to keep some of the fish that are stolen by English trawlers. Germany does not disturb her sleep. German invaders would probably restore her harbors which England has allowed to decay. A section of the Aldrich Tariff measure, increasing the duties on salted mackerel, is resented in Ireland. It is said that salted mackerel is almost an exclusively Irish industry, that taxing it protects no American industry, and that if Irish Americans are as powerful as Mr. Cummings, the Hibernian delegate, says they are, they should have it withdrawn.

Congress of Science.—London gave cordial welcome last week to leading scientists from every corner of the earth. They came to attend the seventh International Congress of Applied Chemistry, which closed its deliberations on Wednesday last. The American contingent in attendance, headed by Dr. Wiley, of "Pure Food Law" fame, numbered upward of one hundred men eminent in chemistry. Sir William Ramsay presided at the various sessions.

Zeppelin's Airship.—Count Zeppelin's successful flight of nine hundred miles in thirty-eight hours lifts the aerial navigation question from theory to actual fact. The unfortunate accident of the collision with the tree at Göppingen when making a descent for a fresh supply of benzine does not take away from the Count's success. "Aerial navigation is in its infancy. Passing mishaps cannot discourage it," said he after the accident. Nine hundred miles is a lusty flight for an infant, and if the bull may be pardoned it looks as if airships have come to stay.

Change of Ambassadors.—The Ambassadors of France and Russia to Turkey have been recalled by their respective governments. The reason of their recall is apparent since both were supporters of the old Hamid regime against the Young Turks. The retention of M. Constans in particular would be impossible, owing to the difficulties he has had with the Young Turks.

New Rector of Catholic University of America.—The Very Rev. Thomas Joseph Shahan, D.D., has been appointed rector of the Catholic University at Washington by papal Brief. The new rector was born in New Hampshire fifty-two years ago; he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity in Rome in 1878, studied at the University of Berlin and later at the New Sorbonne and Institut Catholique of Paris. This is the first time in the history of the Catholic University that one of its professional staff has been chosen as rector.

Japan.—During the year 1906, the number of divorces registered in Japan was 65,500, a daily average of nearly 200, or 18½ per cent. of the total number of marriages. The principal cause of these divorces is domestic bickering and disagreement brought about by the conflict between the old and new ideas—Japan had at the close of 1908 as many as 890 foreign Protestant missionaries, 400 native ordained ministers, 700 native helpers and 395 native bible-women. In regard to converts, the returns generally set them down as about 60,000. Foreign Protestant missionaries do not get along well with the Japanese; they ignore the religion, history and customs of the country and do not acquire the language well enough to be acceptable speakers. Many missionaries do not treat the Japanese as equals, hence constant friction. It may be also said that the foreign missionary is a mere paymaster, generally very lavish in expenditure, while it is also a fact that he has often been imposed upon by unfit helpers. The foreign missionaries, on the other hand, find that the native helpers entertain a too high opinion of themselves, are over-sensitive, ever seeking their own petty interests, and above all that they lack self-reliance and display little aggressiveness. The final solution of the problem will very likely be that the foreign missionary must withdraw to the cities and large towns or return home. The natives prefer to listen to their own preachers and will have no others.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Bishop Grafton's Vain Plea for his Orders

A writer in The Churchman, May 15, cites with approval an argument of the Episcopalian Bishop of Fond du Lac, Mich., in defence of Anglican orders. Here is the citation: "The answer I gave (for the validity of our i. e., Anglican orders) was that of Christ, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' I cited the effect of our sacraments seen in the increase of grace, on all those who had joined us from the world, and the lack of such advance, according to their own testimony, of many who had gone from us to Rome. The marvelous spiritual vitality of the Anglican Church in the last 300 years, assaulted as it has been within and without, and the rise in it of the religious life, is a demonstration of the efficacy of our sacraments."

This proof of the validity of Anglican Orders is in brief, that the fruits of sanctity as shown in the holiness of Episcopalians in general can be explained only by the admission of a valid priesthood among them. If this argument proves anything it proves too much, for Baptists and Methodists, Presbyterians and Quakers, to say nothing of Unitarians, may appeal to a like spiritual vitality; yet they claim no priesthood, no Apostolic succession and explain whatever sanctity their church or its members possess without any reference to orders or sacraments. There are men who see "higher and nobler vestiges or semblances of grace and truth in Methodism than there have been among Episcopalians," who go "to Wesley and such as him" if they wish "to find the shadow and the suggestion of the supernatural qualities which make up the notion of a Catholic Saint."

The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Fond du Lac is unfortunate in his appeal to the text, "By their fruits ye shall know them." It is the very text which St. Augustine uses against the schismatic Petilianus. Properly understood and taken in the context, the text indicates the signs by which the sheep shall recognize the true shepherd from the hireling and not the marks which point out the true fold. Christ said, "Beware of false prophets which come unto you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves; and ye shall know them by their fruits." And it was by this sign that Augustine recognized the schismatic Petilianus. "If you should ask of me by what fruits we know you to be ravening wolves, I bring against you the charge of schism, which you will deny, but which I will straightway go on to prove; for as a matter of fact, you do not communicate with all the nations of the earth, nor with those churches which were founded by the labor of the Apostles."

How awkward would be the application of this text in its legitimate sense to the Bishop of Fond du Lac and his confreres among the Episcopalian Bishops! You are not shepherds, says St. Augustine, but ravening wolves, and the proof is because you have cut yourselves off from the Church of the Nations. The Bishop boasts of the marvelous vitality of the Anglican Church in the last 300 years, but, waiving the question of heresy, it is clearly schismatical; it is not Catholic; its sole expansion during that period of 300 years has been within nations that owe or once owed allegiance to the British Crown. The ordinary graces communicated with greater or less prodigality to all mankind—for God "will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth"—it has, but to the presence of these extra sacramental graces it cannot appeal in proof of its Apostolic Succession, or of its inherent sanctity or the certainty of its priesthood, as even Russian schismatics may do, much less can it claim to be the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church.

"What does it profit them," says the Bishop of Hippo, addressing earlier schismatics, "if they have both the voice of angels in the sacred mysteries, and the gift of prophesying as had Caiaphas and Saul? If they not only know but even possess the Sacraments, as Simon Magus did, if they have faith, as the devils confessed Christ, if they distribute of themselves their own substance to the poor, as many do, not only in the Catholic Church, but in different heretical bodies; if, under pressure of any persecution they give their bodies to be burned for the faith which they like us confess; yet because they do all these things apart from the Church, not 'forbearing one another in love,' nor 'endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, inasmuch as they have not charity,' they cannot attain to eternal salvation, even with all these good things which profit them not."

Newman, while still a member of the Establishment, believed that Anglicans had the Apostolical succession and the grace of the sacraments. So he tells us in the "Apologia." Before the time of "Tract 90" he wrote—"much as Roman Catholics may denounce us as schismatical, they could not resist us if the Anglican Communion had but one note of the Church upon it—Sanctity." So he thought then, but a wider study of the Fathers and of Church history, a deeper knowledge of the doctrine of grace and of God's dealing with those within as well as without the true fold, enlightened him as to his error. In his lectures on Anglican Difficulties, he repeats substantially the argument or contention of the Bishop of Fond du Lac, and the argument is in no wise weakened by the manner of its presentation. He admits that Episcopalians may have the clear evidence of grace in their hearts, by its effects sensible at the moment or permanent in the event, that a man in the bosom of the Protestant Church may have been converted from sin to holiness or that he may have received great support and comfort under trial, or that he may have been carried over certain temptations though he has not submitted himself to the Catholic Church. More than this, he readily 'concedes the peace, and joy, and strength which Anglicans experience in their own ordinances; he has no quarrel with those who say that when they began to go to weekly communion they found themselves wonderfully advanced in purity; or when they went to confession they believed that the hand of God was over them at the moment when they received absolution. "If you mean to say," to quote Dr. Newman, "that the supernatural grace of God, as shown either at the time or by consequent fruits has overshadowed you at certain times, has been with you when you were taking part in Anglican ordinances, I have no wish, and a Catholic has no anxiety, to deny it." He goes so far as to declare that these and similar experiences were his own at the time when he was still a member of the Established Church. But the explanation, he adds, is readily provided by the Catholic Church, provided in her general teaching quite independently of the particular case of Episcopalians, not made for the occasion, or only applied when the occasion has arisen. According to Catholic teaching, grace is given for the merits of Christ all over the earth; there is no corner even of Paganism where it is not present, present in each heart of man in real sufficiency for his ultimate salvation; not that the grace presented to each is such as at once to bring him to heaven; but it is sufficient for a beginning. The presence of one grace in a soul does not imply that the soul will have the second, "for the grant of the second at least depends on the use of the first," and so on: "thus we mount up by steps towards God." "Yet the highest gifts of grace are compatible with ultimate reprobation." But grace may be imparted through the sacraments or outside of them. Grace is given not only through the preordained channels of the sacraments but also when "the inward energetic act of the recipient is the instrument."

It is not, therefore, the presence of real sacraments and a validly ordained priesthood with a real Sacrifice of the Mass that offers the sole explanation of spiritual vitality, and no explanation is right, says Dr. Newman, speaking of members of the Establishment "which cannot be made to tell for your own Apostolic Authority without telling for those who like the Methodists are rebels against it." St. Augustine, in his controversy with the Donatists, maintained that though their baptism was valid yet they who received it, being cut off from the true Church, were not the recipients of sacramental grace until they repented of their schism and were joined by their interior repentance and external submission to the one true Church of Christ.

Therefore, even if we absolved his Church of heresy and granted it sacramental power, it still remains for the Bishop of Fond du Lac to prove that together with the possession of the "sacraments and the increase of grace on all those who had joined them from the world . . . and the marvelous vitality of the Anglican Church in the last 300 years . . . and the rise in it of the religious life," it does not possess all these things "apart from the Church." In other words, he must prove that his church is the Church of Christ, for it may have all these gifts and graces to commend it and many more apart from the Church; it could have seven sacraments and not merely two; it could even have an acknowledged and not a more than doubtful priesthood, and for all that be really schismatic and consequently not the Church which Christ has established on earth. Revolt of French Officials

The post-office strike has made people think. They have begun to study it, to analyze its causes, to endeavor to foresee its ultimate results. For it has all the importance of an historical fact. With it, a new order, perhaps, begins. Serious men ask themselves the question: "Parliamentarism has been rudely shaken; is 'Syndicalism' to take its place?"

All through the crisis, the attitude of the strikers was firm and dignified. The thousands who "walked out" were determined to win: they have not entirely failed. They struck, not for less work, not for shorter hours, not for larger salaries. They struck for justice, for liberty of conscience, even for the "square deal." Their records as employees had been tampered with for political purposes, favorites of power were advanced over the heads of gray-haired veterans, some were lowered in rank because a cousin happened to sing in the village choir.

During the strike the Government was certainly not the star performer. It acted a grotesque comedy. The enemy won all along the line. The surrender of the Government, says Mr. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, was disgraceful.

The Ship of State was driven before the storm, which its blindness had not foreseen, and while the storm was raging the public was the sufferer. The blow struck home and suddenly disorder reigned everywhere. No morning papers, no news, telegrams, business letters; everything at a standstill. Government is paralyzed and France itself is isolated. The crusty old bourgeois are indignant, for in their eyes, the workman, the toiler, the public functionary is the slave of the State. Why should "the worm turn?" He must be crushed.

Others said more calmly: "The interruption of a great public service is a great evil. But, what if the State, not the strikers, be the guilty party? What, if at the bottom of it all, there be a question of personal dignity, of liberty, of religion? Perhaps a question of radical change in the very constitution of the country?"

The strikers, as M. Charles Benoist told his fellow-deputies in the Chamber, had turned in wrath against that odious "Parliamentarism," which rules France and dealt it a heavy blow. Why? Because it is disorganizing, ruining the country. The French lawmongers have substituted their own action to that of law. Law itself they suspend, they paralyze, they annul; they go to ex-trèmes Louis XIV or Bonaparte would never dare. For themselves and their tools, all the titbits of office, all the snug, cosy-corners, all the downy nests. Post office clerks, mail-sorters, mail-carriers, stenographers, the poor girls dealing out stamps from stuffy little pigeon-holes to earn a scant livelihood, or to help an aged father, or a crippled little brother, saw it all, realized, heart-sick, what the odious system meant. What does it mean? For France in general, national resources squandered, an inefficient navy, empty arsenals; in the post office unworthy officials advanced, incompetence rewarded. "That odious clique," they thought, "does not want trained, faithful servants; it wants tools! We'll none of it!"

Parliamentarism reels, Socialism is staggered. How? The best way to "socialize" France, say the national Socialists, is to nationalize labor, that is, to put it entirely into the hands of the Government. Let the Government control the mail, telegraph, telephone and transportation service; the sale of matches and tobacco; mines, arts, industries. If it does, the consequences are evident. The State would be supreme; it would control an army of tools; a few irresponsible, unscrupulous tyrants would rule the country. The strikers have heard the ominous rumble of this car of Juggernaut, and made a sturdy endeavor to put a break on the wheels.

Parliamentarism and its ubiquitous ally, Freemasonry, have not of course been unhorsed completely, but the gauntlet has been flung in their teeth. What is the name of the new champion who has just ridden into the lists? His device and cognizance cannot be as yet very clearly read. In France, they call him "Syndicalism." We might call him Unionism.

And legions are enrolled under the new standard. What have we to fear and what can we hope from the dawning reign of this new power? If the throngs which have surged to the front are perhaps neither positively infidel or anti-Christian or anti-Catholic, they certainly have not much religion or Faith. How could they, with the influences which have surrounded them, the godless education they have received, with the distorted picture ever before them of a Catholic Church the enemy of liberty, of the people, of education, of progress, of enlightenment? In those serried ranks now marching on, some no doubt want a new Commune, another revolution, anarchy. If these are not the color-bearers, they are the most daring fighters in the fray.

Others steadier, calmer, want justice, liberty, fair play for all Frenchmen, even for slandered bishops, starved country curés, and helpless, exiled nuns. The movement is at least not positively anti-religious. In fact the strikers complain that liberty of conscience was violated. One of their grievances was that they were spied upon, persecuted because of their religious convictions or those of their friends. And there is another hopeful sign. The strike was a "professional" one. The men excluded unfair means of intimidation, of exciting sympathy, of drawing any other body into the fight; they excluded politics. They asked for redress of grievances purely professional, they asked moderately, apologizing to the public with something like old-time French courtesy, as if they said: "Ma foi! Mesdames et Messieurs! We are very very sorry, but, que voulez-vous, we cannot help it!"

The State may turn tyrant. A tyrant State—worse perhaps than a tyrant Nero—wants no buffer between its own omnipotence and the helplessness of the individual. Men, then, may combine for self-protection; but they must ever respect equal and paramount rights. Syndicalism, Unionism fronts the tyrant State in France to-day to fight the battle of the downtrodden. What will the new champion do? Will he strike for truth, for liberty, for God? The lists are open, the battle-blast has sounded. With a prayer on our lips, we breathlessly await the outcome.(1)

Financial Reform in Germany

II.

There are two methods by which the huge deficit of the Imperial Exchequer can be met: (1) by the taxation of articles of general consumption, and (2) by increasing the taxes on property. The drafters of the bill before the Imperial Parliament have from the outset kept both these methods in view. The present bill proposes to levy an additional 100,000,000 marks on spirits, 77,000,000 marks on tobacco, 100,000,000 on beer, and 20,000,000 marks on wine. The supporters of this measure can justly point out that Germany has hitherto turned these great sources of revenue to less account than the other leading powers—much less, for example, than Great Britain, whose naval strength and strong financial position as a nation have been largely built on its revenue from beer, spirits and tobacco. On these three commodities Germany has realized 4 to 8 marks ($1 to $2) per head of population; Austria almost twice as much, France 16 marks, but Great Britain 24 marks. Germany's total yearly revenue from these sources is 200,000,000 to 300,000,000 marks ($50,000,000); Great Britain's is almost 1,000,000,000 marks. It will be sufficient to indicate briefly the various points of view from which the taxation of these commodities is viewed at the resumption of the sessions of the Reichstag.

All the parties of the Bloc, which intends to carry through the financial reform independently of the Centre, are united upon the tax on spirits, at least as to the amount of revenue to be raised; spirits must realize 100,000,000 marks additional revenue. There is a division of opinion as to whether this object should be secured by raising or reforming the current excise duties, or by creating a state monopoly, i. e., by nationalizing to some extent the traffic in and manufacture of spirits, as is proposed in the bill before Parliament. The Tax Commission indeed scouted the idea of a monopoly at the first reading, but, at the time of writing, prospects in this direction have greatly improved. A general agreement on the point, however, will be difficult to secure, as the South German governments have certain privileges which cannot be withdrawn without the consent of their proper representatives. Beer, the annual consumption of which within the boundaries of the German Customs is in round numbers 73,000,000 hectolitres (1,617,000,000 gallons, i. e., $26\frac{1}{2}$ gallons per head of population), is expected to bring in 100,000,000 marks (\$25,000,000) more revenue. As the duty on beer has already been somewhat raised in 1906 without causing any decline in production or consumption, it is hoped that the new burden will not have any deleterious effect on this industry. Opinions differ as to whether the rate of assessment should be based on a graduated scale according to the gross production of the various breweries, thereby to secure that the smaller and medium-sized breweries will be able to compete with the large ones under the conditions. Tobacco, the duty on which (neglecting the reform of the duty on cigarettes in 1906) has remained unchanged since 1879, is expected to bring in an additional 77,000,000 marks, if the majority of the representatives vote for the raising of the duty and tax on raw tobacco, which produces at present only 50,000,000 marks. The taxation on wine has hitherto been left to the competency of the separate States, but, of the confederate divisions engaged in the wine industry, only Würtemberg, Baden and Alsace-Lorraine impose a duty, while in Prussia, Bavaria and Hesse wine is duty-free. The bill before Parliament proposes to tax only bottled wine; it fails, however, to appreciate the critical position of the wine-grower, who can ill endure fresh burdens, and it may consequently be regarded as definitely shelved. The same judgment may be pronounced on the proposed duties on gas, electricity, advertisements and posters; although many arguments have been adduced in favor of one or the other, they find no favor with the Tax Commission and may be regarded as discredited. Several methods of superseding these discarded duties have been suggested by the Reichstag or some of its leading members, and the present state of the discussion leads one to believe that some of them may be adopted. The abatement of the sugar duty is to be discontinued, and the proposal to remove the ticket tax of 1906 is to be dropped, by which means an increased revenue of 60 millions over that estimated is expected. The duty on coffee may also possibly be raised to produce a further 40 millions, and 15 millions is expected from a new duty on matches.

A short consideration of the duties, which—to judge from the negotiations of the Reichstag and the parties of the Bloc with the Chancellor—seem likely or certain to be imposed, will show that these duties on commodities of general consumption are expected to produce in round numbers 300 millions (three-fifths of the necessary amount), by far the greater part of the burden being thrown on the least favored sections of the community, who naturally find new impositions harder to bear than the more affluent classes. It seems, therefore, only a dictate of the most elementary justice that the balance between the direct and indirect taxes will not be still further disturbed to the disadvantage of the less fortunate citizens, and that at least the remainder of the necessary revenue should be borne by the holders of property. This proposal of a property-tax is the crucial point of the whole question of Finance Reform, and its solution has given rise to a whole series of proposals. The empire cannot well claim to tax income and property, since this would entail the subversion of the fundamental financial principle and the disruption of the bonds of corporate union of each separate State. The Imperial Government has therefore proposed a death-duty, i. e., a duty on the property of a deceased person before its division amongst his heirs. The proposal is to confine the duty to cases in which the net value of the inherited property exceeds 20,000 marks (\$5,000). As part of the heritage will be reckoned all insurances, and presents made just before death or with a view to evade the death duties. In calculating the net value of the estate, household objects will not be taken into consideration, and all charges to the estate, e. g., the debts of the deceased and the costs of administration, will be deducted. On heritages between 20,000 and 30,000 marks, the duty will be $\frac{1}{2}\%$; between 30,000 and 40,000, $\frac{3}{5}\%$, and so on, the death duty on incomes of or over 1,000,000 being 3%. In the case of arable and forest lands, the net value will be regarded as twenty times the net annual value. Provision has been made for cases in which the estate is inherited more than once within five and ten years, and also for the granting of an interval for payment or the acceptance of payment in instalments. These are the salient points of the proposed death duty, which of all the proposed duties has aroused the greatest commotion. Zealously defended by some, it is passionately attacked by others, and the Landowners' Association (der Bund der Landwirte) has inaugurated a wild agitation in opposition to the measure and attacked the friends of the death duty in a manner which is fortunately very rare in the political life of Germany. There is no occasion to dwell upon all the arguments for and against the duty or the different phases of the agitation, or to essay any exact appraisal of the merits of the proposal. It will be sufficient to refer cursorily to two episodes which will bring into full relief the manner in which matters of the most vital importance to the German Empire are treated at the beck of the Bloc through hatred of the Centre—not pertinent to the important issue at stake, but purely from party motives, and to the detriment of the general interests of the Empire and its reputation with the outside world. These episodes are the rejection of Herold's motion and the comedy of the "Notice to the Bloc."

In spite of the long deliberations of the Tax Commission, the different parties of the Bloc could come to no general understanding as to the manner in which the holders of property were to be called upon to contribute their portion of the new taxes. At the beginning of March, Herold, one of the Catholic delegates, laid before the Commission a proposition demonstrating a practical way of raising a portion of the imperial deficit from the propertied classes. He proposed that the State contributions to the Imperial Exchequer should be replaced by a tax levied by the separate States on property (income or real). The amount of this tax should be fixed each year by the Imperial Government; it might be required to realize 150 millions for the years 1909-13, and should be regulated not by the population of the different confederate States, but according to their total vested value. The Conservative party expressed their approval of Herold's motion, which should have thus proved acceptable to the Imperial Parliament. It seemed, therefore, almost an accomplished fact that a majority, consisting of the Centre and the Conservatives, would force the acceptance of a duty, to which the "kernel" of the Bloc (the National Liberal Party) were opposed. The "eliminated" Centre was not destined to score a victory. Prince Bülow, the Imperial Chancellor and father of the Bloc, threw himself into the breach; the recommendation of the Tax Commission was flouted, and the action of the Conservatives was condemned in such sweeping terms that they withdrew their support of Herold's proposal and assisted the Liberals in formulating a counter-proposal, the impracticability of which is patent from the outset. That the whole question of finance reform is thereby imperilled and certainly thrown back many weeks to the prejudice of the Imperial exchequer, does not affect the Bloc or its leaders in the least, if only the Centre—the strongest party in the Reichstag, which has according to the testimony of Bismarck and Bülow himself served the Empire disinterestedly for decades, as was stated by the Imperial Chancellor for War on an important occasion in 1906—can be kept "eliminated." That aversion from the Centre is one of the hinges on which the Chancellor's politics turns may be also seen from the course of the Comedy of the "Notice to the Bloc," played in the second half of last March. The Conservative Party are—or perhaps we should say were—opposed to the death-duty, the principal supporters of which are found among the Liberal Left. The agitation for this duty, the pressure placed upon them to assist in setting aside a proposal evidently sound, and certain other occurrences had given great umbrage to the Conservatives, whose leader (Herr von Normann) declared on March 25 to the leader of the National Liberals (Herr Bassermann) that his party was convinced of the necessity of finance reform, but would not subscribe to either a death or a legacy duty and consequently desired to consider the reform apart from the Bloc. The National Liberals saw in this a notice given to the Bloc; their press entered on a bitter campaign against the Conservatives, although some of the Liberals of the Left accepted the dissolution of the Bloc with the greatest satisfaction and a huge sigh of relief. It was again the Imperial Chancellor who brought back the struggling elements of the Bloc under the same yoke, and forced them to perpetrate this ill-assorted union. The whole machinery of the Government was set in motion, and the opposition of the Conservatives seems to have been completely overcome. The heritage duty in its present form may be regarded as definitely dropped—at least, for the nonce—and the legacy duty of 1906 is not likely to be extended to cases in which the heirs are husband or wife or descendants of the deceased.

What will be the outcome, none can foretell, since no working policy other than hatred of the Centre decided the politics of the leaders and constituent parties of the Bloc. An issue of the most vital importance to the whole German people is to be decided by a narrow majority in Parliament, which is not supported by anything like the majority of the electors. Whether such a policy is salutary or prejudicial for "das Volk und Vaterland," a near future will show. I. LINS.

The Development of Christian Socialism

II. IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

The Christian social reformers in continental Europe never styled themselves Christian Socialists. This appellation originated in England, and there it had an unequivocal meaning. In 1850 Frederick D. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, and J. M. Ludlow, with a little band of clergymen and laymen in London, formed a society for the promotion of workingmen's associations and for some time succeeded in making it a center of a cooperative movement in England. The principle underlying this society was the practical application of Christianity to methods of trade and industry. Its founders, while they professed Christianity and regarded it as the basis of social reforms, with no less warmth embraced Socialism, being of the opinion that Christianity was the only foundation of Socialism and that vice versa a true Socialism was the necessary result of true Christianity. Though, in some regards, they had not as yet advanced beyond the utopian ideas of Owen, Fourier and Leblanc, they penetrated the essentials of socialism so far that they were resolved to supplant competition by co-operation and to use revolutionary methods in the pursuit of their end. Hence they termed their reformatory movement "Christian Socialism," because it was, in their opinion, the only title that defined their object and committed them at once to the conflict in which they were inevitably sooner or later to engage with un-social Christians and un-Christian Socialists. Accordingly they called also their organ in the press Christian Socialist. But notwithstanding the earnest efforts they made their movement came to a speedy end. Similar in tendency were other English associations formed in the seventies, eighties, and nineties of the last century. Chief among them were the Guild of St. Matthew, the Church Socialist Union, the Christian Socialist League and the Fabian Society.

In the United States Christian Socialism made its first definite appearance in 1889, when under the lead of the Rev. William Dwight Porter Bliss the "Society of Christian Socialists" was founded in Boston, with the Dawn as its organ. Its avowed object was first, "to show that the aim of Socialism is embraced in the aim of Christianity," secondly, "to awaken the members of the Christian churches to the fact that the teachings of Christianity lead directly to some specific form or forms of Socialism, and that, therefore, the Church has a definite duty in this matter, and must, in simple obedience to Christ, apply itself to the realization of the social principles of Christianity."

From this statement it is clear that the said society, while it professed to be essentially Christian, was also specifically socialistic. How the demands and measures it advocated coincided with those of modern Socialists is plain from a tract of W. D. P. Bliss, in which he sets forth that Christian Socialism would emancipate women as well as men, would not believe in a democracy of half the people, would have cities employ the unemployed in ways not to compete with the present labor, would develop a true municipalism, would have the State own and manage railroads, the telegraph, expressage, etc., would replace competition by fraternal combination, would favor the reclaiming of the land for the use of all the people by taxing land values on a graduated scale and increasingly every few years, till finally the whole value of the natural resources of the earth be taken for the people and not for the favored few. The Society of Christian Socialists, however, as Morris Hillquit assures us, never gained much influence, and after a struggling existence of a few years disbanded. Not more influence was granted to the Christian Socialist League in Chicago, nor longer existence to the American Institute of Christian Sociology, which in the summer of 1894 Professors R. T. Ely and G. D. Herron organized at Chautauqua, N. Y., for the purpose of furnishing literature and propaganda for the Christian Socialist movement among churches and colleges.(1)

In the meantime, while Christian Socialist societies appeared and disappeared, a connection between Socialism and Christianity was strongly maintained by individual Socialists. Some conceived of Socialism as an application of Christianity to social life, others looked on primitive Christianity as essentially Socialistic in its tendencies and ethical teachings, and others again regarded Christ as a revolutionary agitator for the overthrow of the capitalism of His time and the emancipation of the laboring classes. Their number is not small, on both sides of the Atlantic. Prominent in America are A. W. Ricker, C. W. Wooldridge, G. D. Herron, J. Stitt Wilson, Chas. H. Kerr, E. Untermann. Some of them are members of Socialist parties, though the latter have never collectively pledged themselves to Christian Socialism or made it one of their doctrinal tenets.(2)

Since thus the idea of Christian Socialism has always been kept alive down to the present day, we must not wonder that, notwithstanding previous failures, just now a new attempt is being made to wed Socialism with Christianity and carry it into the Churches. For this purpose the "Christian Socialist Fellowship" was, on June 18, 1906, permanently organized by delegates from Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Missouri, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The object of this society was clearly stated in the constitution, which was adopted by the Louisville Conference and is still in force. Article the second reads: "Its object shall be to permeate churches, denominations and other religious institutions with the social message of Jesus, to show that Socialism is the necessary economic expression of Christian life, to end the class struggle by establishing industrial democracy, and to hasten the reign of justice and brotherhood upon earth." This statement does not more distinctly mark the new-founded Fellowship as Christian, than it characterizes the same as truly Socialistic. Its leading members, men and women, actually belong to the Socialist party, and a resolution was unanimously adopted in Louisville, in which the delegates expressly declared their adherence to the principles of International Socialism and endorsed the platform and present organization of the Socialist Party of America.

Its organization is, in fact, like that of the latter, democratic, local and national. The body of the association consists of centres formed in cities and counties, and of districts formed in States, which have local jurisdiction within their territory, but are subject to a National Executive Committee consisting of fifty members, with a secretary and a treasurer, and an Annual National Conference. This limitation, however, is made that the active members always retain the right of the initiative, the referendum, and the imperative mandate. As an official organ in the press the Christian Socialist was endorsed, a bi-monthly first published in Danville, Ill., and later on in Chicago under the editorship of the Rev. Edward Ellis Carr, the most active propagandist, and we might say, the very soul of the whole Fellowship.

A Sure Antidote for Socialism

LOUVAIN, MAY 20.

Catholic Social workers in Belgium have hit upon what seems destined—apart from its own intrinsic value—to be a sure antidote for Socialism. It finds expression in the “Ligne du coin de terre,” a title difficult to translate into English, but which is a society formed to buy up small tracts of land and present them gratis to the workman. The little farm thus acquired by him is his forever. The plan has already proved very successful, for with persevering labor the workman has been able to support himself and in some cases even to make something over and above. Following the example of the first league started at Bruges, others are springing up all over the country—in some cases in connection with the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and with funds supplied by it. The Socialistic antidote comes in this way: One of the workmen who accepted a little farm under this system was a Socialist; he was a good worker, too, and at the end of the year had a fine crop of potatoes. Now, at this juncture a Socialist leader came along, and after admiring the crop, said: “Of course, soon, when the new era comes in, you’ll be sharing them with all of us.” “What!” cried the startled farmer, “is that what Socialism is?” “It certainly is,” was the answer. “Well,” said the other, “if that is what it is, then I don’t want to be a Socialist any longer,” and he isn’t. The best remedy for the enemies of prosperity is to make them prosperous themselves, and that is what this new society has done.

The past week or so has been calm enough in Belgium. The discussion, however, of a rather insignificant question raised considerable bad feeling in the Chamber, and seems likely to cause more outside of it. The Minister of Public Works had commissioned an architect and contractor to beautify a certain unsightly quarter in Brussels and an approach to the Exposition grounds. As the work progressed, the public objected to the turn it was taking and, while knowing nothing of the plans, raised in the press an agitation against it. The result was a week-long debate in the Chamber, and the Minister was finally enjoined from proceeding. It is a situation that may give rise to many misunderstandings, but the Bruxellois, whatever may be said now, are in fault and have only themselves to blame. Next week promises to be a more lively one, for on May 24 begins the discussion of the military question in the Chamber, and the final war and peace military footing and the whole question of compulsory military service will be decided.

The Flemish question, always more or less before the public, is for the moment especially acute. At present it is grave only on account of the symptoms it shows of ravages in Catholic unity, symptoms that the Liberal press has regarded with joy and even tried to aggravate. Signs of agitation—which, by the way, is especially marked among the students—have shown themselves in the rejection in the Chamber, by the Walloon deputies, of a moderate enough bill calling for a state examination in Flemish for teachers. The consequences of this action may prove disastrous, for, as the Bien Public says, “the Flemings may now be tempted to pass much more stringent measures than the one just now rejected.” However, the danger of discussion does not lie so much among the older as the younger men who will soon be at the helm, as is shown by one or two recent incidents and as was hinted at in M. Schollaert’s speech which I spoke of last week. The situation is easily enough explained. The older men have been so preoccupied for the past twenty-five years in much graver questions that the one of the race has been overlooked; now after a period of great prosperity, the mill-stones have begun to grind each other. May the patience of the Catholic statesmen and the loyalty of their followers happily avert all trouble!

Another interesting question is that regarding the bill presented by one of the Liberal leaders, M. Janson. Its aim was more or less to put all associations under the protection of the State and—sign of good omen for Belgium!—was severally rejected by the different sections of the Chamber that voted on it. It was, in fact, an insidious measure modelled after the famous ones of Waldeck-Rousseau in France, which opened the way to the tyrannous confiscations we have been witnessing these latter years. It had, therefore, nothing in common with the parliamentary traditions of Belgium and was rightly rejected.

Every five years the Royal Academy of Belgium awards a prize for the best philosophical work done within that time in French. The latest one has just been awarded. The three authors competing were H. E. Cardinal Mercier, Fr. Castelein, S.J., professor of philosophy at the Jesuit College at Namur, and M. Van Biervliet, a professor at Ghent, who has done some good work in physiological psychology. Early in the course of the contest the last named was ruled out, and the contest lay between the two ecclesiastics, much to the disgust of the Liberals of the country. On May 17, the prize of 10,000 francs ($2,000) was awarded to Cardinal Mercier. The prize-winner, it may be remembered, was once a professor at Louvain, where he held, in the Special School of St. Thomas Aquinas, the chair of Thomistic Philosophy founded by Leo XIII. He is regarded as the leader of Neo-Scholasticism, and founded and for many years edited the organ of the movement, La Revue Neo-Scholastique. He is the author of a well-known and extensively used course of philosophy and a work entitled “The Beginnings of Modern Psychology,” on the merits of which he has just won the much coveted prize. Echoes from Orleans

PARIS, MAY 20, 1909.

The fêtes of Orleans in honor of Bl. Jeanne d’Arc were perfectly and gloriously successful, and the thousands of visitors who flocked to witness them came away deeply impressed by a sight that is unique in its solemn aspect and meaning.

Perhaps one of the most striking features of the three days’ celebration was the scene that took place in the evening of May 7th, when, according to a time honored custom, the Mayor of the city, in whose person is vested the civil authority, placed the Standard of the “Maid” in the hands of the Bishop. The ceremony took place in the evening. The cannons roared, the bells rung, and the sound of military music echoed through the town; on the threshold of the Cathedral stood forty-two mitred Bishops, their croziers in hand; as the Mayor, M. Courtin-Rossignol and his councillors approached with the banner of the Maid, the Bishops stepped forward to meet them. The Mayor, who, in a delicate and difficult position, has shown much tact and conciliating spirit, spoke a few words, in which he recalled the fact that Orleans, "the faithful city," has never failed to honor her deliverer.

Mgr. Touchet, the Bishop, in his answer, insisted that the "fête," which he and his colleagues were assembled to celebrate, was at once "a religious festival, suggested by the recent beatification of our holy deliverer, and a civic celebration that is inspired by our local traditions."

Mgr. Touchet has a clear voice, and the last words of his speech were distinctly heard and loudly cheered. Raising his hand, he said: "To the deliverer of Orleans, we promise unfailing fidelity; to the saint of our country we give glory on earth and in heaven; to the Church, by whom she is honored, we wish peace, when God wills it, and to France, whom she served, we wish continuous prosperity."

According to custom, the standard remained in the Cathedral during the night between the 7th and 8th of May. When the "fêtes" were over, it was, as usual, replaced in the "Notet de ville," under the guardianship of the civic authorities.

The procession that on May 8th always takes place from the Cathedral to the Pont des Tourelles, where Jeanne fought and conquered, was this year solemn on account of the large number of Bishops who were present; the glorious weather adding to the beauty of a ceremony.

Etudes devotes its number of April 20th solely to her honor. Some of the articles are remarkable. M. Henri Joly, a well known writer, in a paper called "la psychologie de Jeanne d'Arc," draws a picture of the working of the girl's mind, and, with much good sense enlightened by religion, shows how the supernatural side of her mission influenced her natural character. The healthy-minded, simple, straightforward, keen-witted peasant maid was, apart from her divine inspirations, the very opposite of the dreamer and visionary that some historians have described. She was, M. Joly points out, absolutely natural and possessed a strong strain of common sense that breaks out in her answers throughout the long and weary trial at Rouen. Another article in the same magazine by an English Jesuit, Father Thurston, excited much interest in France, showing as it does, how public opinion in England has completely veered round regarding the "Maid." Among the Protestant writers who have made her history the object of their careful study is Mr. Andrew Lang, whose "Maid of France," published in 1905, is written in a spirit of impartial historical research, inspired by sincere admiration for one "whom he reverences, the very flower of chivalry." Another sympathetic review of Mr. Lang's book has appeared in the "Revue des deux Mondes," April 15, 1909. Here the reviewer points out how the English Protestant writer is far more sensible and fair-minded in his treatment of his subject than a well-known French author, M. Anatole France, who, by distorting texts, endeavors to prove Jeanne to have been a visionary if not a hypocrite. In a literary point of view, M. Anatole France is unrivalled, his style at once subtle and strong has a magic charm, but his unwillingness to admit a supernatural element in the life of Jeanne betrays him into unworthy devices that invalidate his position as an historian. One trait of the Maid's personality is emphasized by Mr. Lang, and will surely appeal to those who love to note how happily the natural character blends with the supernatural in the saints of God. Jeanne was by nature singularly joyous; except when her tears flowed over the dead and dying, her bright cheerfulness and good temper acted like a tonic on the discouraged men-at-arms by whom she was surrounded. This trait of her character is another proof of her guilelessness. "We find Jeanne's good temper in St. Francis of Assisi and in St. Bernardine," says the reviewer; "these deeply innocent souls are impelled by their love of God to love with particular tenderness the world created by Him; moreover their cheerfulness is often a form of charity."

While in her public festivities as well as in her literary efforts Catholic France was busy honoring her national saint, the attempted strike of the Post office officials caused a sense of uneasiness throughout the country. The first Post office strike, two months ago, sounded a note of alarm that is emphasized by this second revelation of the growing discontent of the hitherto passive State functionary. The "Confederation du Travail" has seized and improved the opportunity and offered the assistance of its organization to the discontented employees." As we previously pointed out, the weakness of the Government lies in the fact that its chief members are men who have arrived at their present high position by pandering to the socialistic and revolutionary tendencies of their countrymen, elements that now prove difficult to handle. All the Conservative papers, even the most optimistic, agree in considering the present crisis as fraught with danger, revealing as it does the rebellious spirit that is rife among the paid servants of the State in whose hands lie in a certain measure the safety and commercial prosperity of their country.

COUNTESS DE COURSON.

Catholic Disabilities Bill

LONDON, MAY 14, 1909.

In the House of Commons to-night Mr. W. Redmond's Bill for the Removal of Catholic Disabilities was read a second time by a majority of 133 against 123 votes. This is a decided success, but unless the Government changes its attitude towards the Bill, it cannot pass this session. Under the existing rules of the House of Commons it is extremely difficult for a private member to secure the passing of a Bill. He cannot get the necessary time for its various stages unless the Government makes special arrangements in his favor, and this session the Government programme and the Budget will leave few sittings available for other purposes. As soon as the division was taken there was another division in which, by a majority of three votes, it was decided that the committee stage of the Bill, in which each clause is considered word by word, should be taken by the whole House. This means that several sittings would have to be devoted to it, and is therefore equivalent to shelving the Bill till next year.

Still progress has been made. The motion for the second reading was seconded by an Irish Protestant and supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, speaking not as head of the Government but as an individual. He declared that the royal declaration against Transubstantiation, quite apart from its origin (it was the outcome of Titus Oates's Popish Plot), was outrageously offensive and quite unnecessary. He would be glad to see it swept away, and he suggested that an alternative form should be considered by a committee of Catholic and Protestant members. It is very likely that this will be done, and that it will pave the way for the introduction of a Government Bill next year.

Of course a number of bigots, including some North of Ireland Orangemen, protested that the throne would be in danger if the declaration were touched, and some of them also dwelt on the peril to Protestantism arising from the coming of the exiled French religious communities now in England. But more than one Protestant spoke for the Bill, and two English Catholic members, Lord Edmond Talbot and Mr. Belloc, gave valuable support to its Irish champions.

The Bill deals not only with the royal declaration, it also proposes to make Catholics eligible for the offices of Lord Chancellor of England and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Now that we have had a Catholic Viceroy of India and a Catholic Lord Chief Justice of England, Catholic Ministers of the Crown, Catholic Ambassadors to foreign courts, such a disability is properly out of date. The Bill further repeals the provisos inserted in the Emancipation Act that make the existence of Jesuits and other religious orders in England illegal, and those that forbid the wearing of vestments in public, the point invoked last year to stop the Eucharistic Congress procession. These provisos are obsolete, it is true, in this sense that the religious orders are not interfered with, and Catholic priests say Mass in public in every military camp. But as Mr. Belloc pointed out dormant penal laws are dangerous things, for under a wave of anti-Catholic agitation a timid or hostile ministry might be tempted to revive them.

As usual, Mr. T. M. Healy made the most telling speech of the debate. A Unionist member, Sir John Kennaway, had declared that it was the ambition of Catholics to dominate the Empire. "I wonder," said Mr. Healy, "the honorable baronet can vote with a safe conscience, for a Catholic, Lord Edmond Talbot, is one of the whips of his party, who directs him how to vote. I wonder is the King safe with all those Catholics about him. Why, the Duke of Norfolk carried the crown before the King put it on. Every Colonial Parliament," he said, "had passed a resolution in favor of this insulting declaration being removed. One would think the King was only King of Sandy Row, the Orange quarter of Belfast. Don't forget he is also King of Connemara and of Quebec. And it was only on the King this outrage was inflicted." He quoted an old act of Edward VI, still unrepealed, punishing with fine and imprisonment those who reviled the Sacrament of the Altar. The King was made to revile it. "Well," he said, "Protestants have the consolation of knowing that whichever view is false they have an Act of Parliament to support it." He ended by asking the House to abolish this "scandalous declaration" in the interest not only of Catholics but of Protestants also, many of whom now held the Catholic doctrine on this point.

All the honors of the debate were on the side of justice, and the repeal of the disabilities is now a question that cannot be permanently shelved. The last vestiges of the penal laws will be very soon swept away.

Austria's attention, as that of many other great nations, is turned towards the conquest of the air. Her first aeroplane has been constructed by a well-known engineer, Hipssich, and another has been planned by an aviator of note, Dr. Kress. The latter is receiving assistance from the Austrian "Flugtechnische Verein," organized last February under the presidency of General-Major Leopold Sahleyer, which has already a membership of 500. The success of the American Wright brothers has had an acknowledged influence on this movement.

THE CIRCLE AND THE CROSS

Sheep had cropped the turf of its sweet freshness, and the wild moor ponies had come after them and cropped it closer still, so that the Stranger found a resting place prepared for him, and not by the hand of man.

The place was solitary: few places in England are so far from the sounds of modern life. The time was late Autumn and the little plot of grass was ringed in by close gorse bushes whose golden petals caught the sunlight and seemed to hold it fast whilst they played with it, and yielded up their mellow fragrance joyously. The stranger pulled out a knife and with its long blade cut a few bunches of heath and threw them on the turf to make a seat. He pulled out an old tobacco pouch and filled his pipe, searching the distance as he did so.

His eyes traveled along a line of unhewn, irregular stones placed in a double row, three feet apart, by the hands of some "rude forefathers" of his race. He could follow them to a ruined circle at one end of the line, and a huge granite monolith at the other.

"Who had put these things in their everlasting habitations?" he wondered.

Hundreds of years had passed, and they were still in their place: the winds of heaven had fought with them: the thunder of the elements had witnessed to the lightning that played about them, yet here they still remained, and their voices were heard among them.

His eyes were attracted by a great stone that had been fractured long ago, and he rose from the heather to examine it. Oh! it was that, was it? Strange that it should lie there broken and neglected whilst those other stones, placed in position long before this one, should still fulfil their purpose. It had been a directing post, perhaps, for travellers in medieval days, this now broken cross. At least that was the reason most people gave to explain the presence of the crosses on the moor.

But was it only a direction post? Could it by any chance have had any other meaning? What meaning could it have had?

He did not know: but after all it was rather strange that this particular cross should have been placed there, in that lonely spot, so close to that weird row of stones with its mysterious circle, and the monolith that seemed to stand like a challenge in stone.

A challenge! What sort of challenge? He had no views on these things; religion was a matter of temperament: he did not know anything about religion: the earth and the sky were enough for him.

How could he tell what the stone was meant to do or signify?

He sat down again and relit his pipe. These lonely places were certainly very impressive, but after all man is a social being and he would not care to live here always. He sat and smoked: how silent it all was!

"Marnin', zur."

He started involuntarily. What a fool he was, he thought, before looking up and answering "Good morning." He held up his pouch: the other took it without speaking and sat down a few feet away from him. Instinctively the Stranger knew, and the rough moorman knew the other to be sympathetic. The moorman was the first to break the silence.

"I bin watchin' yew," he said, "baint like other volks, I seed."

"What do you mean? Why am I not like other folks?"

"Well, you're more quieter like: maist volks that cooms upo' the moor 'pears more like zanies than Kirstians; rins about and hollas, same as eef um was mazed: so I didn't spak tu'ee till I owned yew wint like to they. Can't abide zanies, no more cud Veyther: Veyther cudn't. 'Tain't vitty', a saith. Us moor volk never doth."

"It's clean contrary to the spirit of the moor," began the other, but the old moorman let him get no further.

"Sperrits, zur! yew'm right. Contrar' to the sperrits it be; the sperrits doant like it, an' us doant like to zee um crassed. Sune as I see yew, I owned yew warn't one o' they vis'tors as us calls um, right sart of a luke to un, and so a hath, I zaid. Now these yer vis'tors didn't niver aught to be 'lowed upo' the moor; so many drashels, us says."

The stranger was wise in his generation, and let the old man speak his mind without interruption.

How tall he was, and long of limb, yet so spare, and so ungainly! His beard was ragged; his eyes had the distant look that belongs equally to shepherds and to men that use the sea, and behind the distant look a latent fire.

His clothes were strong and of good rough quality, but stained and patched everywhere. His hair fell full upon the collar of his coat, after the old moor fashion, and his voice was the voice of Devonshire, pure unschooled dialect, every word of which seemed to carry the listener back to the days when words were fewer, and for that reason fuller of deep meaning than they are to-day.

"Sperrits! youm right. Veyther seed um. Naw, I've niver sed um, but I've h'ard um, many's the time; an' when Veyther tell that tale at the Vox an' Oun's there niver was no man wad ventur' forth to fare alone. Nay, iv'ry wan must nades vind a mate. Vor, our volks they knawed it were trow.

'Our volks bain't vules like sum o' they vis'tors, fro' Lunnon an' sich. Why, yew wint niver credit it, zur, but I've a sed they vules a stannin' on thickey stoan: just for games, mind yew. Why, I wudn't stan' upo' thickey stoan not ver all the goold in t' king's throon, except mayhaps for shelter like, same as Veyther did, yew se, zur.

"I'll tell yew what it's ben, zur; 'tis a cross put up along ago by th' old people as lived in old ancient times to kape the sperrits in ther plaace.

Thereupon the Stranger found his thoughts travelling back to a certain passage in the Scriptures concerning a homeless sprite that sought rest in a dry place and found none; and at once the marsh and bog seemed to be a little more mysterious, a little more uncanny, when he remembered the old belief that such spots as he was resting in were the habitation of fiends, who have found some rest, some place to call their own.

He resisted the thought. What was the old man saying?

"Thees zummer vis'tors cooms here w'in the days be long and vine an' the weather is all made vor play, an' they doant believe in sperrits, but us volk that lives upo' the Moor, us knows diff'rent; vor us lives here in the winter time and often hears the witches on their broomsticks shrieking to one another, and the sperrits calling out aloud while they dances.

"After what Veyther se in thicy plaace, 'a go'th to Passon, an' telleth um what a zeed. An old fashioned, high learnt sart of a man, 'e wor, an' knawed a lot about them old by-gone days, an' papishers, an' sich, an' a tell'th Veyther thickey cross used to stan' about here all vitty, just a purpose vor to kape they sperrits in ther plaace like; an' whin Veyther says to up, 'Shall us put un up in plaace agin?' Passon vetches down a girt Bible an' rades to un out of it about a chap as meddled wi' the Ark; 'pears as if he'd no right to, but was aveared sumthin' mut happen to un. And the Almighty was angered at un interfarin wheer a had no call, an' strook un daid."

"So Pason rade that, an' Veyther did'n see as there was any more to be zaid."

"It must have been a dreadful thing that your father saw," said the Stranger.

"Yew mut zo, zur. Veyther warn't niver quite the zame agin. Yew zee, zur, 'twere thickey way."

But it is not everyone who cares for Devonshire dialect, and so the Stranger must tell the story as he heard it, and as he can best remember it.

"Twas in January, look sir, and the weather was mortal rough, but Father he never cared for weather, being born and bred on the moor. Now Father had a few colts lying out same as they do all winter—us calls the ponies colts, you know sir, if they live to be a hundred—and Father was thinking they might be the better for a bit o' meat and so he started in fair weather to go and look for them, him and the dog. He was riding one colt and had another beside him with a bundle of hay and a bit of corn tied pack-saddle fashion, as every one did in those days: Father remembered the first cart ever came into our Parish.

"You may happen to have noticed a little bit of a linhay, it looketh so what be left of it, over beyant where I was coming from?

"Oh! well, never mind, no matter sir, that's all there be left of it and not much to speak of at any rate, but its where Father used to live them days, only Mother didn't like it and so Father shifted nearer the in-country.

"Well, as I was saying, Father started out with a bit of meat for his colts and a bit of victual for himself like, same as all us sort of chaps doth, in fair weather, seemingly.

"Well, Father found his colts and had his own bite and sup, and was just setting forth to go back to his home again, when he felt, so he always used to say, all of a sudden a chill come all over him, and the mist rose up all around him so thick he couldn't see the colt alongside. No, Sir, no reins to 'um; they pack ponies used to run one by the side of t'other. The mist was that thick you couldn't see the nose before your face, as the saying is.

"Now Father being born and bred on the moor he didn't make much of it at first, but it warn't long before he saw he was going to be beat. How did he know that, sir? Why, because he passed the same bit of fuzz by some rough ground and rock twice in fifteen minutes.

"Father knew the meaning of that so he got off and made for to sit it out, hoping the mist might go as sudden as it came.

"But what made Father a bit skeery like was the way old Ship—that's the dog, you know sir, began to carry on. His tail was close to his haunches, and his eyes had a sort of scared look in them and he began to whine. Father didn't like it, out there alone, so he gave the dog somethin' to whine for, but the dog didn't take not a bit of notice, only went on whining, and looking more and more scared. And then the colts, that's the ponies, sir, they began to crowd into each other and want to get close up to Father as if they knowed he was diff'rent to they.

"Father got up and talked to them comfortable like, and moved them a few yards and set down again; and so it happened * * * Father always said the Almighty knew him to be a God-fearing man, if he did have to let his pony take him home on market nights now and again, so Father happened to sit down on that very same stone we're a looking at now. Yes, it were broken then, been broken for hundreds of years most like, been the same ever since any one could mind.

"Now, just as Father touched that there old cross he heard a scream, an' the dog he went off in a fit and the ponies' eyes was mad with fear. An' then Father sen it.

"Out of the mist there came a roaring worse nor any thunder no man ever heard, and Father could see hundreds of little fires in the mist, and he was frightened so he couldn't speak, for the fires was living eyes.

"And there came up such wisht sounds out of the darkness, would make the tears run down his face whenever he tells of it; sounds like the river makes in flood when you'm a good way off, you know, Sir: a wailing and sobbing as could melt a heart of iron, and then mayhap fearsome screams making him think of souls in agony.

"What Father said was strangest of all to him was the 'pearance of the moor when the blackness parted for a moment.

"Twere all alive, and it were alive with anger.

"The bushes waved and nodded like creatures fighting, and the fire ran along the ground like poison snakes, so as you would think the earth and the air and everything else was nought but hate.

"Living, fearsome hate that would do itself an injury rather than miss doing hurt of some sort.

"And all around that piece of stone the fires ran and danced; and Father said—You see, sir, when the turf has grown between the pieces of broken stone and made a sace of half a foot or thereabouts—well, Father said the sperrits come pasing to and fro over that, and round and round, making fierce signs and noises as if they wanted to lay their hands on him and couldn't. And then the lightning come in great long forks and the thunder crashed louder and louder and the sperrits screamed and yelled at Father to frighten him, Father said, so he should fall off the stone; and Father said he must have gone only the Almighty kept him safe.

"No, sir, Father never knew how long it lasted; it was as if it always was so 'in the beginning, now, and ever shall be,' Father said, as if it had befallen him to be carried into another world where all things was at strife, and always had been. And all the mist was full of suffering tnd pain and the cries of wandering souls.

"Seemed to Father as if the sperrits was angered with him, and he never thought for why, but afterwards he knew it was because they'd missed their prey like, and Father knew it was that old cross that done it.

"So he lay on thickey stoan like a corpse laid out for burial, nor niver moved; seemed as if he couldn't; as if some'at more stronger than him, and more stronger than them fearful things kept him there. And his body was like a dead man's, but his thoughts was all amove, and his sight—Well, Father wished as how he had been born blind. Father used to say no one could never tell what it was like: seemed as if he were that helpless, tied hand and foot, adrift on the raging sea.

"One time, worst of all, it 'peared as if he were in the black mouth of hell, and had bid there thousands and thousands of years, and the next moment 'twere as if earth and sky were all afire and the blaze of it such as no man's eyes could look upon.

"Father always used to say no one need try to tell him there warn't no hell. Father seen himself, so 'twarnt no manner of use to deny it.

"Frightened? You may well say that, sir. Father was that scart and mazed he couldn't move a finger; couldn't think of nought, only just bid there and felt the pulse of his heart go dead like, and gave himself up for lost for evermore, as if it had always been so, with him lying on that stone with the fear of death about him, and worse than the fear of death in his heart, and as if it always would be so. Only Father knew that if he left that bit of stone Mother nor no one wouldn't never see him again; for he knew therè was virtue in it.

"And then Father did a funny thing, as you might say.

"He learnt it off a foreigner, one of they chaps we took prisoner in the war long ago and the Gov'ment sent out of the way down to these parts. Father never done it before, but he'd seen this mate of his do it many a times when he said his prayers.

"Perhaps you're seen some of our folk do it, sir, he just touched his forehead with his finger and then his chest right and left and again, and wit it he said, 'Lord a' mercy on us,' same as he'd seen his mate do.

"And Father said soon as he done that, he could see a lane cut out of the mist like, and the walls of it was all afire, and at the end of it there was a creature flying for its life, and the hair of its head looked like snakes coiling everywhere.

"Then, Lord ha' mercy, he see the sperrits what had been trying to drive him from that bit of stone turn round sudden, screaming that awful, you wouldn't never believe, sir, and made as if for to chase that other fearful thing; and as they chased they struck at one another with wings and claws.

"Next, then come a bigger flash than ever, and a roar of sound like all the rivers and all the seas in one; so the mist closed up again, and all was black.

"No, Sir, Mother found Father lying on that great stone, with his eyes open, but he didn't see nothing. So Mother dashed water on him and he come to, but he was that weak Mother had to help him to climb up into the saddle, and lead the colt home herself. You see she tied Father's legs for he couldn't sit steady.

"The dog, sir? Oh! he was dead as anything, with his teeth bared and showing over his lips; clean scart to death; and the ponies they was never seen again. Run off and got lost in a bog, most like; smothered, you know, sir.

"You see Mother rid up to look for Father, fearing some'at had happened mostlike. And so she found him like a dead man lying on that stone. Then, when she brought him to, she got him up into the saddle and led him home; but Father was never the same man again.

"Yes, sir. Mother was a main religious woman, always was, but she never liked the moor, nor do none of us specially about winter time, same as now.

"Us has often heard strangs things on the moor; more than us likes to talk about, for the sperrits have got the moor, and they don't like to be crossed.

"Howsomever, I do wish the right folk would come along and put they crosses in their place again; sems as if 'twarn't right to leave them lying there.

All qualified Spaniards except notaries, priests, and those over seventy years of age are now compelled to vote under penalties ranging from public censure to a fine of 2 per cent. in increased taxation, and for a second offence a man may be declared ineligible for public office. To exercise the franchise is a civic duty, and to neglect it is a civic injustice. It will be interesting, however, to see how a compulsory vote will tell on the elections in Spain.

The Mexican government has purchased from Senator Ramon Alcázar, of Guanajato, a unique collection of Mexican antiquities, including 30,000 pieces of pottery, two of which were valued at $30,000. Besides the pottery there are 300 specialties of Chinese art, 400 timepieces, 6,000 medals and coins, a complete set of Mexican postal stamps valued at $7,000, and a great variety of armor, swords, arquebuses and other objects of historical interest. The government hopes to have them classified in time for the approaching centenary of Mexican independence.

A Monument Reserve

It will be remembered that last August several members of the St. Boniface Historical Society, of Manitoba, unearthed on the shore of the Northwest Angle of the Lake of the Woods, the skeletons and other remains of Father Aulneau, S.J., young De la Vérendrye, son of the discoverer of the Red River valley, and nineteen companions, massacred by the Sioux in 1736. This great historical find, one of the most important ever made in America, was the result of researches set on foot by Father Joseph Blain, S.J., almost twenty years ago, and finally carried to a most successful issue by himself and Father Julian Paquin, S.J., assisted by Rev. Dr. Béliveau, chancellor of the Archdiocese of St. Boniface, Manitoba, the Hon. Judge Prud'homme, and several Jesuit scholastics and laybrothers. A letter, dated May 15, from Father Paquin to Dr. Charles G. Herbermann, President of the U. S. Catholic Historical Society, says:

Since you are so much interested in the discovery of Fort St. Charles, I may give you a special pleasure in informing you that the U. S. Government, on the request of the Most Rev. Archbishop Ireland, has consented to make the site a "Monument Reserve." As soon as the ice on the Lake of the Woods has thawed away, I shall go to the site, identify it officially, and report it to the Government on a chart sent me. This spot will thus be forever dedicated to the memory of the pioneers of Christian Faith and civilization in this Western country.

Froude and the Carlyles

"Give a lie an hour's start and you cannot overtake it," is an old saying, and it would be too much to hope that Mr. Froude's calumny on the Carlyles will be overtaken and slain by the facts which have just been made public in the two volumes of "The Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Walsh." Portions of this correspondence were published without the consent of the family, and in many cases mutilated by Mr. Froude in his "Reminiscences," which achieved that most profitable of successes, a succès de scandale, more than twenty years ago. Under the circumstances Carlyle's family is quite justified in submitting all the letters to the judgment of the world, and correcting the lamentable misconception as to the significance of the correspondence, and the co-partnership of the writers. That the contents of the volumes do refute the Froude slander is the deliberate judgment of two such authorities as Mr. Justin McCarthy and Mr. W. S. Lilly. Mr. Froude as a historian has long been bankrupt. His predecessor in the chair of Modern History at Oxford once said: "When we have read Mr. Froude's account of any matter we know at all events one way in which it did not happen." And Mr. Lilly, writing in the current Nineteenth Century and After, says, he is just "as audaciously mendacious in biography." When Professor Norton issued a corrected edition of Froude's "Reminiscences" in 1887, he was obliged to make one hundred and thirty-six corrections in the first six pages, so amputated, disembowelled, and altered was the text of the Letters. The Sage of Chelsea, with all his faults, was not the brutal, selfish being painted by Froude, for unworthy ends.

As a word painter Froude was a master, as a historian he was an unscrupulous advocate, and the Carlyle legend was not his only perversion of talent.

Catholic Movement in Argentina

There has been a series of congresses in the Argentine Republic since last October—a workingmen's congress in Santa Fè, a diocesan in Tucuman, and a national in Cordoba. Besides these ten others were held within a short space, viz.: four of the workingmen's unions, three of the Franciscan tertiaries, three of young men's clubs; three were general. At the workingmen's congress last October the resolutions passed referred to the Catholic religious and racial instruction among the union members, the founding and organizing of clubs for study, the building of a central hospital for the clubs, the diffusion of good literature, and chiefly of El Trabajo, the journal of the unions; the founding of cooperative stores, the establishing of patronages of apprentices in the circles, the foundation of book agencies. This program is instructive. The diocesan congress was the first of its kind and lasted eight days. The members had gathered from the three provinces that constitute the diocese, in order to study the religious, social and economic problems affecting the welfare of the diocese. The presidency was given to Doctor Marina Alforo, a man of great learning and experience who is considered the soul of all the many good works in Tucuman. The works carried on by different societies were reviewed and new ones planned. In the closing discourse Mgr. Padilla said that there were two subjects which have to be kept prominent in diocesan congresses, Christian education and the Holy Eucharist. This had been done in the present congress. Speaking of education he quoted these words of Father Veiss: "If society to-day is threatened with ruin, the fault lies with the modern school and godless education, and the responsibility is with the rulers who impose a godless education and the godless school on children, on parents, on teachers."

Socializing Religion

In our issue of May 15, reviewing a symposium of The Outlook on the question: "Should Ministers Know Life," the writer ventured to differ from the views set down in two remarkable articles by clergymen attacking the education given in theological seminaries. According to these gentlemen, seminaries should throw overboard a lot of the deadwood in their traditional curriculum and put their main strength into sociology, economics, pedagogy and ethics. Workingmen, so the argument runs, are more and more standing aloof from Protestant churches; to Socialism many of them are transferring the feeling which they once had for religion: therefore, religion must take on a tinge of Socialism to win them back.

It is with pleasure that one notes the attitude of a leading secular journal, the New York Evening Post, in reference to these views. Like the writer in AMERICA, an editorial writer in the Post of May 29, questions the need of any such "socializing" of religion, and illustrates his contention by an example that is at once strikingly obvious and apt:

"Such conceptions and hopes are amiable," says this writer, "but the fear caused by the growing alienation of wage-earners from the churches, should not blind the latter. Take the great fact of the relation of the Catholic Church to workingmen. This is seldom referred to in the laments of Protestants over their slackening hold upon the toilers, yet it is most significant. Here we have a vast religious organization, the very life-blood of which in this country has been the attachment and devotion of the working-classes, but do we find it saying that it must move heaven and earth to bring itself up-to-date and become 'socialized'? Nothing of the kind. On the contrary, the weight of Catholic authority has been cast against Socialism; and the Pope is as much opposed to 'modernity' in labor and political movements as in theological."

Laymen's Retreats in America

The announcement on another page that a House of Retreats for laymen is about to be opened in New York should prove of interest and value to the readers of AMERICA everywhere. If the civil, moral and industrial condition of Belgium afford a model to all Governments to-day, it is partly owing to the admirable systems of retreats for men of every class and calling, which have imbued the Belgian laity with sound principles of thought and conduct and with zeal for the application of these principles to every form of social activity.

It is a false though widespread notion that the priest is the sole custodian of religion and morality, and that if the layman attends Mass and the Sacraments according to requirements, he has done enough. The layman as well as the priest is "his brother's keeper." Every man has an apostolate. "Thy Kingdom Come" was meant for all; and the man who lets it die upon the lips and makes no effort to extend it to his brother, has done nothing to make the Kingdom of God—the principles of truth and justice—come into the hearts of men. The priest can lay down the line of thought and duty, but for one priest, there are thousands of laymen; and it is the thousands that must do the work. The Retreats have shown the Belgian laymen how to do it; have inspired them with such zeal in its accomplishment that they and their country are an example to the world.

In America we have at least equal need of such a guide and stimulus. Fads and fallacies, lax, false and dangerous principles boldly announced in universities and schools, in press and platform and even in the pulpit, are threatening our institutions and our liberties. The Catholic Church is the conservator of true liberty; it is the authorized exponent of the Sermon on the Mount which lays down the equality of righteousness, the basis of Christian democracy. It is for the Catholic layman to enact and uphold the platform of Christian righteousness; and it is to imbue him with sound knowledge of its principles and zeal for their application that a House of Retreats is about to be opened in New York. A few days of thoughtful, prayerful consideration under the direction of experienced guides, will serve to winnow the mind of false and instil it with true appreciations; will freshen and stimulate the energies with a healthy and holy ambition. In an age that "thinks with eye and ear," such retreats will foster thinking with head and heart.

It is a happy omen that the laymen of New York have themselves initiated the movement. His Grace Archbishop Farley has given them full approbation and helpful encouragement. The Jesuit priests will devote themselves to the work as earnestly here as in Belgium, and the prominence, zeal and ability of the gentlemen in charge, give promise of successful accomplishment and future development.

The Retreats, which are now established in every district in Belgium, commenced a few years ago with half a dozen gentlemen of Ghent. There is no reason why the Retreat that is about to be opened at Fordham should not lead the way to a similar extension through the country. Financial and moral support is all that is needed; and if the moral support is healthy and compelling, the finance will take care of itself. It is a movement that demands the consideration and hearty cooperation of clergy and laity alike. Intelligently supported and fostered, it should constitute in our land a bulwark of faith and morals and civic strength.

Unitarian Week in Boston

The Unitarians have been enjoying their anniversary week in Boston. The verb is chosen advisedly, not to describe the afternoon teas at the Unitarian Association Building in Beacon street, or other social festivities, agreeable as these may have been, but for the prevailing tone of their regular meetings as reported in the daily press. There is a ring of light-hearted cheer running through all these accounts.

These gatherings are made up of members of a religious sect, both clergy and laity, but there seems to be such a secular atmosphere throughout, that one is inclined to wonder where the religion comes in. At the very outset, a professor from a Kansas university announces that the old prevalent idea that the clergy are in any sense special organs or mouthpieces of God must be given up; that "the old theological idea of sin has not a leg left to stand upon"; that the intelligent, thinking man of the "Present Now" knows better than that. The doctrine of "Church of All Good Men" is that of social justice to all men. The title of the so-called Church may be new, but there seems to be no very striking novelty in the doctrine to the ears of a Christian believer.

The note of cheer comes out also in the statement that Unitarianism is liberalizing the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and a list of places is given where Unitarian views are finding a new lodgment. A very up-to-date atlas is needed to find out where some of these places are. No Unitarian meeting would be possible without their Shibboleth "liberal" or "liberalizing" coming in, and this week is no exception. One is tempted to ask why the denial of some of the fundamental truths of Christ's religion is either liberal or liberalizing? What special messages of importance the Unitarian sect has to offer, the reports fail signally in expressing with any clearness. One meeting at Arlington street church was for the furthering of the betterment of social conditions, and among the speakers welcomed were Jewish Rabbis and one Episcopalian clergyman.

Rev. Thomas Van Ness's contribution to the Congress was a frank statement of pure Pantheism, while Rev. Minot Simons took as his subject, "Prayer." Whether he is competent to speak on that subject might seem to be questionable. He appealed to his hearers to refrain from a flattering adulation of the Deity, which at least sounds like a blasphemous presumption on the part of any weak human creature towards the Supreme Being, his Creator and Preserver, but Mr. Simons goes on to say, "the lifting up of the heart to God even if indulged in but once a year leaves a man the better for it." The phrase, "indulged in," seems hardly a happy choice, as it is commonly used to denote a yielding to some frailty of human nature. Can it be possible that this is Mr. Simon's attitude towards prayer? Are these feeble vaporings the best that can be offered the world after centuries of enlightenment?

The President's Policy

When meeting the President on the day of the Mecklenburg celebration, Mrs. "Stonewall" Jackson said: "I am indeed delighted to know the harmonizer of all our hearts." Evidently President Taft is adding to his popularity in the South. His appointment of a leading Democratic lawyer to the federal bench in North Carolina, thus conferring a non-political life office upon a member of the opposition party, is an evidence of his disposition to consult the public good in filling offices in the Southern States. His reason for this departure is sincerely explained by the President. "I do not believe that we are on the point of a political revolution in the South; I never had such a dream. What I do desire and believe we are on the eve of is a complete tolerance of opinion, and that there shall grow into respect and power an intelligent fighting opposition party in each State of the Union." Tactful carrying out of a policy thus clearly proclaimed ought to effect other results than an increase of the personal popularity of the President. Intelligent Democrats of the South have been urging the necessity of such a party in their respective States. Every majority party in a Democracy is the better for a strong militant minority party ready to expose and denounce its blunders. A harmonious and energetic opposition is the best safeguard against the mistakes of a dominant majority.

Japan and its Sugar Trust

While the Japanese sugar-trust scandal, the latest bit of Oriental news, has been facetiously set down by some as an indication of "advance in civilization by Western methods," Japan's method of suppressing it might very well be copied in the West. The Sugar Trust has been trying for two sessions to sell out to the Government, but in order to do so advantageously, it first sent up the price of stock by declaring dividends that were not earned. Then it proceeded "to accelerate legislation" by distributing $60,000 among some fifty of the legislators. The stock-takers who lost by the transaction, many of them foreigners, made loud complaint. The Government promptly instituted a rigorous inquiry with the result that over twenty members of the diet and all the Directors of the Company have been arrested. The arm of the law is being stretched into places high and low impartially. The Japanese press is unanimous in its praise of the Government's vigorous measures which have saved the public credit and enhanced its own reputation. The outcry against "felonious finance" has been far louder in the United States, and alleged expenditures in bribery incomparably larger; but in resolute corrective action Japan appears to have the advantage.

LITERATURE

Faith and Works of Christian Science. By the author of "Confessio Medici." New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25.

Christian Science in the Light of the Holy Scripture. By I. M. Haldeman. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.50.

Here are two books, one by a physician and the other by a divine, combating Christian Science. The former aims to prove that Christian Science is not a science; the latter that it is not Christian; both are in a measure successful. Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton has said "that Christian Science is a mean and disgusting philosophy, preached by people who are quite nice." How to prove the prime statement without offending the sensibilities of the nice people is quite a problem. The physician in "Faith and Works," tries to do so, yet cannot escape contending from most striking evidence that the high priestess of the cult, Mrs. Eddy, is a humbug. One might perhaps avoid this by surmising that the lady by auto-suggestion had hypnotized herself into believing her own teaching, if only the surmise had a chance of being correct. The divine in the "Light of the Holy Scriptures" has this charitable word to say (it is the best he can do): "If the woman whom thousands call 'Mother,' and some consider as very God, is sincere, then those who prevail with God would do well to make her the subject of earnest prayer as one of the unconscious agents whom Satan finds." For Dr. Haldeman frankly faces, as a probable chief factor in the whole business, "Satan—so appealing by sweetness and light and apparent truth that, if it were possible, he should deceive the very elect."

Nevertheless, given a woman of strong will and some power of hypnotic suggestion, and an appreciation of the fact that nervous affections both of mind and body as well as resulting functional disorders and even organic local disease of the type known technically as "nervous mimicry" can be largely relieved by suggestion and mild hypnotic influence, you have the making of a healer. Granted a number of individuals, gentle or rude, wise or simple, rich or poor, who have received either temporarily or permanently calm of spirit after distress of mind or conscience, quiet of nerves after chronic nervous indisposition, the correction of physical function disturbed by nervous indisposition, or the removal of real symptoms which from the same source have produced an imitation or mimicry of organic local disease, you have a large and sympathetic following. This following, owing to the wide prevalence of nervous troubles in this day of hurry, will include a fair proportion of very pleasant refined people. Supposing now an ill-balanced, egotistic mind, in search of rational backing for such healing as a system, to come across some of the archetypal ideas of Plato, a smattering of Berkeley and a brief for subjective Pantheism, we are on the way to understanding the genesis of the "olla podrida" of God All-in-All; matter is nothing; disease, death, evil, sin—all unreal; mortal mind masquerading as an entity while it is none such; reproduction of species by mental effort; and all the rest of the pseudo-philosophic contradictions taught as new science. If now there is a desire to assimilate the cures of the new science to the miracles of healing wrought by our Lord Jesus Christ, you have the provocation which would induce the perversion of the Scriptures to the sense of the new Scientist and the assumption of a Christianity which eliminates Christ. The careful reader of the wide literature, which has sprung up about this movement, will not find the above suggestions of the process of its development far-fetched. They may not tell the whole story, but they will be found to convey the gist of the matter.

The Doctor of Medicine in "Faith and Works," while properly taking exception to the absurdities, the internal contradictions of the philosophic teachings of Christian Science, naturally lays stress upon its outrages against common sense in the matter of medical treatment. Christian Science teaches that all diseases are mental. There are none of them really anywhere. They are all a dream of mortal mind. Consistently, urges the doctor, all drugs, being matter, are unreal, a dream. Yet common sense clamors that, dream or no dream, quinine cures malaria; an utterly decayed tooth must be removed or the nerve killed to ensure relief from pain; contagious and infectious diseases are communicated; our asylums are filled with the blind, the deaf and paralytic cripples. He then takes up a wearisome list of two hundred cases of reported healing by Christian Science and with little effort shows their insignificance. He sums it all up in the conclusion that "Christian Science has never cured, nor ever will, any disease, except those which have been cured a hundred thousand times by mental therapeutics." He concedes, however, that many pleasant people have been made happier by a form of "Quietism," which has been engrafted on them.

Dr. Haldeman's treatment of his subject is by way of the deadly parallel, aligning proposition after proposition of the authentic teachings of Christian Science with clear texts of the New Testament in contradiction. In the four chapters directly devoted to "Christian Science and Christ" he makes an appalling array of heresy, new and old, and indicates the blasphemous character of not a few of the preachments of Mrs. Eddy. Summarily, he makes it clear that Christian Science denies the inspiration of the Scripture except in so far as expounded in Mrs. Eddy's book, "Science and Health;" denies the creation of man from the dust, all sin, original or actual, and death; eliminates the Blessed Trinity, the reality of the Incarnation and death of Christ, of the resurrection, the ascension of the humanity of Jesus, the coming again for judgment, the existence of hell or Satan; in a word, denies practically everything about Christ our Lord except His miracles of healing. Even to these all supernatural character is denied; they are not miracles, but archetypal instances of the cures of Christian Science.

What shall we say to the good people who have taken up with Christian Science? What can we say? Are we to follow them through all the multitudinous vagaries of a set of pseudo-mystical doctrines. Life is too short. We still contend that controversy does not spell conversion. It would appear that the plain, simple, insistent teachings of the truth, as revealed by God and safe-guarded by the Church, would be the most economical, and after all perhaps the most efficient, way to win back to God the souls that have in good faith been drawn astray. Yet doubtless there is wisdom too, in Dr. Haldeman's final shot. He addresses to the reader the solemn warning of St. Paul: "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding the profane novelties of words, and oppositions of knowledge [science, in the King James version] falsely so called, which some promising, have erred concerning the faith." (I. Tim. VI., 20, 21.)

C. B. MACKSEY, S.J.

The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. V. New York: Robert Appleton Company.

It is a saying in the Gaelic: "Of reeds a round hut is made, of drops a pond," and the present writer remembers how that saying came home to him as he stood one evening on Prebend's Bridge over the turbid Wear and looked up at the stately pile of Durham Cathedral. The old monks who took hundreds of years to build it were in no hurry; they were building for eternity. Abbots and bishops succeeded one another and each contributed his share to the work, an aisle, a tower, an arch, a cloister, a buttress, a window, a door-head. The arts and crafts and styles of many lands were laid under tribute till the completed work became the poor man's book. Then came the Reformation and robbed him of his alphabet so that he could read it no longer. But that is another story.

This is an age not of Cathedrals but of encyclopedias: Yet the methods of building are just the same. We have received the fifth volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," a new wing added to a monumental work, which promises to rival Durham Cathedral in what Dr. Johnson called "its rocky solidity and appearance of indeterminate duration." In it the spoil of many lands is being brought together, the thought of all the ages rifled, the arts and sciences bound into a sheaf and laid in homage on the altar of revealed truth. Some of the workers on the earlier volumes have laid down their pens for ever; among them are the learned critic Brunetière, the great astronomer, Agnes Clerke; Bishop Stang and Father Portalié, S.J., cut off in the summer of his life, and Charles Stanton Devas, the great Catholic Sociologist. Their places have been taken by other writers. In the volume before us which goes from Diocese to Father, there are 632 articles from the pens of 224 writers, including 64 new names. Father Baccus, of the Oratory; Father Cathrein, who has written so ably on social questions; Bishop Donnelly, from the banks of the Liffey; Dr. Hyvernât, from the shores of the Bosphorus; W. S. Lilly and Father Lucas, well known to the English-reading public; Professor Saltet, from Toulouse, who ably unravels the tangled history of the scientists, are among the new collaborators. The Catholicity of the work is preserved not only in the choice of articles and in their treatment, but in the writers themselves. 97 belong to the United States, 7 to Canada, 47 to England, 13 to Ireland, 1 to New Zealand, 1 to South Africa. France contributes 11, Germany 8, Italy 9, Belgium 7, Holland 6, Austria 4, Spain 2, Switzerland 2, Mexico 7, Denmark 1, New Guinea 1, Turkey 4, and Luxembourg 2. And so successfully and so carefully has the editing been done that we find all these Parthians, Medes and Elamites writing in our own tongue the wonderful works of God.

It is hardly fair to the volumes that have gone before to say that this is better, since each letter of the alphabet has its limitations and certain subjects are more fascinating than others, but in Volume V. "the lines have fallen in pleasant places." The articles on Diocese, Divorce, Dispensation, Evolution, Egypt, Van Eyck, Fasting, and Family are of supreme interest and are treated with a liberality of view and of space that must recommend them to every reader of intelligence who understands the English language. In Evolution, Father Wasmann emphasizes, what is too often forgotten, that evolution and Darwinism are two different things, and that while Darwinism is scientifically inadequate, and untenable as a theory, evolution as a theory within certain limits is not per se improbable, though as they say in Scotch Law it is "not proven," and the human soul can only owe its origin to the direct creative act of God. No encyclopedia has hitherto given such elaborate geographical detail of the various countries it treats of, and the article on Egypt, in the present volume, is an encyclopedia in itself on that interesting country. Archeologically, historically and liturgically, it is a masterpiece. The maps and the illustrations with which it abounds are as invaluable as they are unique. Indeed the technical detail of the whole volume is a joy to the lover of a well-made book. A novel and unexpected feature of the encyclopedia has been its courtesy to the Fine Arts, and in the present volume the Brothers Van Eyck and their work are the subject of a brilliant essay from the pen of M. Louis Gillet. Once more the colored plates, by Goupil (Paris) add a note of artistic distinction hitherto unlooked for in encyclopedias. The Catholic Church has at all times been the nursing mother of the arts, and it is but fitting to find due space allotted to them in a Catholic encyclopedia. The verger in Durham Cathedral hurries the visitor from the "Galilee chapel" to the "chapel of the vine altars" and points out one or other of the stately tombs and monumental brasses recalling historic names; but the lover of the past, the student of Time's changes, the Catholic who remembers what Durham once stood for, will delay over each pillar, each carved oak stall, each emblem in the stained-glass windows. I have played the part of verger for this volume of the new encyclopedia, but the lover of the truth, 'the picker up of learnings' crumbs' will take time to read the whole volume.

An American Missionary: A Record of the Work of William Judge, S.J., by REV. CHARLES J. JUDGE, S.S. Introduction by His Eminence, CARDINAL GIBBONS. Illustrated. Second edition revised and augmented.

One who reads the lives of these Modern Apostles will close the books with deep conviction that the ages of Christian heroism have not passed away. The story of the life of the Ven Théophañe Vénard is fascinating. He was a product of the renowned school of the Foreign Missions, Rue de Bac, Paris, and his portrait and relics now adorn its "Hall of Martyrs." We are pleased to note that, in its English version, the life of this hero of Christ has reached its fourth edition—a new edition each year since its first issue. The name of the translator, Lady Herbert, vouches for work of a high grade. The Boston Evening Transcript says that "the book will bear re-reading."

"Thoughts From Modern Martyrs," is a selection from the writings of Théophañe Vénard and of Just de Bretennières, another but later product of the Foreign Missions' School, who was beheaded for the Faith in Corea, March 8, 1866.

The "Life of Blessed Peter Chanel" is intended for French readers. This proto-martyr of Oceania was beatified by a decree of His Holiness, Leo XIII, dated 16th November, 1889. The life was written by a Marist and is a work of love, for the Blessed was a member of the Society of Mary. This American edition is very attractive, and we are confident that it will meet with wide approval.

The Rev. William Henry Judge, S.J., was born in Baltimore, Md., April 28th, 1850, and was admitted to the Jesuit Novitiate at the rather advanced age of twenty-five years. In 1889 he was granted leave to set out for the Rocky Mountain Mission, and shortly afterward to spend the rest of his days in Alaska. His biography is the work of his brother, the Rev. Charles J. Judge, S.S., who died a few months ago at St. Charles College, Md. The narrative is good, edifying and not without the note of thrilling adventure, for Father Judge in his apostolic career spent himself not only among the Esquimaux, to whom he was devoted body and soul, but also in aid of the fortune-seekers who had flocked to Dawson City in the earlier days of the gold-craze.

Literary Notes

Peru: Its Story, People and Religion.

By Geraldine Guinness. New York and Chicago: Fleming H. Revell Co.

This book weighs thirty-four ounces. Though handsomely got up and richly illustrated, it would be as heavy in interest as in weight but for the unconscious humor of the authoress. Her theme is the Religion of Peru, or rather, the absence of "true religion," and the supreme disrelish for the right brand and the retailers thereof, that obtains in that land. Prof. Macalister, of Cambridge University, England, guarantees in the preface that the authoress is "a student of philosophy in University college," that she has had sufficiently long experience as a missionary in Peru to acquire accurate knowledge of its people, their history, religion, manners, customs, character, etc., and yet that she is "a young lady." She has scarcely dedicated this, "my first book," when she tells us she had written another "twelve years ago, before I had entered upon my teens." And she does not leave us in such unsatisfying vagueness; towards the end of the volume she writes: "June, 1907, my nineteenth birthday." She had acquired at nineteen all her wonderful knowledge not only of Peru before and after it had become imbued with "the paganized religion of Rome," but she had followed the tortuous by-ways of the Catholic Church for twenty centuries and ferreted out its darkest secrets. She can read the hearts of the Peruvians while they are apparently absorbed in devoutest prayer and know that they are mumbling by rote and worshipping idols. But then "missionaries (of the Foreign Bible Society) are very extraordinary people." It is impossible to please this young lady. The Peruvians wear the crucifix and on every occasion make the sign of the cross; the crucifix surmounts every altar and every hill:—this is idolatry. But there is one cross that bears the Veronica picture instead of the relief image of Jesus and this she indignantly pronounces "a Christless Cross."

The priests, of course, are all very bad; the worst of it is they enthrall the people with their eloquence and hold them "by free-passes to heaven," thus becoming "links in papal despotism." One of them, a very eloquent man, but of the worst possible type, she photographed, and presents us not a photo but "a study"; opposite she writes: "Dare to look into that face"! We dared, and found it a strong, thoughtful, intellectual type that might represent an Aquinas or Augustine; but Miss Guinness sees it through the "Foreign Bible Society" microscope.

Their success in imbuing the Peruvians with a tender love of Our Lady and in consequence of holy purity, is the worst offence of the priesthood. "The priest ever using the figure of ideal motherhood to enthrall his ignorant flock, leads the women, and they lead the men." And this girl of nineteen, reared among a family of proselytizers thinks the passage so damning that she italicizes it.

There is no style or method in this heavy volume. Amateurish attempts at pathos and the childishness of its bigotry afford amusement. Her first book "was compiled of waste scraps of paper"; the second is in similar style. It ends with an appeal to the "Anglo-Teutons of America" for funds to Christianize Peru. That Bible societies respond to such appeals will account for the fact that the Revell Company insist on putting such slanderous and worthless stuff upon the market. M. K.

The Young Priest's Keepsake (Dublin:

M. H. Gill & Son), by Rev. M. Phelan, S.J., stresses the necessity of culture of mind and manners for young priests and seminarians. Father Phelan, himself a noted preacher and missionary, devotes several helpful chapters to the means of acquiring excellence in preaching, a faculty which he deems essential to effective ministry. In study or pulpit the preacher should be natural in development, diction and delivery. The book is brimful of valuable hints and helps on these heads, and their value is not diminished by the fact that the style is racy and readable throughout. Not all will agree with Father Phelan that every word and line should be written and committed to memory beforehand, that "naturalness" and "rote" can be easily reconciled and that spontaneity should be chained to a desk; but he presents a strong defence of his views, and the practice he urges is well worth cultivating. The following is intended for Irish readers but the advice has wider application. . . . "he should not commit the signal folly of attempting to ingraft an imported accent on his own; he should speak as an Irishman, but as an educated Irishman." The Young Priests' Keepsake should become a vade-mecum.

Messrs. Longmans announce a life of the saintly Bishop Challoner. He was a link between the days of persecution and the modern period. When he was a boy men were still living who had seen Catholic priests hanged, quartered and beheaded at Tyburn. When he died the first Catholic Relief Bill had just become law. There is a letter of his in which he tells how, hiding in London, he had to change his lodging four times in one week, and how a garret was at once his palace, cathedral, study, sleeping room and kitchen. We owe to him the "Memoirs of Missionary Priests," which has preserved for us the record of the English martyrs; the "Garden of the Soul," a work of popular devotion, and many other treatises. He was a great bishop, a great scholar, and a saint.

The saying that "a prophet hath honor save in his own country" is bankrupt in Mrs. Baker Eddy's case. Her life, written by Sybil Wilbur, has been severely criticized in England.

In her introduction the writer says, "I plant myself unreservedly on the methods of St. Mark." But anything less like St. Mark than the unctuous gush of this biography it is hard to conceive, says a critic in The Manchester Guardian. A chronic invalid, Mrs. Baker Eddy becomes entangled for some years in the coils of Mesmerism, Hypnotism, and Spiritualism, seeking rest for her soul and finding none. At length the definitive call takes place (p. 131). "She knew God face to face"; she "touched and handled things unseen. . . . In the year 1866 I discovered the Christ Science, or Divine Laws of Life." Critics who have called attention to the extraordinarily autocratic structure of the Church and the spiritual and temporal power which it vests in the hands of Mrs. Eddy are here dismissed with careless scorn as malicious traducers of a saintly woman. Yet it is not unnatural that a teacher, who was able in a little New England manufacturing town, at a time when her fame was purely local, to extract for teaching Mind-healing the sum of $300 from each pupil in a class for twelve half-days' instruction, should arouse inquiry into her business methods. The passage in which Mrs. Eddy discloses this business gift requires no comment.

"When God impelled me to set a price on my instruction in Christian Science Mind-healing, I could think of no financial equivalent for an impartation of a knowledge of that divine power which heals; but I was led to name three hundred dollars as the price for each pupil for one course of lessons at my college—a startling sum for tuition lasting barely three weeks. This amount greatly troubled me. I shrank from asking it, but was finally led, by a strange providence, to accept this fee. God has since shown me in multitudinous ways the wisdom of this decision (p.223)."

That $300 fee has a very material ring. But Mrs. B. Eddy has appropriated Punch's quibble: "What is matter? Never mind. What is mind? No matter."

Reviews and Magazines

A well deserved tribute to the memory of a frequent contributor to its pages, the Rev. E. Portalié, S.J., is paid by Etudes for May. It was he who unmasked in Etudes the notorious "Diana Vaughan." Joseph Fustes writes sympathetically of the great Spanish painter, Murillo. A true Christian artist; an idealist; yet a realist also in the best sense of the word, from whose canvass the supernatural speaks. Pacheco, in his "Arte de la Pintura" (1649), wrote that a great artist should keep his soul in a state of grace. To judge from his pictures, Murillo followed the advice.

Xavier Moisan proves in a solid essay on "Responsibility" that Determinism cannot be its foundation. Neither can it rest secure on the notion of solidarity or "because the universe and humanity depend upon one another." We are responsible because we are free; because we can at will perform or omit certain acts. If man never acted except under constraint, internal or external, he would be a machine. André Ducaire introduces us to a new poet, Auguste Angellier, declaring him to be "manly, eloquent: an orator in verse."

It affords one much gratification to note the strong stand taken in the Outlook of May 29 in reference to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring unconstitutional one clause of a statute of the United States prohibiting the importation of vice. The majority of the court accepted the contention "that the punishment of vice and the protection of the community from vice belong to the States, and that for the Federal Government to undertake this function is to usurp powers which under the Constitution do not belong to it." The Outlook writer dissents from this view for two reasons. The power to prohibit professional criminals from landing on our shores, he claims, ought to carry with it power also to punish any person who harbors an immigrant engaged in violation of the laws of the land as a profession. And this power, he affirms as a second reason of his dissent, is necessary since the protection of aliens ought not to be left to the States, but should be within the competency of the Federal Government. Reading the writer's vigorous development of his thesis one cannot but hope that the public conscience will speedily awaken. Surely if the law of the land does not give every required help to break up a horrible traffic whose details cannot be published for general circulation, that further extension of its powers demanded ought to be conceded without delay.

In the same number the greatest defect of the recent Mohawk Peace Conference is said to be its attitude in regard to the establishment of an International Court of Arbitral Justice. While the Conference in its platform declared emphatically in favor of the early establishment of such a court, in the public session less emphasis was placed upon the point, or at least less time was devoted to the discussion how such a court could be established.

For the benefit of the lay readers who attempt to follow the current discussions concerning the tariff the editor presents helpful definitions of such technical terms as revenue duty, protective duty, bargaining duty and countervailing duty. There is little danger of misunderstanding the Outlook's own position in the tariff discussion when one reads the judgment thus expressed: "The protective system, while advantageous in the early history of our country to produce a diversified industry and consequent economic independence, is no longer necessary to the United States, and the moral evils it involves more than counterbalance any industrial advantages."

The notice of Professor James's "New Pluralistic Philosophy" in the June number of Current Literature is apt to be rated by most readers as entirely too sympathetic. The reason may be drawn from an expression of the writer of the article: "Professor James's views are at once so novel and original, and so sharply antagonistic to tendencies now in the ascendant in the religious world, that they are sure to provoke controversy." Fortunately the probability is that the professor's work will not be widely read since "it is too speculative and lacks immediate practical application" as the same writer affirms. And this probability excuses one from standing sponsor for an explanation of William James's pantheistic, or as some prefer, atheistic desires.

The "New Pluralistic Philosophy" is a book that may be spoken of by a professor who is treating such matters in the classroom; or privately to individuals who may have had the misfortune to have read it. It simply flings aside, as unworthy of consideration, Christianity and the God of the Christians. By a curious neglect of a distinction as old as philosophy itself Professor James finds the traditional view which pictures God and His creation as separate entities "entirely alien to his present feeling."

He chooses pantheism in its stead, but a pantheism without an infinite. His book disguises its atheism in the acceptance of a finite god, whose "functions can be taken as not wholly dissimilar to those of the other smaller parts—as similar to our functions consequently" (p. 318). The "New Pluralistic Philosophy" is worse than a bad book in the ordinary sense. It rebels against the basis of the whole moral law.

SOCIOLOGY

The following explains the foundation and scope of a movement in New York City which should exert a far-reaching and salutary influence:

Professional business-men and mechanics are to have an opportunity of making spiritual retreats.

The object of these retreats is personal sanctification and spread of healthy principles among Catholic laymen in order to combat socialism where it has a hold and to prevent it from starting in new places.

The organizers consist of a body of laymen drawn from the Xavier Alumni Sodality and elsewhere who propose forming themselves into a permanent organization to carry on the work.

His Grace, The Most Reverend John M. Farley, has given his hearty approval to this movement. The Jesuit Fathers will conduct these retreats. The initial retreat will be given at Fordham University at the end of June or beginning of July; other retreats will be given from time to time during the year. The retreats will start on Friday morning so that those taking part will hardly have their business or employment interfered with. As soon as possible it is intended to secure a permanent home for the giving of retreats. The essentials of such an establishment are that it should be not far from the city, say on Staten Island or in Westchester County, and have a little ground for purposes of exercise. We trust that the foundation of such a place will appeal to people of means, as it gives them a great opportunity to aid a very important work which is destined to affect all classes.

Those who wish to interest themselves in the work and intend taking part in one of the first retreats will please address any one of the following: Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., 30 West 16th St.; Hon. George F. Roesch, 109 East 10th St.; Thos. F. Woodlock, 609 West 115th St.; Sidney J. Brimley, 35 South William St.

At the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church held in Denver, in the week of May 16-22, 1909, the Committee on Marriage and Divorce, after deploring the "scandal and sin arising from the laxity of law that makes divorce and speedy remarriage possible, says, as reported in the Philadelphia Record of May 22:

"The census tells a story that surprises the people and shames a Christian nation. We submit the following statistics:

"In 1887 the total number of divorces granted was 27,918; and in 1906, 72,062. The total number granted in 20 years was 945,625. Certain of the States granted divorces as follows: Pennsylvania in 1887, 1097 divorces, and in 1906, 3027; New York in 1887, 1042 divorces, and in 1906, 2069; North Dakota in 1897, 57 divorces, and in 1906, 320; Ohio in 1887, 2003 divorces, and in 1906, 4781; Kentucky, in 1887, 949 divorces, and in 1906, 2050; Illinois in 1887, 2663 divorces, and in 1906, 5943; Massachusetts in 1887, 752 divorces, and in 1906, 1540; and Virginia in 1887, 305 divorces, and in 1906, 1074.

"Surely the surprising and alarming increase of the number of divorces granted should call a halt, and impress all who care for their country and love righteousness with the necessity of discovering, if possible, the causes of such a condition, and the possible cure for such a calamity."

Possibly one of the causes of such a condition is to be found in chapter 24 of the "Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," published by authority of the General Assembly, Philadelphia, 1906.

Section 5 of said chapter decrees that "In the case of Adultery after marriage, it is lawful for the innocent party to sue out a divorce, and after the divorce to marry another, as if the offending party were dead."

It may be noted that another section of the same chapter decrees that "such as profess the true reformed religion should not marry with infidels, papists, or other idolaters."

Two striking bits of testimony to the evils of sectarianism given by distinguished Protestants, will be of interest to readers of AMERICA. The first is from Dr. W. T. Phillips in his weekly article on Christian Endeavor, published in the Public Ledger, Philadelphia, May 22, 1909.

"Probably the meanest type of Christianity I have ever run across in the world," says Dr. Phillips, "is what I found at several points in the Orient, where missionaries of certain American sects, avoiding the difficulties of pioneer work among the heathen, have planted themselves in the midst of the converts of older missions, and have undertaken to proselyte them for their particular tenets concerning immersion, or holiness, or some peculiar sectarian distinction. Environed by all the opportunities of the non-Christian world, and with their smallness rebuked by the presence of a great need, they yet do not hesitate to wean away from another missionary the fruit of many years of labor, all for the sake of some shibboleth. They call this foreign missions; instead it is one of the worst forms of domestic sectarianism transplanted to a foreign shore."

The second is from the address of the Rev. Doctor Baxter P. Fullerton, the retiring Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, delivered in Denver, May 20.

"The denominational contentions of today can but impress the world most unfavorably," he said. "What a waste of men and money, and what for? To bring Christ to the world? Alas, too often to build up our particular sect; and yet there still comes ringing down the centuries that prayer of our Lord which He offered in the very shadow of the Cross, 'That they all may be one.' Can we expect our Lord and the head of the Church to answer our prayer for more and better men for the ministry so long as we make such a poor use of those He has given us? And can we expect His stewards, faithful to a great trust, to furnish us more money so long as we waste what they give us in unseemly strife and unholy rivalry for place and numbers?"

How will the great Presbyterian body answer the good Doctor's questions?

Thomas M. Mulry, President of the St. Vincent de Paul Society of New York, and the Right Rev. Mgr. D. J. McMahon, Superintendent of Catholic Charities of New York, will be prominent participants in the thirty-sixth annual National Conference of Charities and Correction held in Buffalo from June 9 to 16, which is expected to be the most successful gathering in the history of organized benevolence in America. About 2,000 delegates from all over the United States and Canada will attend and many distinguished men and women will take part in the deliberations.

The conference has been termed "A Clearing House of Ideas in Philanthropic Work."

On May 25, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen in a meeting held in Columbus, Ohio, passed resolutions condemning the present immigration laws and calling upon the President and Congress to pass suitable ones. They expressly urge the exclusion from the United States of the illiterate, sweatshop and other undesirable classes.

A feature illustrative of the spirit of Catholic life so notably prevalent in Belgium occurs in the program of the fêtes marking the recent diamond jubilee celebration of the Catholic University of Louvain. This was an extraordinary distribution of help to the poor of the city under the direction and through the charity of the St. Vincent de Paul conference attached to the university. This distribution, which took place the morning of the opening day of the solemnities, marks a thoughtfulness which might be imitated with profit on similar occasions among ourselves.

EDUCATION

Catholics are sometimes criticized because of their attitude in reference to the State system of schools. Their position has been clearly stated time and time again, and the logic of that position is unassailable. With them, briefly, education in all its phases from the elementary school upward is unthinkable without religious training. Therefore they insist upon the accompaniment of moral and religious influences and instruction throughout the school course of intellectual development. Holding this principle they can never accept the advantages held out in a system otherwise entirely acceptable. Because of the lack of religious training in our State schools, from the kindergarten grades right on to the State university courses, Catholics, whilst bearing their share of the burdens imposed upon the people involved in the State system, may not reap the benefit of the intellectual training there afforded.

The terms used to describe their stand may not please those who are not of like opinion, yet when Catholics speak of such schools as "irreligious" they mean no offense to their fellow-citizens. They simply affirm what the law of the land prescribes for the State schools, "that they are to be institutions in which all religious training as such is forbidden." That Catholics no longer stand alone in this position is becoming more evident every day. The growing spread of religious indifference and the strength of the position which pure naturalism is building up among men are leading men of Christian faith to open their eyes wide to the dangers of education without religion. The recent gathering of the Presbyterian hosts in Denver offers us the latest illustration. "Once again," says a writer in the New York Globe, "the 'godless' State university has been attacked, this time in no less a place than the Presbyterian General Assembly and by no less a person than the secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Education." The reference is to the speech of Dr. Joseph W. Cochran during the consideration of the report of the Board of Education in one of the Assembly sessions.

"Why can't we get the young men to preach?" asked Dr. Cochran.

"I'll tell you. In the first place, there is but little Christianity in the home. If there is any it is gone by the time the young man is ready for education."

"Does he go for his education to a Christian school—a Presbyterian school? No. He goes to a Godless State university, and when he returns to his hometown he puts religion at low ebb. And if you ministers find your churches at low ebb know where to place the blame."

There are in the Manhattan and Bronx Boroughs, New York, 32 public schools and 12 parochial that have been represented at the Normal College to the notable extent of entering, during the seven years, 1901-07, twenty-five or more pupils. And while the successful candidates sent by certain very large schools must be duly considered, it is a fact that the parochial schools made a very creditable showing in the percentage of their graduates who have been successful in the examinations for admission to the Normal College. The following figures prove this:

St. Veronica's Parochial, 100; P. S. No. 68, 96; Cathedral Parochial, 93; P. S. No. 76, 92; P. S. No. 188, 91; St. Michael's Parochial, 90; P. S. No. 54, 89; P. S. No. 45, 88; Xavier Parochial, 88; St. Stephen's Parochial, 87; St. Ignatius', 87; P. S. No. 27 (Bronx), 86; P. S. No. 77, 85.

By way of digression the figures just given invite inquiry as to the standing before the Normal School's entrance examiners of all the local parochial schools as compared with all the local public schools. This question is answered by the Normal College's annual reports (1901-07) as follows:

Total of public school applicants (Manhattan and Bronx)	4,657
Accepted	3,213
Percentage of successful public school applicants	69
Total of parochial school applicants (Manhattan and Bronx)	1,250
Accepted	924
Percentage of successful parochial school applicants	74

Bolivia has passed a compulsory education bill. Bolivia is a very sparsely populated country having only two inhabitants to the square mile, and of these 80 per cent. are Indians. El Diario, of Santiago de Chile, points out at some length that such a bill is outside practical politics at present, unless the government goes to enormous expense in multiplying the number of school buildings. Distances between existing schools made it impossible for children to attend. The bill, it thinks, will eventually become "the expression of an inspiration unrealizable for the moment."

As a result of a law passed by the last Oregon legislature and effective on May 23, High School fraternities and societies are doomed in that State. The new statute not only makes such organizations unlawful but it imposes upon school boards the duty to see that the objectionable societies are dissolved and that pupils who persist in the forbidden association are expelled. This is quite a change of policy on the part of educators in Oregon, where High School Fraternities have heretofore thrived. The reasons urged upon the legislators to have them pass the new measure are largely those used by President Schurman in his recent word of warning to fraternity men of Cornell University, noted in AMERICA, May 22. The Oregon educators speak of the "snobbery" which is fostered in these societies and "other such abuses have been charged to similar organizations throughout the country."

The statutes of the National University of Ireland, just issued, creates eight faculties with thirteen new degrees, and many diplomas and distinctions. These faculties, with the numbers of subordinate subjects indicated by the figures appended, are: Arts, 23; Philosophy and Sociology, 10; Celtic Studies, 7; Science, 14; Law, 6; Medicine, 17; Engineering and Architecture, 8; Commerce, 14. Matriculation examinations shall be set by the board for such students as have not made the prescribed studies at recognized colleges. In University College, Dublin, the president is paid $9,000 yearly; the professors and lecturers $90,225; in Cork $6,000 and $57,000 respectively, and in Galway $4,000 and $25,115. Of this sum the amounts apportioned to Gaelic subjects are: Dublin, for three professors and two lecturers, $11,000; Cork, $3,000, and Galway, $2,250, for one professor and one lecturer. Besides scholarships and prizes, traveling studentships of $1,000 each, tenable for three years, will be conferred for the purpose of foreign research.

Besides the matriculation examination a testimonial of character is a requisite for admission. The Board of Studies will consist of the vice-chancellor, the president and one member of the faculty of each constituent college (Dublin, Cork, Galway) and at least three extern examiners elected by the Senate.

—On May 22 and 23 the new college chapel at St. Mary's College, Kansas, was dedicated. The students and alumni contributed a great part of $75,000, the cost of the fine Gothic building, and they gathered in large numbers to witness the consummation of their zeal and generosity. The Right Reverend Thomas F. Lillis, Bishop of Leavenworth, was the celebrant. In his sermon the Bishop dwelt with much feeling on the loyalty and faith of the St. Mary's boys, past and present, and called down a blessing on the sons of St. Ignatius. The alumni held their triennial meeting on the same date. It was the most numerous attended and successful in the history of the college.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—A recent convert is the Rev. C. I. Smith, formerly rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church, Charleston, S. C. St. Paul's is a congregation made up of colored men and their families who earned their freedom before the war. Many of them are almost white and they form a class apart in Charleston.

—Under the auspices of the Boston Federation of Catholic Societies a Catholic lecture congress has begun. A series of addresses on topics of special Catholic interest, on the careers of great men and similar subjects will be delivered by prominent Catholic laymen.

—In the Argentine Republic the Catholics, many of whom are of Irish affiliations, have formed committees of defence in all the towns to safeguard religious teaching in the schools.

—Bishop Aloysius M. Benziger, of Quilon, Southern India, is in this city on a visit to his relatives, who are members of the well-known firm of publishers, and to arouse interest in the work of his mission which lies in a very poor district. He will make a tour of the leading cities before going from here to Rome. The bishop was a Carmelite before his appointment to his see.

—An order for two hundred "bungalow" churches to replace those destroyed by the earthquake in Messina and in Calabria is certainly modernizing things architecturally in Italy.

—The splendid new church of the Sacred Heart, on Laurier avenue, Ottawa, to replace that destroyed by fire in 1907, is being erected as rapidly as possible. Like its predecessor, it is to be in charge of the Oblate Fathers, and is exclusively for the French Canadian residents of the vicinity. It was gratifying to note at the recent laying of the corner stone, that amongst the names placed therein as notable benefactors, were those of such prominent English-speaking citizens, as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, M. P. Davis, George Goodwin, ex-Mayor D'Arcy Scott, B. Slattery and Colonel Watkin. Such manifestations of good will on the part of the other, must go far to promote that union among Catholics which is so desirable for the future of religion in Canada.

—At St. Saviour's Church, Dublin, the Most Rev. J. P. Dowling, O.P., Sapin, Trinidad, May 16, by his grace, Archbishop Walsh. Dr. Dowling had left his native Kilkenny for the Trinidad mission, where he acted as Vicar-General for several years. He succeeds the late Most Rev. Dr. Flood, another distinguished Irishman.

—On Wednesday, May 26th, five deaf-mute pupils made their first Holy Communion in the chapel of the school, 1613 Lowrie street, Pittsburg. The chapel was filled with the parents and relatives of the children. A committee of priests who gave them a test decided that they knew their catechism as well as any school children in the city. On Pentecost Sunday at the Cathedral, thirteen deaf-mutes, eight adults and five children were confirmed by Bishop Canevin.

—Among the topics that will be presented in papers and discussed at the Congress of Missionaries at the Apostolic Mission House, Washington, June 9-11, are the following:

"The Diocesan Bands and Their Special Work," "The Chapel Car as a Missionary," "The Italians in America," "Literature at Church Doors," "Church Extension and Mission Work," "The Opportunity in Canada," "To Develop the Missionary Spirit in Seminaries," "The Making and Instructing of Converts and Their Perseverance," "Missions Among the Indians," "The Leakage: Its Cause and Remedy," "Some Avenues of Missionary Activity," "Lecture Platform Chautauquas," "Evangelizing the Negro," "Vocations to the Life of the Missions," "Missions Among Children," "Pushing Parish Machinery to its Highest Efficiency," "Every Diocese to Have its Own Mission Band," "Gospel Problems in the South," "The Catholic Young Man at the Secular University," "A Central Missionary College."

—It is expected that the new Bishop of Cleveland, Mgr. John P. Farrelly, will arrive there from Rome on the evening of June 11. The solemn installation will take place in the Cathedral on Sunday, June 13, Archbishop Moeller, of Cincinnati, officiating.

—A plan is being considered to erect a statue of Christopher Columbus in Columbus, Ohio, and have it unveiled on October 12, 1912. The Knights of Columbus and other Catholic societies are agitating the matter.

—Representing Bishop Ryan, of Alton, the Rev. Andrew P. Ganss, S.J., of St. Louis, delivered an address at the unveiling of the statue of George Rogers Clark, in Riverview Park, Quincy, Ill., on May 22. The formal invitation to make the address was tendered in recognition of the services of the intrepid Catholic missionary, Father Peter Gibault, whose name is inseparably linked with that of Gen. Clark in the acquisition of this portion of the Northwest Territory.

—Nashville, Tenn., is to have a new Cathedral designed by Leonori, of Rome.

—Boston is to have a parade for temperance of the children of the parochial schools on June 27. Bishop-elect Anderson will then give them the pledge at a mass meeting on the Common.

—Mother Irene, dean of St. Angela's College for Women, at New Rochelle, N. Y., has been appointed head of the Ursuline Province for the Northern States.

—The Most Rev. D. Augustine Marre, Bishop of Constance and Abbot General of the Trappists, is paying his first visit to the houses of his order in the United States.

—Last Sunday the Holy Sacrifice was offered up for the last time in the Church of the Assumption, York and Jay streets, Brooklyn. The building stands in the path of the Manhattan Bridge approach and is being torn down. It was dedicated by Bishop, afterwards Archbishop, Hughes in 1842. The Rev. Dr. William J. Donaldson, who has been rector since 1903, has selected another site on Cranberry street. The first rector of the parish was the Rev. David Bacon, who in 1855 became Bishop of Portland, Me.

—On Pentecost Sunday Bishop Walsh confirmed a large number of children in the Cathedral, Portland. Just forty years ago Bishop Bacon first performed a like function there. Since then the Cathedral parish has more than doubled in population. The coronation of a statue of the Blessed Virgin was also a feature of the Pentecost services. On Memorial Day a Mass was celebrated at Calvary Cemetery in the presence of a large congregation.

—The Rev. Eugene McDonald, U. S. N. Chaplain at the Brooklyn Navy Yard for some time, has been ordered to the New York, and his place at the Navy Yard will be taken by Father M. C. Gleason, who made the recent tour of the world on the flagship Connecticut.

—Mgr. Hyacinth Jalabert, who was nominated last February by a pontifical brief Bishop of Telepta and Vicar Apostolic of Senegambia, was lately consecrated Bishop by Archbishop Amette of Paris, assisted by Mgr. Pichon, the Coadjutor-Bishop of Port-au-France, Haiti. The new prelate was born in Chambéry, Savoy, November 13, 1859, and belongs to the congregation of the Holy Ghost, having been made a priest in 1882. French Guiana became the field of his apostolic labor. When, in 1893, political troubles drove the Congregation from France, Father Jalabert was sent as a missionary to Africa; Ngagobil, Dakar, Saint Louis were successively the field of his zealous labors. The French government in recognition of his merits during an epidemic bestowed on him the cross of the Legion of Honor and subsequently presented him with the Colonial Medal. The field assigned to his labors is vast and laborious.

OBITUARY

In the recent death of Father Eugene Portalié, S.J., "The Catholic Encyclopedia" loses a brilliant contributor. It was he who wrote the masterly article "Augustine," in which is condensed material enough for a large volume, all handled with an astonishing skill and a grasp of the subject bordering on genius. Father Portalié was known to the general public chiefly by his learned articles in the Etudes. To the clergy he was still better known as a preacher of ecclesiastical retreats in which the holiness of his own life revealed itself by the persuasiveness and earnestness of his call to clerical perfection. To the younger members of the Society of Jesus his name stands for eleven years of enthusiastic teaching of scholastic theology. To the Catholic Institute of Toulouse, where he taught Positive Theology for nine years, he was the embodiment of enlightened zeal for the changeless truth. To all who came under the charm of his manner he was the ready consoler, the willing helper. As the Rev. Canon Maisonneuve said in his eloquent funeral discourse, "to all, professors and students, he showed a face illumined by zeal and beaming with kindly indulgence. He seemed incapable of the melancholy, the dryness, the coldness sometimes attributed to men of learning. What shone forth in all his person was that sincere and lovable charity which captivates human creatures to hand them up to God." Yet, with all his southern enthusiasm and amiability, he had a keen scent for fraud and error.

When most French Catholics were deluded by the so-called revelations of Dr. Bataille in "Le Diable au XIXe Siècle" Father Portalié was one of the first to brave obloquy by piercing the "Diana Vaughan" bubble. He was also one of the first to detect in M. Loisy's books the congeries of heresies afterwards condemned by Pius X in his "Pascendi Gregis." As he had been prepared for this detection of latent error by his exhaustive study of French Protestantism, he could safely affirm of Modernism three years before it was so named by the Holy Father: "As to this apologetic method new to us in France, it has, for an entire century, lain fallow in the books of Liberal Protestantism, from Schleiermacher in Germany to Sabatier, through E. Scherer, Astié, Bouvier, Leopold Monod and M. Ménégoz."

Unfortunately Father Portalié was cut off, at the age of fifty-seven—he was born at Mende (Lozère) in the south of France, Jan. 30, 1852, entered the Society of Jesus December 30, 1867, and died at Amélie-les-Bains on April 20—and he had no time to collect into book form his innumerable articles in the Etudes and other reviews. The wonder is that, with so many classes to teach, so many interviews with all kinds of people, so many lectures, sermons and retreats to clergy and laity, he found time to do the great work of Christian apologetics which he did achieve and which remains, though scattered up and down and awaiting intelligent compilation, a monument to his memory. His example, however, of unselfish devotion to truth and of practical helpfulness to the weak and lowly, will ever be to the friends who knew and admired him his chief claim on their undying remembrance.

Gen. John B. Frisbie, for a generation the most prominent English-speaking Catholic resident in Mexico, died in the City of Mexico on May 4. He was born in Albany, N. Y., May 20, 1823, and after leaving school studied law. He went to California in 1847 as a captain in the army after the Mexican War and remained there. In 1850 he married Fannie, daughter of Gen. Vallejo, one of the old Mexican landed proprietors, and became largely interested in mining and railroad enterprises. Serious losses prompted him to seek fortune anew in Mexico in 1878, and he was successful. In late years he was one of the intimate friends of President Diaz. The introduction of the organization of the Knights of Columbus into Mexico was due mainly to his efforts.

Seth W. Cobb died in St. Louis, Mo., on May 23, aged 71 years. He was a convert, and born in Virginia. Besides serving in the army of Northern Virginia during the entire war, and reaching the rank of brevet-major, he was three times a member of Congress, was at one time president of the Merchants' Exchange, vice-president and director of the Louisiana Exposition and head of several large business concerns.

Father Kenelm Vaughan, third of the eight sons of Colonel John Vaughan, of Courtfield, and brother of the late Cardinal Vaughan, passed to his reward at Hatfield on May 19, 1909. He was born in 1840; ordained in 1865; and at one time acted as secretary to Cardinal Manning. Of recent years he travelled extensively in South America and in Spain collecting funds for the Blessed Sacrament Chapel in Westminster Cathedral. In July, 1907, he opened the mission at Hatfield where he ended his labors. He was a man of great sanctity of life, with an ever-present sense of the supernatural, and his zeal in distributing the Scriptures was so great that he was known as an ambulating Bible society. He had a wonderful devotion to St.

Jeremias, and for years had been collecting materials for a life of the prophet. He wrote many devote works, mainly in Spanish, and compiled readings from the Scriptures under the title "Armory of Holy Scripture."

On Saturday, May 29, Rev. Thomas H. Miles, a well-known member of the Missouri Province of the Society of Jesus, died at St. Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri. He had been for twenty years spiritual director of the University and confessor to hundreds of priests of the diocese. Before filling the charge he had been one of the pioneer leaders in the educational work of the order in the Middle West. During his long associations in St. Louis Father Miles's equable temperament, quiet patience and piety were notable characteristics.

Father Miles came from a distinguished family. His first forebear in this country was Adam Hill, a member of the party that accompanied Lord Baltimore to Maryland from England in 1634. Many descendants of the family that settled in Maryland with Lord Baltimore have been notable in Catholic religious life in the United States. Mother Flaget, mother superior of the Loretto Academy, St. Louis, is a member of his family, as also is Father Joseph Hill, of St. Mary's College, Kansas. Mr. Clarkson, an ecclesiastical student at the St. Louis University, is another.

Father Miles was born in Bardstown, Ky., in 1831. He received his early education from the Jesuit institution of that town. After being admitted to the order, he was stationed, during different times, at various Jesuit houses throughout the country. At one time he was rector of St. Ignatius at Chicago, and he was the superior of the Jesuit College at Omaha during the first days of that institution.

PERSONAL

At the annual meeting on May 24, of the Royal Geographical Society of England, the Victoria Research Medal awarded last month to Professor Alexander Agassiz of Cambridge, Mass., was handed over to Ambassador Reid for transmission to the scholarly recipient.

An interesting personality at the International Congress of applied chemistry, which was opened at the Guild Hall, London, May 26, was Madame Curie, whose name is associated with that of her late husband in the discovery of radium. It will be remembered that Madame Curie, who is a devout Catholic, entered strong protest against the claim of certain writers that the determination of the "First Cause" lay within the province of science, and declared that science was unable to determine adequately the ultimate cause of anything. This distinguished lady scientist has been chosen to preside over the department of the congress dealing with electricity.

SCIENCE

A conference of distinguished meteorologists of the world is announced to be held in London, June 21, next. The United States will be represented by Professor Willis I. Moore, Chief of the United States Weather Bureau. A concerted movement will be inaugurated to induce the principal governments to adopt a uniform system of wireless marine weather reports and to reach an agreement so that all nations shall display a uniform marine storm signal. Efforts will be also made to induce the several governments ultimately to accept regulations that will compel a ship beyond a certain tonnage to carry wireless instruments and operators and to take noon Greenwich time and a daily observation of the weather. Observations received by a ship, it is planned, will be transmitted to other ships so that by relaying from one vessel to another observations from the entire ocean would then reach the land and the central meteorological offices of the several nations. Other interested nations will be able to complete these observations, each in its proper geographical position, and thus to determine the location of storms and to forecast their future direction. These forecasts could be distributed to the vessels in the same manner in which the observations on which the forecasts were based had been collected.

ECONOMICS

That the completion of the Panama Canal may not bring to the United States the return which the generous outlay of millions by the American people might naturally lead one to look for, was suggested by former Congressman Landis of Indiana in an address last week before the Detroit Bankers' Club.

"The Panama Canal," said Mr. Landis, "will not only enable foreign nations to get under our coast line with foreign products at ballast prices, but it will take from our trunk lines of railroads millions on millions of tons of transcontinental freight."

"We shall have to subsidize a merchant marine for trade with Central and South America," said Mr. Landis, "or admit ourselves forever dependent upon other nations for the carriage of our commerce. Every other nation subsidizes its merchant marine in one way or another."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

Are the saints' names vanishing from our American Catholic families? A rather extended investigation inclines one to the unwilling belief that this is largely the case. Many persons, infatuated with the hero or heroine of the latest "best seller" think it the "cutest thing" to name their offspring after the favorite of stage or fiction, and Catholic mothers appear to be adopting this latest fad to an extent that is quite as surprising as it is without the shadow of excuse.

Looking at the practice from a Catholic point of view it appears more than an absurdity. It is a profanation for the children of the Faith and descendants of the martyrs to be called by names that are frequently meaningless, and often worse than pagan. What honor can accrue to fathers who give their sons the names of political favorites and neglect or ignore the names of the saints?

It is stated on indisputable authority that the names of all Filipino children are, without exception, Catholic names. This custom throughout the islands is universal, and nowhere in the world is the name of Mary held in higher veneration. In one case the eight daughters of one family are named Asuncion, Conception, Pilar, Loreta, Maria, Consuelo, Dolores and Mercedes. Surely the Blessed Mother is held in veneration in that family.

There can be nothing sweeter than the name of Mary and its variants, and serious minded persons will readily recognize its esthetic as well as its ascetic value. The beauty and sonorousness of the old Christian and Catholic names render them more charming than any of the modern meaningless names ever can be. What is finer than the grand old names of Mary, Elizabeth, Margaret, Catherine, and, irrespective of religious significance, what more musical than the names of the twelve Apostles, and many other Scriptural names? C.

Doctrinal Retreats for Children.

The next step in the successful conducting of a children's mission is a consideration on the helps, prayer and the Sacraments, and what God does for the baby from the first moment it is brought to the baptismal font to the instant of death. What each sacrament does for the soul, and how each should be prepared for and received is briefly explained, so that when the meditation on Death comes the little ones see that it is the prayer of the past and the Sacraments worthily received and the Masses heard that are the real helps and the consolation in the hour of dying. The death of a boy who abuses the Sacraments and the death of one who receives them properly are contrasted, and once again the helps are seen in their true light.

In the instruction on the General Judgment, a review is made of what has to be believed, what has to be done, and what use we have made of the helps God has given us. A meditation on the life of Christ, and another on His holy Mother, with a practical application to the life of the children bring the series of instructions to a close, and lead to a fervent confession.

During the three days the children are on the grounds for seven hours. Outside the time of instructions they can be taught how to use their prayer-books, how to say the Rosary properly, how to behave in church, the meaning of the red lamp before the Tabernacle.

If the children's general Communion takes place on Sunday, Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament is given in the afternoon. Before the priest gives Benediction he shows the ostensorium, explains it and describes what is about to take place. It is surprising how many grown people even who attend Benediction are more or less ignorant of the ceremony.

It is an excellent plan to invite the lay catechists and Sunday School teachers to be present throughout the mission. The methods here described have been used with good results. They may be varied according to time and circumstances, but the utmost simplicity of word and manner should be aimed at. One thing that is a sine qua non of success is that the missionary shall reach the level of the childish intelligence. To do this successfully, he must understand child nature. Big words are a bane. A stiff and stilted manner is fatal. Zeal—abundance of it—is necessary. A pleasant, kindly manner is indispensable. For three days it means unceasing work for the missionary, but the change wrought in the children is his ample reward. A. B. C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

In the last issue of AMERICA, growing better, by the way, with each number, you did well, indeed, to write in such praise of the late Judge Dennis O'Brien. He deserved well of his Church and her clergy in this State. He stood alone in the Court of Appeals, firmly, courteously, but with relentless logic exposing the inconsistencies of his colleagues in the case in which one Eastman had been indicted for an indecent attack on the confessional and our priests. They reached the conclusion that the conviction could not stand, but Judge O'Brien in his opinion completely answered them, and in dignified, manly, but inexorable language upheld the true statute, and demonstrated the indecency of the publication. He did so most effectively by simply quoting part of the libel in the course of his opinion without further comment. The case was that of the People vs. Eastman, 188 N. Y. Rep. 478., yet not a voice was raised among our people in behalf of his course. We are but too often remiss in our recognition of quiet, unostentatious merit.

! GEORGE F. ROESCH.

New York, May 25, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

In AMERICA, May 15, "The Italians of To-day," by René Bazin, is treated as a recent translation of a work many years old. Commercial candor might have suggested to the publishers the appropriateness of stating that the 1908 edition is merely a reprint, and thus spared this correction from THE REVIEWER.

. . . We shall gladly use the opportunities we have out here on the Dakota prairies to spread the circulation of AMERICA.—P. E. Digmann, S.J., So. Dak.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

The first number of the new weekly publication, AMERICA, is a first-class effort. The board of editors consists of men representing various sections of North America. They are assisted by eminent collaborators among the clergy and laity from all parts of the world. As we do not know America sufficiently to form an opinion on the prospects of such a high-class Catholic review, all we can say is that it deserves success, if we may judge by its initial number.—The Leader, Dublin, Ireland.

. . . In an editorial paraphrase the Sacred Heart Review of May 29 says:

"One of our readers who, not satisfied with subscribing for a copy of the Review for himself, has another copy sent weekly to a clerical friend, lets us see the following communication from the recipient of this friendly favor:

'If you only knew how I appreciate that welcome weekly paper, you could form an idea of my gratitude to you for this favor. Suffice it to say, however, we get papers here from everywhere, and with none, save AMERICA, am I so taken up as with the Sacred Heart Review.'"

. . . Need I tell you that I am pleased with AMERICA? More than that, I am proud of it, and I beg to join the chorus of praise and appreciation. At last America has a Catholic journal worthy of the field. You have made history!—Charles Phillips, Editor, The Monitor, San Francisco, Cal.

. . . We are particularly pleased to welcome the birth of AMERICA.—Le Semeur, Montreal, Can.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

... Just a word of commendation on your very excellent and timely publication. It is certainly the most pretentious weekly ever offered.—Thomas A. Burke, Knights of Columbus, Cleveland, Ohio.

... Apart from the instructive leaders, the clear, concise paragraphs on secular and religious topics give a busy reader a kodaked view of the world, and all for ten cents.—Wm. J. Ennis, S.J., Fall River, Mass.

... The review has been very interesting to me from the very first number. For although that number was good, the succeeding ones were better. There was an expression of more conscious strength; a breadth of treatment and a grasp of things that appeal to one. May the review do the good that is so much needed, and which it is so well adapted to accomplish.—W. F. Robison, S.J., Detroit, Mich.

... We have long wished for such a magazine, and you have sprung it on us from the head of Minerva, full armed.—Sister Antonio Mercedes, Beatty, Pa.

... I have very carefully read the first two numbers of your AMERICA. I like it and am glad that it has made and occupies a field of its own, not trenching nor infringing on that of any other Catholic publication in this country.—Patrick E. C. Lally, Fenison, Iowa.

... To me it is a veritable revelation, measuring the possibilities of a weekly review. Its completeness and elevated tone are the abiding credentials in every priest's library.—Rev. John F. Hickey, Cincinnati.

... I beg to say that I am so enthusiastic about AMERICA that I intend to recommend it to all my friends who have not seen a copy.—Rev. J. S. Henry, Stithton, Ky.

... I have read AMERICA from beginning to end every week since its first publication.—J. P. Sweeney, Chicago, Ill.

... AMERICA must needs be a source of much accurate information on questions of paramount importance to the busy cleric and to the layman whose every moment is so disposed that long treatises and many magazines only repel him. It will be a means to offset the hasty and prejudicial statements, and the so-called foreign communications found in so many of our great dailies.—Rev. Jas. F. Hennessy, Ansonia, Conn.

... While I much regret the suspension of the Messenger, I must say I am delighted with your first number of AMERICA.—Rt. Rev. Joseph Schrembs, Grand Rapids, Mich.

... I have never been satisfied with any review in the country until AMERICA appeared. I could not help expressing my gratitude for the splendid work of your review.—Anna Biddle Simson, Bryn Mawr, Pa.

... I sum up the remarks I have heard about AMERICA from many sources, with this one word: Splendid!—taken in its etymological sense, shining, the "splendid focus" of Horace. Indeed, AMERICA, they say, is a focus of light pouring forth its golden rays on every subject and out unto all lands.—E. Lecompte, S.J., Montreal, Can.

... I wish to tender you my congratulations upon the general style and make-up of AMERICA. A paper of this kind should have been published long before now.—Chris. C. Keenan, New York.

... Long may it be our privilege to welcome the weekly visit of AMERICA. Assuredly it is worthy of doing our utmost to promote its welfare.—Mary E. Mahon, Walldwick, N. J.

... AMERICA is a fine periodical, and I trust it will be supported and encouraged as it should be. If it continues to be as good as the number sent, I believe its success will be assured.—I. R. Matthews, Washington, D. C.

... I take this opportunity of expressing my sincere admiration for AMERICA. In paper, type, form and general get-up, it leaves nothing to be desired, while its matter, as one might expect from the names of its editors, is truly informing, timely, scholarly and eminently readable.—Rev. Cornelius J. Holland, Providence, R. I.

... AMERICA is just the thing we need in this country, and that for a long time.—Rev. E. Vigroux, Lockport, La.

... From what I have seen of AMERICA it is too good to miss.—Rev. Bernard X. O'Reilly, Rockford, Ill.

... Vivat, floreat, crescat AMERICA! It is a model Catholic weekly. I am proud of it; I feel a new spirit in me when I think of its future. The editors have certainly fulfilled every promise made to the public; may they always keep up its present standard.—John F. O'Donovan, S.J.

... It is just what has been needed in this country for a long time, and I hope that you will meet with the success which you so richly deserve.—John D. Casey, Springfield, Mass.

... I wish to congratulate you and your staff on the high excellence of your weekly, which, in my opinion, will do an immense amount of good.—Rev. F. Bernard Haas, O.S.B., Benedictine College, Savannah, Ga.

... If all numbers are up to the extremely high standard of the first issue, and undoubtedly they will be, I intend to have each volume bound and preserved.—J. C. Jordan, Knights of Columbus, Kansas City, Mo.

... AMERICA is progressing nobly; your foreign correspondents are particularly deserving of mention; they are fair and sane.—Rev. M. M. Hassett, Cathedral Rectory, Harrisburg, Pa.

... Ave, AMERICA! AMERICA for Americans; Americans for AMERICA. Your dignified, comprehensive, thoroughly Catholic, charmingly American journal is an educator, a Pauline missionary to the Western Catholic world.—Henry B. Tierney, Trenton, Mo.

... I venture to say that in this new-born journal, placed in the field of American Catholic journalism to-day, we have every reason to foresee a weekly review which will be as a ship coming into our harbors, well laden with truths from the old world, and with the ability to combat the evils which spring from our many liberal press associations.—Teresa Dietrick, Philadelphia, Pa.

... Needless to say that the American colony at Linz is pleased with the appearance of AMERICA, its superior quality and the arrangement of its articles.—T. J. Barrett, S.J., Linz, Freinberg, Austria.

... AMERICA is very interesting. I read everything, from the first word to the last.—F. X. M. Descoteaux, S.J., Thessalon, Ont.

... I am living in a missionary State, and I have never realized as I now do, the great work that can be accomplished for God and His Church by the Catholic paper. I hope to see a well-written weekly like AMERICA thrive, and may it visit us daily instead of weekly.—M. J. Curley, De Land, Fla.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA251-252

CHRONICLE

Home Review of the Week.—America's returning prosperity is evidenced by the importation through New York in May of precious stones valued at $2,609,000. The importation of jewels in May, 1908, was $463,454. —Immigrants to the number of 290,618 were admitted through the Port of New York in the first four months of 1909. The figures for the same period in 1908 were 86,474. —The President will reopen the Brownsville case, and the negro soldiers concerned will have the opportunity to prove their innocence before a General Board of Inquiry. —The Board of Army Engineers is reported to have concluded that a "lakes to gulf" waterway would be too expensive for value to commerce. —A conference of State and Provincial Boards of Health votes unanimously for a national sanitarium for lepers. —In a speech before the Commercial Club of Chicago, Secretary Mac Veagh gives this summary view of President Taft's disposition in regard to his duty as Chief Executive: "Both by predisposition and training, the President has the highest respect for the Constitution and for the laws as they exist, regardless of his private judgment of the wisdom of some of the laws themselves." —After a turbulent week the strike of the Philadelphia Traction men was settled. The men will receive 22 cents an hour and 10 hours will constitute a day's work. —In an address to the Senior Class of Cornell University on the eve of his departure for Europe, President Schurman defended American colleges and universities against the strictures of intellectual decadence uttered by President Wilson of Princeton and other heads of the Eastern colleges. President Wilson had assigned as the basis of the decadence he charged "the indifference of parents and the lack of seriousness on the part of students." —The Tariff. —After acrimonious debate Senator Aldrich was sustained in his proposed change in the cotton cloth schedule. To prevent undervaluations he had introduced a change from ad valorem to specific duties on cotton cloth. —Senator Dooliver delivered another caustic criticism of the methods of the Finance Committee, claiming that its members are forcing the bill through without facts. —In a keen retort to Senator Aldrich, who had criticized the attitude of the "Progressives," Senator Beveridge affirmed that the Committee's course with the tariff bill is such as to compel Republican revisionists to vote against the bill. "The objections to this bill," he declared, "are basic and fundamental. Under such circumstances, Senators are released from their inclination to vote with the Committee, and, at the same time, it is their duty not to vote with the Committee. They must be controlled by the sum total of facts laid before the Senate."

Canadian Events.—The libel suit, brought by Sir Frederick W. Borden, Minister of Militia and senior Liberal leader for Nova Scotia, against Walter M. Carruthers who had, in the Calgary Eye-Opener, accused him of immorality, has been postponed to the next term of the Supreme Court, four months hence, at the request of the plaintiff and the Crown. —A recent report of the Manitoba Government Telephone Department says its revenues are greatly depleted by the ravages of lightning in that province. The setting up of lightning arresters removes all danger for operators and subscribers, but the additional cost and the damage done by thunderstorms are a very serious financial drain on the department.—Dr. W. B. Hutchinson, who has been for the last two years President of Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, has resigned and will resume work as a Baptist minister.—The Most Reverend Thomas Joseph Duhamel, Bishop of Ottawa since 1874, and Archbishop of the same see since 1886, died suddenly last Saturday of heart failure while visiting one of his priests.—A report just issued by the bureau of statistics shows that merchandise from the United States forms a steadily increasing share of the imports of Canada. The Canadian imports from the United States, as compared with the total imports of Canada, increased from 34.03% in 1869 to 60.4% in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1909, whereas the imports from Great Britain have decreased during the same period from 56.2% to 23.69%.—The town of Fernie, in British Columbia, which was almost destroyed by fire some years ago, is now suffering from floods, which are said to be the highest in many years.—On Friday of last week the Presbyterian General Assembly in session at Hamilton, Ont., after a pretty lively discussion, voted that Queen's University, Kingston, Ont., should no longer be considered an official seminary of the Presbyterian body. By becoming undenominational, this University makes a silent bid for Carnegie and similar donations.—The Dominion of Canada has decided to show her imperial spirit by building a navy of her own. Her contribution to the forces of the British Empire will consist of eight first-class cruisers, ten torpedo-boat destroyers and ten torpedo boats. The Hon. J. P. Brodeur, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who will soon leave for England to represent Canada at the Imperial Defence Conference next month, will be accompanied by Rear Admiral Kingsmill, who is at present in command of the Canadian revenue, lighthouse and buoy fleet.

Porto-Rican and Alaskan Legislation.—The House of Representatives at Washington on June 7th passed a bill to remedy the deadlock existing between the Executive Council and the House of Delegates in Porto Rico. The bill amends the Foraker Act by authorizing the Treasurer, with the advice of the Governor, in the event of the necessary sums for the support of the government not having been voted, to appropriate a sum equal to the amount of the previous appropriation bill. It further enacts that all matters pertaining to the government of Porto Rico be placed under the jurisdiction of an executive department of the Government of the United States to be designated by the President.

Delegate Wickersham introduced a bill providing for a Legislative Assembly for Alaska to be composed of a Senate of eight members and a House of Representatives of sixteen members. The measure also provides that all Russian subjects residing in Alaska on March 30, 1867, be regarded as citizens of Alaska. The bill was referred to the Committee on Territories.

European Complications.—There is talk in diplomatic circles at Vienna of an Austria-Hungarian treaty with Japan against Russia.—Austria-Hungary has declined to take part in the International Exposition at Rome in 1911, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of Italian unity.—The recent dismantling of the line of fortresses along the borders of Russian Poland, Novo-Georgeievsk, Warsaw, Zegry, and Ivan-gorod, has caused considerable comment and was taken by many as a sign of good-will towards Germany. The fact, however, is that the usefulness of the forts had come to an end. The discovery of melinite, as well as the opening up of the country by railways, has altered military ideas on fortresses. Improved mobilization took away all importance from these Polish forts.

From Berlin came a circumstantial announcement on June 6, that England and Russia had assumed joint suzerainty over Persia, thus replying to Germany's action in the Balkan dispute. The announcement was officially denied on June 7. Four Dreadnoughts are to be built in the Baltic by an English firm and of English materials. Speaking in London, June 5, at a Press banquet, Lord Roseberry declared, "We can and we will build Dreadnoughts as long as we have a shilling to spend or a man to put into them."

New Prime Minister for Australia.—Mr. Alfred Deakin, the new Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth, whose coalition with Free Traders and Anti-Socialists recently defeated the Fisher (Labor) Administration, has succeeded in forming a new Cabinet.

Mr. Deakin is an ardent Protestant, and a supporter of Central government as against the States. Indeed, on all cardinal points of policies he is at variance with his new allies. The trouble will come when the Braddon clause expires next year and he finds himself bound by his pledges to offer the States a minimum sum in lieu of their three-fourths of the customs. Anti-Socialism is a strong factor in Australian politics just now. Sir William Lyne in refusing to join the Deakin coalition likened the proposal of fusion to Judas' betrayal of his Master, while another member declared the comparison unfair to Judas, who had the decency to go and hang himself immediately.

In the Italian Chamber.—In the discussion on the Budget of Worship, May 24, Deputy Chiesa of the Extreme Left called attention to the fact that in 1872 the number of monks and religious in Italy was 15,000, whereas to-day they number 50,000. The laws against the Jesuits were not being enforced, he said, and it was with regret he noticed that the Queen-Mother, out of the 80,000 francs she gave in alms, saw that 60,000 went to the Capuchins. M. Orlando, Minister of Justice and Worship, in reply pointed out that much as he would desire to see a system of lay associations for worship introduced, he feared after the experience in France it would not work without a complete agreement with the Vatican. Congregations in Italy, he said, have no de jure personality, though de facto they are allowed to exist. The Jesuits are interdicted in certain portions of the Kingdom, but not in the Province of Venice nor in the Pontifical States, and to enforce the law would merely increase the number of Jesuits in the exempt States. Don Romolo Murri, the excommunicated priest, warned the Government against Vatican support. The action of the Vatican should be carefully watched. On a decision over the enforcing of the law against the religious orders there were 53 votes for and 179 against the measure.

The Scottish Kirks' Assemblies.—The question of union was in the air during the Scottish General Assemblies held in Edinburgh in the third week of May. On Wednesday, May 19, the Wee Free Assembly considered the overtures of the Established Church, but beyond denouncing organs in churches and regretting the advance of Romanism, thought the time out of joint for union just now. Friendly communications between the Auld Kirk and the United Frees began by a golf match which was won by the Auld Kirk. On Thursday, May 19, the United Free assembly unanimously agreed "to enter into conference with the Established Assembly on the main causes which keep the churches apart, and with the object of Presbyterian reunion in Scotland." Yet they made it plain that no distinctive principle of the United Free Church could be thrown overboard.

The Established Church Assembly passed a resolution declaring its readiness to enter into conference with the United Free Church, and appointed a committee of one hundred for the purpose. In accepting the conference the Moderator of the United Free Church Assembly declared they "had arrived at a very grave moment in the history of the Presbyterian Church."

Strike Laws in Spain.—The law of strikes and lock-outs has passed the Cortes, and has been signed by King Alfonso XIII. While the law does not deny to workmen and employees the right to cease work or "close down," it is aimed to stop as far as possible the abuses and evils of strikes. The most important article of the new law is that which requires notice and cause of intended strike to be given to the civil authorities eight days in advance of the day when such cessation of work will deprive any determined town of light or water, or suspend the operation of railroads, or leave the sick, or those confined in asylums without assistance. The penalty of violation of this law is the penalty of the criminal code, to be inflicted on leaders and promoters of strike or lock-out. Under severe penalties, five days notice of appointed day of strike and notice of reason of strike must be given by the leader to the civil authorities when strike or lock-out will suspend operation of tramways, or cut off the supply of any necessary or general article of food. Those are to be considered leaders who by voice or written word encourage the workmen or employees to cease work or to "shut down."

Honors for Father Richard.—Special honor was paid in Detroit on Tuesday to a famous priest, Father Gabriel Richard, at the celebration of the centenary of the setting up of the first printing press in the Middle-West. Father Richard carried the press from Baltimore to Detroit in 1809. He was then pastor of old St. Anne's Church, Detroit. In August of that year he printed on this press The Michigan Essay or Impartial Observer, which is really the earliest Catholic paper of the long list for the United States. He also struck off an edition of Fleury's Catechism and other pamphlets, secular and religious, that are now highly prized by collectors. Gabriel Richard is one of the famous names in the early Catholic history of the West. Born in France, October 17, 1767, he joined the Sulpicians and came to the United States in 1792, and was sent to the missions in Michigan in 1798. St. Anne's parish then covered most of the Middle-West and Father Richard was among the leading pioneers in the development of Michigan, social, political, educational, and material. He was the first territorial delegate to Congress from Michigan and the only priest in our history who was a member of the national legislature.

Church Property in Hungary Threatened.—For some time the anti-Catholic press in Hungary has been demanding with ever increasing boldness the seizure by the Government of the large estates and other property of the Catholic Church. On May 13, the County of Hadju, which is principally inhabited by Calvinists, officially declared for "secularization." The following resolution, remarkable on account of the reasons which are given for this measure of highway robbery, was passed by a vote of 110 to 19:

"Whereas under the Coalition Government, reaction has entered the whole field of political, economic and social life;

"Whereas especially clericalism has become formidable and, under the flag of patriotism, is obstructing progress by the Catholic Popular Federation, the Popular Party, the Christian Social Party;

"Be it resolved that the County of Hadju petitions Parliament and urges all other Counties and Autonomous Cities of the realm to present the same petition, viz.:

"(1) To prohibit the use of any public money for ecclesiastical purposes. [By public moneys the so-called religious funds are meant, which have accumulated from confiscated Church property.]

"(2) To follow the example of Germany, France and Italy in confiscating the property of the Church. This is the only way to stop emigration, improve the condition of the peasantry and prevent financial and economic crises."

The last sentence betrays a complete ignorance of the facts. Nowhere is the peasantry more contented and better situated than on the domains of the Church. Emigration, pauperism, corruption and the horrors of the white slave traffic are almost exclusively found in regions in which the Jews have risen to power. During the last thirty years the Jews have obtained possession of one-third of all the estates of Hungary. They are looking for new worlds to conquer. Hence the attacks of their influential papers on Church property. The Calvinists of Hajdu have made themselves the tools of omnipotent Jewish freemasonry. Meanwhile the organization of the Catholics, which began in the eleventh hour, is making rapid progress. Almost every day the papers report that in some place or other the assembling of a local branch of the Catholic Popular Federation.

Progress in Colombia.—Much has been written about the incapacity of Latin-American republics for self-government, but the prosperous growth of the Argentine Republic, and the following extracts from President Reyes' message to the Congress of Colombia, indicate that love of peace and progress has not been wanting in these growing commonwealths:

"It is with satisfaction that I inform you that the relations of Church and State are becoming more cordial each day, and that the honorable and patriotic Colombian clergy, with truly evangelical zeal, continually labor to foster a national union of hearts, agreement between all classes, the improvement and development of primary education, and the moral and material progress of our people."

"In visiting various departments, on my way to the inauguration of the Puerto Wilches railroad, I was in constant communication with prelates and parish priests, who, in union with the civil authorities and the more influential citizens of different political views, are interesting themselves in our moral and material development."

"Last month, also, I found the same relations to exist in the departments of Santa Rosa, Tunja, Zipaquirá and Medellín; moreover, I possess information from the departments which as yet I have not visited, that peace and confidence in the progress of the country are universal."

"Peace is being sustained, not by force of arms, but by the will of the nation, a determination that strengthens daily. As a consequence, all branches of the administration, commerce and industry are being developed to the general welfare of our people. The Government has deemed it safe to pardon the four individuals who form the sum total of those condemned for political offenses."

Reunion of the Churches.—The Greek Catholic weekly, Nauka, published at Ungvár, Northern Hungary, gives particulars of a conference or congress of the Latin and Oriental churchmen to discuss the questions involved in the reunion of the churches of the Slavonic races. The congress is to sit at Velegrad, near Gradisch, in Moravia, a place selected because of its being one of the localities where Christianity was first preached to the Slavs, and it is to be held August 2-5 of this year. It is expected to have the most important results in bringing about the desired harmony among these peoples. The invitation to the congress is signed by the Most Reverend Andrew Scheptitzky, Greek Catholic Metropolitan of Lemberg, and by Father Aurelio Palmiero, O.S.A., the distinguished Slavonic scholar and writer upon the Russian Church. These invitations have been sent to distinguished Russian, Bulgarian and Servian theologians and prelates of the Greek Orthodox Church, and to the Greek Catholic and Roman Catholic prelates and theologians of Austria and other countries having Slavic dioceses.

The congress will be held under the direction and patronage of the Archbishop of Olmütz, Mgr. Francis Bauer, in whose diocese it meets, and the invitation reads in part: "It is to be a conference of representatives of all the Slavic nationalities for the solution of questions of the intercommunion of the faithful in the Eastern and Western churches. For the consideration of the congress the following matters will be proposed: (1) Questions of a theological and historical character concerning disputed points in the doctrines of both churches and their explanation by the theologians of each church; (2) Questions of a practical nature, for example, the possible removal of existing misunderstandings and prejudices between the Catholics and the Orthodox, and the establishment of friendly relations in purely doctrinal fields between Catholic and Orthodox theologians. All the discussions at the congress will take place in the Latin and Russian languages, and all papers must be read in these two languages. The theme or contents of each paper should be communicated early in May to the editor of Slavorum Litterae Theologicae at Prague, where they will be announced in that publication."

Religious Liberty in Russia.—Premier Stolypin spoke in the Duma last week in defence of the government's draft of a law dealing with the matter of changing from one faith to another and against the modifications introduced in committee removing all restrictions.

He said that the emperor, as head of the Orthodox Church, could not suffer backsliding from the orthodox to non-Christian beliefs, and that if such amendments were incorporated the bill would be vetoed.

He conceded that the church enjoyed full independence in matters of creed and dogma, but insisted on state control. His speech was brilliant, but it fell upon deaf ears.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Catholic Press in Austria

The newly-founded journal, AMERICA, with its wide and ably conceived programme, has already secured universal recognition as a Catholic press undertaking of the first rank. It will therefore not be without interest to the numerous readers and friends of the new organ to learn how Austria has within the last few years likewise engaged in a great journalistic enterprise—also Catholic, if in other respects of a somewhat different nature—and how this undertaking is already bearing a ripe harvest of fruit.

During the latter half of the nineteenth century, Liberalism, as the heir to Josephism, acquired in the land of the Hapsburgs a might which was faithfully mirrored in the press. Subsidized and mainly edited by Jewish capitalists, the press held practically the whole reading public under its spell, and claimed among its circle of readers the monied, intellectual and official classes and the vast majority of the better class residents of the towns. Conservative ideas could make no impression on the vast body of the people; outside the clergy, the Christian press could only reckon on the support of a section of the nobility, while the preponderating mass of the rural population had for decades displayed the utmost apathy towards popular journalism. The evil effects which Liberalism exercised especially on the economic life of the empire gave rise first to the socialistic agitation, and then in the nineties to the Christian democratic movement, led by the Christian Social Party under Dr. Karl Lueger. Stronghold after stronghold of the Liberals was taken by assault; the Christian Social Party captured Vienna and now is the largest party in Parliament. That this victory in the era of newspapers should be won without assistance from the press is more remarkable, for in the domain of journalism the Liberal party remained supreme.

At the Catholic Convention held in Vienna in the autumn of 1905, Father Victor Kolb, S.J., delivered an address entitled "Austrian Catholics and the Press," and removed the scales from the eyes of the Catholics. "The policy of all the leading organs, which mould public opinion in our Austria and constitute the deciding factor in questions intimately associated with national prosperity, is dictated by the Jewish-Liberal party. In vain do a few Catholic editors endeavor to stem the destructive current. Newspapers like the Neue Freie Presse, Zeit, Kronenzeitung, etc., appear in editions of 50,000-180,000 copies, and are universally bought and read, while the two modest little Catholic papers are scarcely asked for. The Austrian Catholics spend their money by the million for papers which are morally poisonous, which besmear the Catholic character and work untiringly for the downfall of the Church. Austria is on the same road as France. Wherefore, awake, countrymen, ere it is too late! Rally together for a mighty crusade; rally into a great Press Association, which alone can save us from our present dangerous predicament. The Association shall bear the name of Pius V, our great confederate in the glorious wars against the Turks." "All Hail to the Piusverein!" was the answer of all the assembled Catholics, and the watchword soon found an echo throughout the provinces. Pope Pius X sent his blessing. The work of regeneration was not begun a moment too soon.

The objects of the Piusverein are: (1) to wage a tireless war against the anti-Christian press by exposing the clandestine, calculating manner in which it labors to sap the foundations of religion, morality and devotion to the Emperor; (2) to spread among the people an appreciation of the importance of the press and distribute good Christian papers in all directions; (3) to establish a Christian press. As the Catholic organs have been so long content to enact the rôle of Cinderella, it is no wonder that foreign countries (especially America and England) are compelled to draw all their information regarding Austria from Jewish-Liberal sources. The Piusverein subsidizes the Christian press sufficiently to enable it to meet every competitor, to obtain the best and most reliable information, to secure and train competent editors and to carry on a vigorous agitation to recover ground lost in the last fifty years.

The better to realize its objects, the Piusverein has established two subsidiary institutions, a Press-Bureau and a Journalists' Association. The Press-Bureau (9 Bäckerstrasse, Vienna, I.) is already performing doughty service, carries on daily an extensive correspondence with all the Catholic papers in Austria, and has been so successful in procuring and supplying the best and latest information as to arouse the envy of all its competitors. It also supplies stories, romances, essays, etc., as required, and, being in touch with experts on every imaginable subject, can supply at the shortest notice absolutely reliable information on any theme. An extensive network of correspondents, telephonic connection with every Catholic paper, telegraphic and cable connection with all important foreign parts, a literary and apologetic bureau, advertisement bureau—all these have been already taken in hand and are being developed from year to year as occasion requires. Of equal importance is the Journalists' Association, a society consisting of all the Catholic editors and authors, who, thanks to the munificence of the founder of this institution, are insured against sickness, old age and disability. Stipends for travel and relaxation, and premiums for studies, tend to raise the standard of journalism, to call forth fresh strength, and to make the vocation of the Catholic journalist, which has hitherto called for an unusual idealism and heroism, more and more respected and honored.

Throughout town and country, meetings are held and the people are informed of the three objects of the Piusverein. All are urged to become members, the poor subscribing 6 heller (about one cent) per month; others yearly from 2 kronen (40 cents) upwards. Wherever sufficient members can be found, a branch of the association is formed. About half the total receipts are assigned to the Central Branch in Vienna for the metropolitan organs, the Vaterland and the Reichspost, and for the maintenance and extension of its other institutions; the rest is utilized to develop the provincial press.

The rapid growth of the association will be best realized from the following figures: Number of members at the beginning of 1907, 44,000; 1908, 75,000; 1909, 102,000. The number of branches for the same periods were 136, 441, 649. In November, 1907, Father Kolb could inform the Catholic Convention that the Piusverein had already collected about 300,000 kronen ($60,000), while in the year 1908 the Central Branch alone devoted 130,000 kronen to its different objects, and the total income of the association was more than double this sum.

The results of the work of the association are already evident. Those who read the Vaterland and Reichspost three years ago must to-day be amazed at the development of these organs, the fulness of their news and the excellent journalistic talent they display. Exceptionally remarkable has been the development of the Reichspost, which has grown into one of the leading political organs and has now a world-wide status. The native or foreign writer, who wishes to sketch the conditions and aspirations of the Austria of to-day, can no longer ignore the Reichspost—the organ of the strongest party in Parliament, the mouthpiece of the overwhelming majority of the population. It is, therefore, only in the interests of truth that the attention of English and American papers should be called to this organ (Strozzigasse, 41, Vienna, VIII). To the magnificent agitation of the Piusverein, Die Neue Zeitung, an illustrated paper in Vienna, owes its origin and development. Although of but one and one-half years' standing, it has already 120,000 subscribers—a growth unexampled in Austria. On the other hand, the Jewish-Liberal press has encountered serious losses in prestige and subscriptions; the Neue Freie Presse is gradually losing all its influence, while the Kronenzeitung has already lost 100,000 readers.

These past achievements of the association assume all the greater significance when we consider that its activity has been hitherto confined to the German section of the Austrian people. The inclusion of the other nations is attended with very little difficulty, since they have only to contribute towards the Press-Bureau and Journalists' Association, while all the rest of their receipts can be devoted to their own press, as the German division has undertaken the endowment of the metropolitan organs. The Italian division of the association was started last year, and, assisted by the growing appreciation of its past service, new paths of development will be rapidly opened and the Piusverein will extend its operations through all Austria. The Austrian Catholics may thus hope to be soon in the possession of a vigorous Christian press—a press which will evoke their now latent energy and pave the way for a true Christian development, not alone in the spiritual vitality of the people, but also in their economic and political life.

Switzerland's New Civil Code

Hitherto the Swiss nation, with a population of about 3,500,000, has been governed under twenty-five different codes. The need of greater uniformity in legal matters was urgent, and the new code comes into force on January 1, 1912, for the whole nation. Meanwhile the Federal Council is authorized to anticipate one or other of its clauses as convenience or necessity requires.

The new code, while based on Roman Law, borrows largely from French and German Law, but whereas in the main as a piece of legislative construction it marks an advance, its treatment of religion and the family are lamentable.

The Swiss Kulturkampf is still recent history. In 1848 the religious were driven out, in 1854 the Government seized the churches, in 1857 clerics lost the right to vote. The Political Constitution of 1874 upheld neither protection, toleration, nor separation of State and Church. The various cantons were free to please themselves, and thus it came to pass that the Catholic Church became the official church in Ticino, the Protestant Church in Berne; in Friburg both were recognized. In various other places one or other sect was privileged, and the Catholic Church remained a private corporation before the law. This extraordinary state of affairs did not satisfy Catholics, and in the referendum they voted for its abolition. Article 59 of the new Code does not supply the remedy; it merely confirms the status quo. Article 52, however, acknowledges ecclesiastical bodies as having a moral personality without the necessity of being registered like trade-associations. It is a slight concession, but can hardly prove satisfactory to Swiss Catholics.

Concerning the family the new Code is dangerous. The legal marriage age is 20 for men and 18 for women, instead of 18 and 16 respectively, as it had been in the 1874 constitution. It lays down fidelity and support as the conjugal duties, and says nothing of love. Nowadays Canon Law is the only one that insists on love as a marital duty. The new code asserts that "the husband is the head of the family and on him lies the duty of supporting his wife and family" (Art. 160). "The wife's duty lies in assisting him in their common interest."

Article 274 declares that "to the family belongs the right of educating the children as far as it is able."

Homestead foundations on the lines of those that have succeeded so well in the U. S. A. are arranged for. Hereditary rights to intestate property are to extend only to the fourth degree of kinship, whereas the limit in France is the twelfth and in Italy the tenth.

The chief danger of the new code lies in its divorce regulations. Switzerland has had a divorce law for many years. Since 1896 the number of divorces has been annually increasing, and now the door has been pushed almost wide open. Motives entitling to divorce are: adultery, crime, dishonorable conduct, cruelty, injury, and insult to one's honor. Furthermore, Article 141 enacts that "when one of the married couple is afflicted with mental infirmity to such an extent that there is small hope of cure in the opinion of experts, and when such illness has lasted for three years, a divorce may always be obtained."

Article 142 is still more unusual. "When the conjugal relationship becomes so deeply disturbed and upset that it would be unreasonable to require a continuance of the conjugal union, a divorce may be granted." The plain meaning of this article is that free love and trial marriages become legalized. A tiff, a dispute over two bonnets or three, is enough to meet the requirements of this legislation.

French law in 1792 opened the door to divorce, but closed it again under the Restoration. It came in again with the French code in 1884, but even in France the Divorce Law is not so wide as this new Swiss one, and the results of such a law in France are notorious. It must only be hoped that the hard-headed good sense of the Swiss will mitigate the danger that threatens the Helvetic Republic.

CUNCTATOR.

From British Honduras

"Verily is this an easy going place," said one of my companions, as we stepped ashore on the Government wharf of Belize. We were closely and not at all bashfully stared at by a lot of men and boys, of varying complexions and of still more varying habiliments. If a leader of fashions for men wants a good rest for his brain, he should visit the tropics. The native feels, apparently, like the man from abroad, as to style and quality of dress. "Those who know him do not mind his attire, and those who don't know him don't bother their heads about him." Now, at any landing in the States, north or south, the visitor has a task to keep out of the clutches of eager men and boys, anxious to turn an honest penny by carrying valise or bundles. So we marveled at the utter unconcern of the ragged boys and idle men as to whether our belongings were to be carried to hotel or other house, by hand, in barrow, or by an airship. There are no hackmen, no expressmen, no messenger boys, ex officio, in Belize. You may carry your trunks if you choose, but the Creole disdains to help you by any offer of services for financial consideration. He will look at you, and it may be, criticise the way you manage the burden, but that is all. Some very black men idling in a lighter loaded with green plantains gaped at us and gave us the shudders by calmly eating the hard, white fruit as if it were quite ripe. The penchant for green fruit, I found later on, is quite common, but thus far I cannot see the little folks devouring unripe fruit without going back to my first hour in Belize and the shudders caused by the staring plantain eaters.

We succeeded in coaxing three or four lads with airy clothes and gleaming teeth to pilot us to our destination. Your true citizen of the world is the gamin. He is here in Belize absolutely one with his fellows of New York, Chicago, Paris, London, San Francisco or St. Louis. There was in our little black carriers the most perfect presentation of the principle of all gamins: "nil admirari," and whether we came from Japan or the United States, or the clouds or the depths of the sea, was a matter of supreme indifference to them. We, all unconscious of the fact that we were being carefully weighed, valued, sorted, etc., made remarks on the novel sights that met our gaze at every step. A few days later we heard all our remarks repeated in detail, and we found there was truth in the adage about "little pitchers." We were freely and frankly discussed in various homes, and our place was assigned us by the sovereign people of British Honduras, the boys of the street and their parents. We live and learn.

There are no sidewalks in Belize, and there are no street cars. So, when it is not dusty you can walk in the middle of the street if you choose, and when it is dusty you can walk anywhere you please and get your share. The paving is not bad; it is a world ahead of the west side in Chicago, for example; but then, there is nothing like Chicago traffic in Belize, nor, in fact, in the whole Colony. Owing to the nature of the soil and the slightness of elevation above sea-level, the rainy season makes a lot of puddles, but these do not last long and their main annoyance lies in the fact that one has to dodge about rather uncertainly, especially after dark, on the insufficiently lighted streets. For a place with a level stretch for many miles up and down the coast and inland, the city has been built in a crowded and haphazard manner. The homes of many of the poor are veritable hovels, crowded together in a suffocating proximity, reminding one of the Harlem of Nast in the 60's. There is a monotony, too, in the appearance of the houses of the better classes, showing a poverty of architectural ideas in the minds of the builders. But the broad, green shuttered verandas are suggestive of coolness in the face of the tropic glare, and many of the interiors are in admirable taste as to room plan and furnishings. There are no kitchens in the houses; the cooking is done in out-houses, and the food carried by hand, often under umbrellas, to the dining room. Only a few of the natives, comparatively, use stoves of the patterns familiar to homes farther north. The things that can be done by some cooks in the tropics, with only a brazier for their heat supply, makes one wonder whether, after all, the big steel ranges of the Waldorf and St. Nicholas are really worth while. But then, cooks are like poets and geniuses, and in their default why a good range does its share.

One thing is very odd to the man from the north for the first time in the tropics—the absence of the Philadelphia glory, the big front door. I commented on this and a Missourian told me that in Belize the way to the front door was generally “over the garden wall.” And he wasn’t so far wrong, either. Shade and coolness are more to be considered here than putting on a fine front. After all, it is the inside of the house that people live in, so why should they bother about how the outside affects the æsthetic sense of the passers-by? As the rainfall constitutes the water-works of the Colony, most of the houses have roofs of corrugated, galvanized iron, in some cases painted red, but generally left unpainted, so that a view of Belize from any high position is far from pretty—a dull whity-gray, that glares fiercely in the bright light. The postcard makers remedy this by putting abundance of colors on the roofs. V. E. F.

Some Coral-Builders in the Faith

A book which stirs up some reflection has lately come from the Catholic press in London and in New York, edited in the masterly way which one expects from Father Pollen and Dr. Burton. Certainly, these be great days for those of us who are endowed with the historical sense. As never since the Reformation (and, for that matter, as never before it), the original document runs forward to instruct, chasten, contradict, corroborate, abash or hearten the reader. Treasure-trove seems to crowd in, of itself, from all the nooks of Christian antiquity: but how little such a glorious betterment of things, due in almost every instance to the impartial inquiry of Protestants, has hitherto meant to us! Our Catholic body here in America needs inexpressibly, what may be called domestic scholarship and research: a sense of the background, the perspective, the framework of religion, such as comes from an individual third source which is neither nature nor grace. Diocesan annals, obituaries, jubilee “literary souvenirs,” and the rest, are thick as blackberries; but where (beyond one or at most two exceptions), are exact inquiry, ordered zeal and impartial statement? Any number of Papists, however, over in perfidious Albion, some living, some dead, can set us the pace in such matters, and do it to admiration.

A case in point is the Rev. John Kirk’s “Biographies of English Catholics in the Eighteenth Century,” now first printed from the manuscript. It does much, as the compiler intended it should do, to carry on Dodd’s unique History, itself as yet without index, and therefore largely neglected; although we are told that Kirk, after the too familiar and most melancholy fashion of scholars, “grew old in collecting the material,” and did no more than map out his plan. Great care, endless diligence, built up this otherwise lost dynastic record. According to the measure of human ignorance on any topic, is the value of whatever can remove that ignorance. We may all cheerfully confess (as Kirk’s editors recommended), that the years 1700-1800 cover our ecclesiastical Darkest Africa.

We know the Elizabethan martyrs, in their heroic radiance; we know the Catholic Cavaliers, dispossessed, exiled, attainted, slain on every battlefield of “the Warres”; we know the Cromwellian terrors in Ireland, the slow dying-out of the old religion among the Welsh hills, the long dumb agonies of the Penal Code, down to the final opening of the sluices of justice under Pitt and O’Connell. But who knows the hidden stream of prayer and good works which trickled through three generations of Georgian soullessness?—that sad “inconspicuous Church of the Catacombs in the eighteenth century?” that “time of depression, lost hopes, and discouragements,” a time “when there seemed no future but one of gradual extinction,” when men “were called upon to endure rather than to achieve?” Isolated manors in the country, with their guarded chapels, Ambassadors’ houses in London, whence Massing-priests could not, by international law, be routed—these were the bed-rock of English faithfulness. Forgotten men, barred from political or professional life, and women, mostly of gentle blood and half-educated, lived their cramped lives and died their obscure deaths that the soul-inheritance of a once sainted island might not perish; and of such this unemotional volume is the record. Honor to them, and everlasting remembrance! There is no such story of prolonged loyalty to the Church, except among the Irish peasants.

Handsome is that handsome does; but it is evident that the Rev. John Kirk’s was a merely scribal intelligence. His long life, from 1760 to 1851, at which latter date he could look upon a restored hierarchy, and Wiseman gloriously reigning, taught him not literary grace, nor artistic selection, nor rhetorical emphasis, but only truth. He is conscious of none of the high lights of individualism. The priests, with their pathetic aliases, who were always “Mr. So-and-so” to their scattered flocks; the Abbesses on foreign soil, who kept up their English succession from “Mrs.” to “Mrs.”; the proud names which stood, and stand, staunchly Catholic, and those other proud names perished, or apostate through fear, or love of ease—none of them are able here to waken from their labelled graves to make “a page of prancing poesy.”

Catalogues need not always be stone-cold. Think of Aubrey’s “Brief Lives,” or Fuller’s “Worthies,” or even Mather’s “Magnalia Christi,” crammed with the romantic oddities of the seventeenth century; and of Grove’s

"Dictionary of Music," or the "Dictionary of National Biography," graced with the humane touch of the nineteenth century: and how barren look these family annals which are so much dearer to us than they! Kirk had a perfect genius not only for misplacing the accent, so to speak, but for suppressing or subordinating what most we wish to discover.

Where on his roll are Richard Challoner and Alban Butler? Where is Alexander Pope? Packed into a few miserable lines, with cursory references to other authorities. Dryden has no mention save an incidental one under a different heading. Kirk entirely disregards a lesser writer, Elizabeth Inchbald, "A Beauty and a Virtue"; and the important antiquaries, Hugh Thomas of Brecon, Thomas Hearne of Oxford, and (most astonishing omission of all, perhaps) Prince Charles Edward. Catholicism is a queer drag-net, as human nature is; but these were all Catholics, early or late, thorough or superficial, in their day, the day of which Kirk is the fireside historian. A dramatic detail invariably escapes him. From his account of our first American Father in God, Archbishop Carroll, you shall never gather news of his consecration in Lulworth Castle Chapel. It is not from Kirk's accurate notice of that noblest Jacobite, the Earl of Derwentwater, that we get wind of the wonderful north-country tradition, how a great light "ran page" by his beautiful body, as it was borne from St. Giles in the Fields to Dilston vault. No; our absolute invaluable Kirk is dry bones, hard fact, dead prose. His only function he performed well: he dug up long buried data, and gave us a true genealogy. He is not Scott, nor Defoe. But we, if we have any imagination, can pore over this categorical book, and peer into the very faces of those who in hunger and sorrow held the besieged City of God in England, until the splendid rescuers of the Oxford Movement rode in, with victory in their train.

The Development of Christian Socialism.

III. EXTENSION OF THE FELLOWSHIP OF CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS.

Organized after the manner of Social parties and equipped with effective means for propaganda, "The Christian Fellowship" has within the few years of its existence made remarkable progress. The Christian Socialist, in its issue of September 15, 1908, says: "The Fellowship now has district secretaries in twenty-six States, the District of Columbia and the Province of New Brunswick, Canada. We are represented by our membership in no less than thirty-five States and three territories in the United States, and in addition thereto our members may be found in four Canadian provinces."

The churches and denominations which these new Christian Socialists have thus far attempted to permeate with their message, are chiefly those of the Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Unitarians and Congregationalists; a fact which finds its explanation in the circumstance that Protestant ministers are not only a large portion of the membership, but also perform the principal part in the work of administration and propaganda. When in the summer of 1908 the General Secretary of the Fellowship issued a manifesto to clergymen and churches of all denominations, over two hundred Protestant ministers attached their signatures, and by so doing declared their adherence to Christian Socialism. The names of 160 of them were subsequently published with their consent in the Christian Socialist, September 1 and 15, 1908.

Among the members of the National Executive Committee elected in Chicago, 1907, were seventeen, and among the seven additional members elected in New York, 1908, four ministers. The actual General Secretary, Rev. John D. Lenox, is the pastor of the Parkside Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, N. Y. The great majority of the District and Centre Secretaries are likewise ministers. The Christian Socialist, the official organ, which is mainly instrumental in shaping the ideas of the Fellowship, is practically in the hands of Protestant clergymen; the chief editor and five of the nine contributing editors being preachers.

In many other ways the bond of friendship existing between the Fellowship and Protestant denominations is clearly visible. The Third Annual Conference in New York, 1908, held its meetings in Protestant churches, celebrated communion services in the Episcopalian Church of the Ascension, and saw its clerical delegates invited to deliver lectures and sermons in the principal metropolitan pulpits. Still the Christian Socialist Fellowship is not willing to confine itself to Protestant denominations. Of late it has commenced to carry its message to the Catholic Church. The Christian Socialist, in a special edition of January 15, 1909, set forth the reasons why Catholics should become Socialists. As Socialism, we are told, is only an economic and political system, and aims only at the deliverance of the oppressed, the Church is not concerned with it, the ecclesiastical authority cannot reprove it, nay, has, in fact, positively approved of it. Leo XIII, in his encyclical on the condition of labor, embraces the essentials of Socialism. He denounces capitalism and employers, sides with the working party, condemns the wage system, woman and child labor, admits the class-struggle, recognizes the right of the laborers to the product of their toil as also the right of the people to self-government, and points out Socialism as the remedy for social evils. Enlightened Catholic bishops, priests, and laymen express their sympathies with socialist reforms after they have gained an insight into their soundness. Throughout history, it is further alleged, Christianity proved a failure, because it was made a support of wealth and property, and nowadays the Church loses her hold on the people, because she declines to relieve their sufferings, and resists Divine Providence, because she opposes modern revolution. For the present purpose it suffices merely to state the kind of reasons advanced, in order to win Catholics for the Christian Socialist movement. An inquiry into their intrinsic value must be the subject of a special discussion.

Plainly the aspirations of the "Christian Socialist Fellowship" are high. It aims at permeating all denominations without exception with the message of Jesus, and thus reducing them to perfect harmony all over the North American continent. But even this is not its ultimate object. Its ambition is to become the centre of an international as well as inter-denominational movement, and its outlook in this direction appears bright and hopeful. The official organ of the Fellowship relates that the germs of Christian Socialism are sown also in European countries and expresses the hope that they will soon develop into branches united with the large tree planted on this side of the Atlantic. A Christian Socialist Fellowship has been established in France by Professors Passy and Biville and Pastor Monod. Another exists in England side by side with the Socialist Church League, the Christian Social Brotherhood and the Brotherhood of Christian Socialists; all of a recent date and with an outspoken Socialist tendency. The movement has also been started by Protestant ministers in Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland and Italy. In Glasgow, Scotland, a Catholic Socialist Society was formed in 1906, which, it is said, stands for the same principles as do the recognized Socialist bodies in America. All this sounds so encouraging to the editor of the Chicago Christian Socialist, that he writes in the issue of January 1, 1909: "With sections already organized in France, England and America, with a splendid nucleus in Zurich, with Christian Socialist papers in Italy and Holland, and many ministers in Denmark coming over, there ought to be a grand International Christian Socialist Conference before many years, perhaps the first one in 1910."

Socialist hopes have often proved too sanguine, and such may be also the one just expressed. Impartial lookers-on at least may be tempted to think so, when they read in the same Christian Socialist that in June, 1908, the American Fellowship, the largest of all, had not more than 270 members. A retrospect on the historical facts set forth recalls to our mind a twofold development through which the Christian Social movement has gone, one in its economic and political, the other in its religious features. Under its economic aspect, as it rose in Continental Europe, it was socialistic in a vague and general sense, in so far as it aimed at the betterment of society and the elevation of the laboring classes, but altogether opposed to Socialism in its modern acceptation. In England and America, on the contrary, it was from the beginning in every respect specifically socialistic; for the reforms it advocated were projected by the Utopian and later on by modern Socialists, and it steadily progressed in this direction, until it has become in our day thoroughly Marxian and revolutionary.

On the other hand, the form of Christianity with which the French and German reformers harmonized their remedial measures was that professed by the Catholic Church or by Protestant denominations of a definite positive creed. Contrariwise, the form of Christianity professed by the English and American Christian Socialists lost little by little a specific character, in so much that to-day it is interdenominational. J. MING, S.J.

Islam and Common Sense

It is a sign of the times that Christians, men who call themselves Christians, are taking Islam not only seriously but amicably. The disintegration of dogmatic Christianity, outside the pale of the Catholic Church, leaves the times ready to accept any form of belief, even the belief of the Muslim. The propaganda in favor of the religion of Muhammed is carried on in the main by Muslims of India, men who have been educated in England and America, and have still clung to their Quran. The Hon. Ameer Ali and Sir Ahmed are writing in such wise as to make Islam attractive to the man of common sense, who has given up dogmatic Christianity.

In The Hibbert Journal for April, 1909, a writer who signs himself Ibn Ishak, Son of the Chief, contributes a paper on "Islam and Common Sense." His article is introduced by Thomas Patrick Hughes, Fellow of the Punjab Oriental University, and author of "A Dictionary of Islam," who writes from New York City. Mr. Hughes stands sponsor for his Muslim friend Ibn Ishak. At the very outset we wonder that Mr. Hughes deems Islam "the religion of common sense," for he acknowledges that his friend Mulla Ahmed, was assassinated on account of work done on "A Dictionary of Islam"; and that Ibn Ishak does not sign his own name for fear of a like fate.

This article in favor of Islam is favorably commented on by The Living Church, one of the recognized defenders of Episcopalianism, in its issue for May 1. Canon Hensley Henson, in his broad Church discourse at the recent Boston Congress, accepted the common sense of Islam by asserting: "The Spirit of God works in every form of religion or in none." Ibn Ishak gives no proof of Islam that common sense admits. Common sense demands that we accept no worship as divine unless it be proven to be divine. Ibn Ishak should prove to us that Muhammed was a God-sent prophet and had a God-given message to be received by men. He proves no such thing. Quite the contrary. He admits that Muhammed claimed no more prophetic power than had been exercised by fully 124,000 persons of the past.

What proofs does Ibn Ishak offer us, for our acceptance of Islam as the "religion of common sense"? He begins by admitting that when Muhammed called himself

"Messenger (Rasul) of God," this Prophet of the desert seemed to have had the broadest possible conception of the gift of prophecy, and said that in the history of the world, there had been as many as three hundred special Messengers of God . . . and as many as 124,000 persons who had had the gift of prophecy. He placed Plato, Æsop, and Zoroaster among the prophets and inspired teachers; and the intelligent Muslim does not hesitate to place Shakespeare, Schiller and Milton among the "prophets in the West."

Muhammed, then, is no more a prophet than is Plato, or Æsop or Shakespeare! The man of common sense will enjoy the fables of Æsop; he will not pin his faith to them nor to the message and authority of one no more inspired than their author. Ibn Ishak tells us the man of common sense should be impressed by the fact that "the Quran is not troubled with the Higher Critic"! Wait a while. If the Quran comes to be taken seriously in the so-called Christian world, the critic will very quickly tear it to shreds and show those shreds in the Old Testament, New Testament, Apocrypha, legends of Christian hagiography. The man of common sense should also be impressed by the never changing text of the Quran as contrasted with "the endless controversies among Christian scholars regarding the text of their sacred books." These "endless controversies" are chiefly among those who believe in an infallible book and not in an infallible Church of Christ. Why has not the New Testament been preserved to us free from variants? Because Christ founded a Church, not a book, free from variation; Christ entrusted His doctrines to a never-changing Church, not to a never-changing book! The Kalifah Usman destroyed every other book but the official edition of the Quran. Since his time, the great concern of Muslim authorities has been to keep the Quran in the same stereotyped form. It has not been translated into the language of the people. I heard it quoted in Arabic by the Shak of the howling dervishes of Constantinople, despite the fact that the people there speak Turkish and Greek, not Arabic. Nowhere is the language of the people in the Turkish Empire the archaic Arabic of the Quran; yet the Quran must remain unchanged! No wonder, then, that the Turkish censor refuses to allow the Jesuit editors of Beirut even to refer to the Quran!

Such are some of the arguments of Ibn Ishak. He makes out a fairly good case, unless one knew the Koran and El Bokhara. Any one who is familiar with the revolting details of El Bokhara—the lust of Muhammed for his nineteen wives; the ease of summary divorce, the use and abuse of women; any one who has spoken with the Moslem in Egypt and Syria, who has heard him curse the Cross, who has not dared even mention the name Muhammed or Shak el-Islam, will not be blinded to Islam just as it is, will not be wheedled into considering Ibn Ishak's Islam to be the religion of common sense.

CORRESPONDENCE

Political Rivalries in Portugal

LISBON, MAY 17, 1909.

It is difficult to write about Portugal at the present time, because of the uncertainty as to what the morrow will bring. The country is passing through a grave crisis and none can foresee the end because, unfortunately, an anarchy of ideas and an absence of discipline has become characteristic of those who, by education, position and otherwise, should direct the national destinies. We need a leader who, to the qualities of the ex-Dictator, Joao Franco, courage, energy and honesty, would add those of tact and patience. If the opportunity brings the man, as the saying is, he ought to be at the door. The Monarchists in their newspapers are exposing each other's lack of patriotism and even of common sense; but while they combat one another in violent language or with more serious weapons (there have been three political duels lately) the Republicans rejoice and the country suffers.

After the murder of King Carlos and his son, the two historic parties of Regeneradores and Progressistas, who had been severely handled for their maladministration by the Dictator, revived and combined to form a "conciliation" Ministry under Vice-Admiral Ferreira do Amaral, a non-party man. This government did little legislative work but it gave an exterior calm to the country by adopting a policy of all round concessions, while it made no serious attempt to find and punish the regicides. Hence the Revolutionary elements were the best served. It was known that members of the parties in power were responsible for the movement which led to the King's death, therefore the Ministry was afraid to take action, and it is this cowardice which has emboldened the Extremists to preach sedition day by day in newspapers, which as a prominent Republican lately said, it is impossible to read. In November last came the Lisbon Municipal Elections, which, like all elections here, were wont to be "worked" by the Government. Ferreira do Amaral rightly refused to continue a bad tradition and as the Monarchists could not lay aside their feuds and contrive to present a list of candidates, the Republicans were allowed a walk over and for the first time occupy all the seats at the Town Hall.

The Regenerator leader, ever proclaiming his eagerness for power, made this a pretext for withdrawing his support from the Amaral Cabinet which accordingly fell, but when Conselheiro Vilhena thought to take the reins, one of his own Ministers, Conselheiro Campos Henriques, left him, thus further reducing the strength of a party which years before had been seriously weakened by the secession of Joao Franco. The party of Henriquistas was now added to the first political parties of the Monarchy—all of whom, except the Franquistas and Nationalistas, differ from each other in name and not in policy and have neither programs nor fixed principles. The new party came to an understanding with the Progressistas and as the two together had a majority in the House of Deputies, the King, to avoid the agitation which a dissolution would cause, confided the Government to them at the end of December. Thereupon the Regeneradores allied themselves with the Dissidentes (a party of demagogic leaders almost without followers, which had split from the Progressistas) and when Parliament met on March 1, the "bloc" resorted to systematic obstruction which forced the Ministry to resign. A loan negotiated by the Finance Minister, Espregneira, served as the pretext, the real reason was personal dislike of certain members of the Cabinet and desire for power at any cost. Once again, however, Conselheiro Vilhena was balked in his unpatriotic game, for the King confided the task of forming a Cabinet to General Telles, a Progressista, but the Ministry lasted less than a month (from April 12 to May 3), falling as the result of a quarrel between a Regenerador deputy and the majority in the House of Deputies, in which both sides were to blame. As I write, there is no Government. At the downfall of the Telles Cabinet, May 3, the King called on Wenceslao de Lima to form a Cabinet. This he succeeded in doing, but thought it more prudent to adjourn Parliament for a period of two months with the hope that at the end of that time parliamentary anarchy and rivalries would have died down. The uselessness of Parliament is so evident that none regret it; indeed, when the country is without a Ministry the funds are wont to rise, but the National business remains at a standstill and this cannot continue.

There are serious international questions on hand, the situation at Macao, weakened by the Chinese, and the treaty with the Transvaal, which the opposition parties are attacking for party purposes as being subversive of the autonomy of the country. At home there are problems of equal import, yet not a bill has been passed this year. These problems are economic rather than political, for it is not new electoral and press laws that Portugal needs, indeed she has already excellent laws, if they were observed, and quite as much liberty as, owing to the want of education of most of her citizens, she can safely use. It is a good sign that non-party men are expressing their disgust with the politicians who are sacrificing the general interests to their own advancement and making the task of the popular and well-intentioned young King as difficult as possible, but public opinion in this direction is not sufficiently organized to have its way; moreover, it lacks a leader in whom all have confidence. Still there is an awakening, even among the rank and file of the historic parties, which promises to raise the tone of politics in the near future, but the Republicans are endeavoring to show that the desire for a more moral administration cannot be satisfied under the existing régime. They promise a Kingdom of Truth and Justice, but they lack leaders of character, and having unwisely adopted a bitterly anti-clerical attitude in imitation of the French, they cannot convert the North and Centre of Portugal (the bone and sinew of the country) to their views. As yet they form only a small minority of the nation, and any revolutionary movement would certainly be suppressed by the army which is loyal to the King and only anxious to prove its loyalty.

To the credit of the Republicans, however, it must be said that the Congress held at Setubal last month, by the orderly manner in which the proceedings were conducted, set an example to Parliament which the latter might follow with gain to its prestige and even its dignity.

In March the news came that D. Miguel, the legitimist pretender, was disposed to renounce his right and return to Portugal to strengthen the throne of D. Manuel with his presence and advice against the attacks of the Revolutionaries. The Liberal journals were at once in arms against this fresh evidence of what they call "the religious reaction," and the offer was not accepted by the Government. It must be said that in Portugal, Liberal and freethinker are the same thing and mean one who would tyrannize over others in the name of a freedom he preaches but is unable to practise. These Liberals, who are generally but not always Republicans, would destroy the existing order, including belief in God, which, in their view, makes men slaves, and above all would do away with religious education in favor of "lay" schools. As I write, the walls of the capital are placarded with announcements of a book, "Christ Never Existed," but Lisbon is not Portugal and in the provinces the people are as good as gold, and if they fall a prey to false prophets, it is due to their lack of instruction. HENRY BYRON.

Catholicity in Argentina

The anti-religious propaganda, chiefly in politics and education, which has, during the last quarter of a century or more, so sadly influenced the affairs of the world, could not fail to make itself felt in the Argentine Republic. The rather rapid transition from a state of despotism to that of unbounded liberty, the wild freedom of life on the Pampas, especially; the sparseness of the population, and its isolation owing to the great distances that separated it from such centres of civilization as existed in the early years of the past century; the disorder, lawlessness and anarchy consequent on frequently recurring revolutions; the facilities for intercommunication with the savage tribes on the frontier; the fewness and, perhaps, the inefficiency of the clergy, notwithstanding the many examples of apostolic zeal and piety, are to the mind of the present writer the chief factors which have paved the way to a state of irreligion, first, and its natural consequence, the anti-religious spirit, afterwards.

Add to these causes the fact that Buenos Aires became early infected with the virus of freemasonry, and that of the French Revolution, which an immigration composed of the offscourings of European cities, carried to the other small cities and towns of the River Plate, and the reader is in a position to form some idea of the many and serious difficulties which beset the progress of religion, as well as the favorable field which lay open to the anti-Catholic proselytiser and the revolutionary propagandist. During the period when the sun of liberty seemed most obscured, religion was outraged in the very sanctuary, whilst the dagger of the assassin was brandished aloft, in lawless triumph, over the heads of a people bowed down under the yoke of despotism. This occurred during the sway of the tyrant De Rosas.

What is the result of such a state of things? The great majority of the inhabitants of this republic are professedly Catholics, yet but a small minority of them are practical Catholics. The former are baptized, and, as a rule, call a priest at the hour of death; but as for any other exterior manifestation of the faith they profess, I, for my part, after a life-long residence among them, cannot affirm that it is conspicuous. Yet let no one think that I mean to convey that as good Catholics are not to be found here as in any other country in the world. There are many such who lead exemplary lives, are most bountiful in their contributions to charitable works, are full of a holy zeal for the interests of religion, and are in every way firm and zealous promoters of God's truth and God's glory.

Such a state of affairs as I have been just describing, could not long subsist without some decided advance being made either in the direction of orthodoxy or of Atheism. The latter is what occurred, as might be expected. Encouraged by the example of infidel France and stimulated by its teaching, the Government well-nigh cast aside every mark of respect for the authority of the Church, passed the civil registry law which sanctioned civil marriage, as it is called, and followed this up with another enactment rendering education laical and obligatory, as its model the French Republic had done already. Here it may be well to observe that the French are invariably taken as models, whenever it is intended to introduce any law or measure, or to adopt any custom detrimental to religion; but I fail to note any similar emulation of our great model regarding what is good and worthy of imitation. The desecration of the cemeteries is another of the items on the anti-Catholic program of the time, but that, at least, awaits a further opportunity for its becoming law.

As might be expected these laws did not pass without meeting serious opposition on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities, the Catholic press, and the few Catholics who held seats in the legislature. They were of course beaten by a large majority. Later on Deputy Olivera introduced his divorce bill, which, if passed, would place the country on a par, as regards the facility it would afford for changing mates, with France or the United States. It was, however, thrown out by the small majority of two votes. The partisans of the measure are saying, no doubt, better luck next time, and judging by what appears as the obvious signs of the times, I fear we are justified in believing that their chances of success are not to be despised. Were there amongst the members of the legislature many such true and able Catholics as Dr. S. G. O'Farrell, an Argentine of Irish descent, and national deputy for Buenos Aires, much might be hoped for the future of Catholicity in the country, but unfortunately there cannot be many more than there are, for their co-religionists are numerically, at least, pretty fairly represented already.

What can be done to improve this state of things? This is a question which, all important as it is, has doubtless often been asked not only here but in many other places where a like state of affairs holds. A successful response has been given in some at least: witness Germany, Belgium, and the scarcely less significant awakening of civic energy in Italy at the last elections, where, unless I am misinformed, Catholic candidates scored so many victories. In this country, also, movements have been set on foot, and certain measures proposed with the object of remedying, as far as possible, the evils alluded to, but, I regret to say, with no very practical results so far. The Latin-American Council held in Rome some years ago, laid particular stress on the necessity of providing two obviously important means, viz.: the Catholic press and the Catholic school, and a short time after resolutions to the same effect were adopted by the Argentine prelates assembled at Salta, in this republic. In the wake of these have come no less than three Catholic congresses, all held in this country, and the last of them only a few months ago.

Each of these, it is almost needless to say, seconded with enthusiasm the resolution adopted by the former councils. Thus it appears that there can be no doubt as to the unanimity which prevails in Catholic quarters as to the great importance and necessity of the school and the press, and the urgency with which the placing of them on a footing of efficiency adequate to the attainment of the great ends which it is theirs to secure, is demanded. But as to the political side of affairs, our Argentine reformers are by no means unanimous. Some favor the idea of establishing a Catholic party in politics, whilst others express themselves, if not decidedly opposed to such a movement, at least rather doubtful as to the benefits it may be likely to confer. In this matter, our leaders of the Catholic body, do not seem to chime in with their brethren across the ocean, where it is evident that political as well as social and religious organization has been greatly instrumental in bringing about those changes which have brought the respective Catholic parties to the front, not only in Catholic Belgium, but also in Lutheran Germany, and bids fair, as we have seen, to achieve similar success in Italy itself.

The Royal Supremacy a Fact

LONDON, MAY 22.

The Court of King's Bench this week gave a judgment which brings home to our Anglican friends the fact that the Royal Supremacy is a hard reality. A clergyman of the Established Church had refused to admit to Communion one of his flock who, under the new law, had married his deceased wife's sister. Canon Thompson held that people thus married were living "a scandalous life," and that an Act of Parliament could not supersede the "Law of the Church" against such marriages. The Court of King's Bench after some days of argument by learned counsel has told him that the law of the land is the law of the Church. If he persists in refusing Communion to the aggrieved parties he runs the risk of further proceedings by which he may be deprived of his benefice. There is an outcry in the High Church papers. "It is ruled in effect," says The Church Times, "that admission to Holy Communion is regulated by Act of Parliament. . . . If these judges have rightly interpreted the law of England, there is only one thing to be said. That law must be sternly and steadily resisted." And The Guardian complains of the "will of Parliament overriding the law of the Church."

The wonderful thing is that here is all this talk about the "law of the Church," and its alleged conflict with Acts of Parliament, whereas such conflict is impossible, for the Anglican Church itself exists by Act of Parliament, and cannot alter a line of its ritual unless in virtue of a vote of the two Houses of Parliament confirmed by the Royal Assent. There is no Church law in the Established Church except the King's law. St. Anselm and St. Thomas of Canterbury resisted the claim of the King and Parliament to override the "law of the Church," but they had a real church behind them. The Catholic martyrs died in protest against the claim of King and Parliament to make laws for the Church, but out of the acceptance of that claim arose the Established Church of England. Its very Prayer-Book is a schedule of an Act of Parliament.

When the Act to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister was passed, Mr. Birrell made a stinging reply to the protests of the Anglican clergy that Parliament could not interfere with the laws of marriage. "But for an Act of Parliament," he said, "the wives and children of these gentlemen would have no legal status and would find themselves in a very strange position." The Church of England, speaking by the voice of Convocation and at the Lambeth Congress, has refused to forbid the solemnization of marriages between divorced persons. It has calmly accepted the State-made divorce law, and most clergymen make no difficulty about the deceased wife's sister. The High Churchmen who protest will have to learn that the Royal Supremacy is a reality.

Last week the bigots of the Protest Alliance experienced a rude shock when the Catholic Disabilities Bill was read a second time. This week they had another rebuff. Their Bill for the Inspection of Convents was thrown out on the first reading in the House of Commons by a majority of eighty-five. It is the rarest thing for the House to reject a Bill on the first reading, and this shows how slight the influence of the bigots really is. Their success in frightening Mr. Asquith into stopping the procession last year gave them a false idea of their power. Mr. Asquith has recovered from his fright and learned to appreciate the strength of the Catholics, whose votes have helped to carry more than one by-election against his candidates. A. H. A.

Italy's Foreign Policy

ROME, MAY 22, 1909.

Thursday, May 20, was a day to be marked with a white stone by all who had the good fortune to assist at the Canonization of Sts. Clement M. Hofbauer and Joseph Oriol in St. Peter's. At 8.30 A. M. began the great procession of more than one thousand persons, containing one hundred and twenty-two Bishops, and twenty-five Cardinals, followed by the gentle figure of the Holy Father blessing the assembled multitudes as he was borne aloft in the portantina. The long ceremony of the proclamation of the new Saints, the Te Deum, and the Papal Mass, with the silver trumpets awakening magic echoes in Michael Angelo's cupola above, lasted exactly five hours. The Diplomatic gallery and that reserved for members of Noble Roman families were thronged. The burgomaster of Vienna, Herr Lueger, was prevented by illness from being present at the canonization of the Apostle of his city, but the Viennese municipality was represented by the vice-mayor and many of its aldermen.

St. Oriol was born of humble parentage at Barcelona (Spain) in 1650, and was ordained there in 1676. For nine years he acted as tutor in a wealthy family, and in 1686 he made a pilgrimage on foot to Rome; in the following year he became pastor of St. Maria a Pinu in his native town. A model of zeal and charity he died there in 1702, and the people of Barcelona made his funeral an occasion for an extraordinary manifestation of their belief in the sanctity of his life and person. His cause was introduced in 1786: and in 1806 he was beatified. The postulator of the Canonization has been Cardinal Vives.

The Budget of Agriculture was made the occasion of an attack on the ministry in the Chamber by the Opposition, Radical and Socialist groups. One of the Radicals charged the Board of Agriculture with incompetency and maladministration, and cited certain facts, which the Government party tried to minimize, but which the Opposition declared were criminal offences, and demanded a parliamentary inquiry. The Government suggested a ministerial inquiry and by a vote of 209 to 77 the Government suggestion was carried. This is the third time in two months it has secured an overwhelming vote of confidence.

Tittoni's foreign policy seems to be working out well for Italy. The Berlin and Vienna press look on the royal meeting at Brindisi as a pledge of the stability of the Triple Alliance, while the London, Paris and St. Petersburg press hail the meeting at Baia as a feather in the cap of the Triple Entente. The joint telegram from the two Emperors emphasizes their anxiety to stand well with Italy. This merely shows the influence of Emperor William at Vienna, and not that the feeling in Austria towards Italy has undergone any change. King Victor's telegram in reply echoes the feeling of the intelligent masses in Italy who, while not enthusiastic over the Triple Alliance, recognize its necessity for Italy.

While Berlin has a naval program for a total of thirty-six Dreadnoughts, Italy has a program for four Dreadnoughts, three fast cruisers and improved coast defenses. The Minister of War is about to ask for a further vote of $30,000,000. Some idea of the sentiment in the country may be gained from the fact that poor as Italy is, there is hardly a voice raised in opposition to this increased military expenditure. Even the Socialists and Radicals are very mild in their criticisms. L'EREMITE.

The Late Archbishop Duhamel

The Archdiocese of Ottawa has sustained an incalculable loss in the death of its Chief Pastor, Joseph Thomas Duhamel, which occurred somewhat unexpectedly on Saturday evening, June 5th, at Casselman, whither he had gone to make his annual pastoral visit. The deceased prelate had been in failing health for a considerable time, so that the news, which was announced in the various churches of the Capital on Sunday morning, did not come as a surprise. With wonderful vitality, an uncompromising sense of duty, and an energy which seemed to surmount the gradual decline of the physical powers and the feebleness which had been becoming so painfully perceptible, the late Archbishop attended to the high duties of his office without intermission. Even in the extreme cold of midwinter, he was found officiating in out-of-town parishes, no less than within the metropolitan limits. On one of his last public appearances, at the laying of the corner-stone of the new Sacred Heart Church, the feebleness of his appearance and of his voice were remarked, but he would delegate his duties to none. It was his openly expressed wish that he should die at the post of duty, and his wish was granted with almost startling exactitude. Even the secular papers comment upon the late prelate's extraordinary devotion to duty, and the conflict which was waged, as it were, for so many years of illness, between spirit and matter, and which resulted at last fatally on Saturday evening. He had been very actively interested in the preparations for the coming Plenary Council, though he had been heard to express the opinion that he should not be spared to attend its sessions. There was a pathetic impressiveness in the reading at High Mass on Sunday of the Letter of Indiction concerning that Council, by order of the Archbishop, and his pastoral, by which it was accompanied. It was as if that voice from the grave still spoke, to impress upon the faithful their duties in regard to that solemn event.

On Saturday morning the Archbishop assisted at his last function in Ottawa, an ordination at the Cathedral, during the course of which he was seized with one of the heart attacks which had become very frequent of late. He rallied, and in the afternoon set out for Casselman, a parish some twenty-five miles from the city, where he was met by a deputation of the parishioners. He gave Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament and, apparently in his usual health, took supper with the local clergy and chatted with them until the time of retiring. About ten o'clock a cry was heard, and hastening to his room it was found that a very severe attack of the angina pectoris from which he suffered indicated a fatal termination. A doctor was summoned, only to declare that the end had come. The last Sacraments were administered, and after the choking symptoms had passed, there was an interval of calm, during which the dying prelate repeated, as an assistant priest declares, the Sacred Names of Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and with those names upon his lips the strong and valiant spirit of Ottawa's first Archbishop passed to its reward within the Octave of Pentecost and on the vigil of Trinity Sunday.

In the afternoon the beloved remains were transported to the metropolis and were met at the central station by nearly all the clergy of the city and by an immense concourse of the faithful, from the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, down to the humblest of those who had reason to remember the paternal kindness of the deceased. At the Basilica the remains were met by the Vicar-General Mgr. Routhier and two assistants, one of whom, Father Lapointe, had been ordained on Saturday morning by His Grace and had said his first Mass on Sunday. A Libera was sung and the Office of the Dead chanted by the assembled clergy. The body will lie in state until Thursday, when the obsequies will take place. On that occasion will preach respectively in French and English, Archbishops Bruchesi of Montreal, and Gauthier of Kingston, the latter of whom had been consecrated by the deceased. Mgr. Routhier, the Vicar-General, will act as administrator of the diocese.

Joseph Thomas Duhamel was born at Contrecoeur, near Montreal, in 1841, and was therefore sixty-eight at the time of his death. Educated in St. Joseph's School, Ottawa, and in the University of that city, whither his parents had removed, he made his theological studies at the same institution and was ordained to the priesthood in 1863. He acted as curate in Buckingham, P. Q., and as parish priest at St. Eugene. While in this latter post he was chosen to accompany his Bishop, Mgr. Guigues, to Rome for the Vatican Council, and later to the Council of Quebec. Upon the death of Bishop Guigues he was named Bishop of Ottawa in October, 1874. Twelve years later the See became an Archbishopric. In 1899, Mgr. Duhamel celebrated the Silver Jubilee of his priesthood, a felicitous occasion for his people, in which something of what he had accomplished for his pastoral charge became manifest. His Cathedral of Notre Dame was raised shortly after to the dignity of a minor basilica, with a regularly organized chapter of Canons. Amongst the honors conferred upon that simple and unobtrusive churchman, were the degree of D. D., the title of Assistant to the Pontifical Throne, of Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre, of Roman Count, and the function of Chancellor of the University of Ottawa.

Catholic education was a master passion of the late Metropolitan. He made strenuous efforts in behalf of the chief institution of learning in Ottawa, which mainly by his good offices became a University, but he likewise took a loving and paternal interest in the separate or parochial schools of his diocese, which he leaves in a highly flourishing condition and with an exceptional record in competitive examinations and the rest. He was an active member of the Council of Public Instruction of Quebec, since a considerable portion of his charge lay within the boundaries of that province. During his incumbency churches and schools, institutes of education and of charity, have been multiplied at a rate which, considering the comparative smallness of the Catholic population under his care, is truly wonderful. That population itself has increased during the last few years from very small beginnings till it numbers some two hundred thousand souls. His desire, as expressed in his own reply to an address from his people on the occasion of his Jubilee, "was to work unceasingly for the glory of God and your immortal souls."

His conception of the duties of a Chief Pastor were lofty. "I remember," he said, "what had been the mission of John the Baptist. He was chosen to prepare unto the Lord a perfect people. I understood that such was also the mission of the Bishops in the Catholic Church. I began my work with the strong and sincere resolution to ever and strenuously 'prepare the way of the Lord and make straight His path.'" That he has realized that lofty ideal is universally acknowledged. It is also generally conceded that his scholastic and theological attainments were conspicuous, his administrative qualities notable, while his simplicity, humility, modesty, and love of retirement led him to shun as much as possible the public eye. His charity was unbounded, his love for the poor proverbial; with a kindness of heart that caused him to be easily accessible, and genial, sympathetic, and affable in manner, he had an extreme dislike to journalistic publicity, and rarely permitted himself to be interviewed by a reporter, preferring always to address his own flock simply by his pastorals. His eminent prudence and something of aloofness and reserve, as regarded questions outside of his domain, were precisely what best fitted the Capital See over which he presided with so much of dignity and personal holiness. He was specially beloved by his priests, with whom he maintained the most fatherly and intimate relations, while almost the sole recreation which he allowed himself from the strenuous labors and the continual attention given to every detail of his large and ever-growing archdiocese, was to spend an occasional afternoon with one or other of the Institutes which owed to him their existence, or at least their development. There he was most at home, loving to gather round him the little ones, or to converse freely and unrestrainedly with his spiritual sons or daughters.

He was much esteemed by the Protestant community around him, and the highest tributes have been paid to his memory by the leading secular journals. To quote but one of these, editorially expressed by The Citizen. After a reference to the fact that Canada in his death had lost one of its "best loved and most respected dignitaries, conspicuous for his wisdom, foresight and prudence," the article concludes as follows: "To those outside the Catholic Church, the Archbishop was ever the embodiment of courtesy, kindness and charity. His Christianity knew no narrow confines, and his whole life tended towards the cultivation of peace and good will amongst all sections and creeds. A life of unrelenting toil, without thought of material reward, has terminated in the service of the Prince of Peace. Of the dead Archbishop well may it be said: Si monumentum requiris, circumspice." No small tribute this, in addition to that universal chorus of sorrow, of affection and of praise, that is rising from the Catholic community at large, and that recalls the dead prelate's great, strong boundless faith and devotion to Catholic interests, his large-hearted kindness, his appreciation of the good done by others, his cheerful optimism, his love for the Church and the Holy See. A great churchman, a model citizen, a true Father in Israel, has passed away in the person of Joseph Thomas Duhamel, and his loss will be deeply felt, not only in the archdiocese, but in the whole of Canada, of which he was one of the senior Bishops, and by the other members of the hierarchy, who have lost a wise counsellor, a trusted friend, and a bright exemplar of episcopal virtue. May he rest in peace!

Is France Decadent?

A very interesting report is that of the Society of the Propagation of the Faith for 1908, which the Annals of that Society present in its June issue. We are informed that the receipts from all the dioceses throughout the world, contributing to the work of the Missions, amount to $1,280,517.35, nearly half of which has come from France alone. This is surely a very hopeful sign in a land where the churches have been confiscated by an infidel government and the ministers of religion unjustly deprived of State support, and compelled to depend for a living on the charity of the faithful. At first sight it would seem that the Lord is ungenerous to allow the dreadful evil of persecution to befall a nation which is and has always been so chivalrously generous, not only in supplying money for the spread of the gospel, but in inspiring the noblest of her sons and daughters to sacrifice their lives and pour out their blood in martyrdom for God's holy cause, the salvation of souls. But as in the life of individuals, so also in that of nations, apostolic zeal will frequently encounter the malice and, for a time, the successful opposition of the powers of evil. Christ warned his disciples: "If the world hate you, know ye that it hath hated me before you. The servant is not greater than his master. If they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also." The people who, ignoring their own trials and the enforced poverty of those who minister unto them, can with a generosity that challenges the admiration of the rest of Christendom give unstintedly for the spread of Christ's Kingdom on earth, may be relied on to maintain the faith at home and rid themselves of the conditions that shackle their freedom. While the Church in France is thus suffering, a striking parallel is presented by the missionaries abroad. During the nineteenth century the Paris Society of Foreign Missions gave many martyrs and confessors of the Faith to the Church in the far off missions in China, Annam, Tonquin and Cochin China.

In 1900, forty-nine of these heroes of the cross were raised to the honors of the altar by Leo XIII. On May 2, of the present year, Pius X declared thirty-three others Blessed. In the list of those recently beatified appear the names of one French Bishop and three French priests, while the other martyrs were all fruits of their missionary labors. One may be pardoned for seeing in these facts the relation of cause and effect and for believing that the Society for the Propagation of the Faith has been reaping its reward. Last week the President of Leland Stanford University, in a public address to the students of Bryn Mawr College, Pa., spoke of France as a decadent nation. Frenchmen throughout the United States are indignant. Ambassador Jusserand, addressing a gathering of his fellow countrymen Saturday last in San Francisco, maintained that "the nation that can produce a Pasteur, that leads the world in the sciences, that first developed the submarine and ranks first in the navigation of the air, cannot by any stress of circumstances be termed decadent." We would add that a nation whose hierarchy has to a man resisted the unjust encroachments of an atheistic government and shown its loyalty to the Vicar of Christ by making every personal sacrifice and resisting every compromise which involved a surrender of principle is sound at heart. When to this is added the liberality of her people and their active interest in the missionary field, the observant Christian will be ready to concede that France has within herself the lustihood of vigorous Catholic life, and, given the opportunity to assert itself, the land of St. Louis will stand forth once more in the pristine splendor of her achievements as the eldest daughter of the Church.

Make Decency Pay

How far wrong public sentiment is in regard to indecent plays, may be estimated from the comments made lately in our secular and even in our religious publications, on the President's rebuke to a shameless playwright. It should seem that the least a self-respecting person might do, when something obscene is thrust upon the attention, would be to resent it or turn his back upon it; and yet for leaving a theatre in which immorality was wantonly displayed upon the stage Mr. Taft is praised and held up as a model for respectable theatregoers. No one, we imagine, feels more surprised than His Excellency that his action should be considered noteworthy or unusual. He was following simply the promptings of a sense of decency, and no doubt he would expect every gentleman to do the same thing without need of example or model. He was unfortunate in not knowing beforehand what manner of play he was to witness; but he was quick to resent the offensive exhibition, and yet tactful enough not to act as if he were posing as censor. The occurrence emphasizes the fact that indecency on the stage has become so commonly the rule that we can no longer trust our theatrical managers to give us a decent performance. The presumption is that no play will be offered which is not salacious enough to attract an audience from other competitors in the same character of plays, and it is time to require some guarantee of decency before patronizing any theatre. The trafficker in lascivious shows does not feel the rebuke that comes after the first act. The ticket office already has the seat money. The time to rebuke is before buying an entrance. If men and women generally would follow the same principles in paying for their theatrical pleasures as those which guide them in purchasing other commodities in life, the indecent performance would disappear to a great extent, as it would not pay.

Mr. Gairdner's Critics

Mr. James Gairdner has aroused the indignation of those who had comfortably settled the questions he reopens and answers in his own way by his work, "Lollardy and the Reformation." The general as well as the religious reviews of England are trying to say a word on the other side for the Reformation, for the continuity theory, for the dissolution of the religious houses, and for the numerous Protestant contentions which he proves to be unfounded. In the Nineteenth Century for June, Rev. G. Monroe Royce attempts to show that Henry VIII dissolved the religious houses, not because he wanted their money, but because the people had lost interest in them and their inmates had ceased to be necessary or beneficial to the national life. Mr. Royce's only reason for his opinion is that for some time before their dissolution they were ignored in the wills of men and women of means. Some of their houses had gone fifty, some one hundred, and at least one over one hundred and fifty years without receiving a notable bequest. Already, in the time of Henry IV, he tells us, Parliament prayed the Crown to confiscate in the interests of the nation, the land that had been appropriated and sequestered by the religious bodies. Under Henry V this prayer was repeated against alien religious establishments. Under Henry VIII it would appear that no such petition was needed. That statesmanlike monarch anticipated the expression of popular sentiment, disbanded the monks and friars, and confiscated their possessions. No doubt he was aware that his people had ceased to remember the poor religious in their wills, and feared that they would starve and die out or become a public burden. Whether he knew the contents of the wills during his own reign or those of his predecessors, he knew very well the inventories of the houses whose dissolution he brought about so ruthlessly, and he was no loser by his statesmanship. On the other hand, the English people, as Mr. Gairdner proves abundantly, never did sympathize with the pillage of the monasteries. They did not wish it in the time of Henry VIII, when they were still Catholic, any more than they would seek it to-day when they are overwhelmingly Protestant. If Mr. Royce is as purblind to the story of the past as he is to the reality of the present, he is no fit antagonist for Mr. Gairdner. "Why is it," he asks, "that we have not got the hermit and the anchorite with us to-day? For the very same reason that we have not got the monk and friar—they are not wanted." Strange, that while these words were in press, Parliament was actually considering favorably the bill for the removal of Catholic disabilities, among others the ban on religious houses. Stranger still, that Mr. Royce should not be aware that these houses, just like the Church they serve, have felt the quickening of the Second Spring, and are prospering and multiplying beyond reckoning. There may be no vigilant royal committee to make inventory of their belongings, but the "Catholic Directory for England" records their growth year by year, and Francesca Steele's books on the Monasteries and Convents of Great Britain record their pious and beneficent work. In town and hamlet, up and down the country, men live under every form of religious rule. Dominican, Franciscan, Augustinian, Benedictine, Redemptorist, Oratorian, Jesuit, and a host of orders and congregations of women have filled the land; yet Mr. Royce tells us they are not there and they are not wanted! In vain may such a critic hope to impair the authority of Mr. Gairdner, who confirms the work of Dom Gasquet; the monk and friar would not admit Henry's supremacy in Church affairs; their abbeys and convents were worth plundering; for these and for no other reasons they were dissolved.

Prison for Reckless Driving

The conviction of a chauffeur on the charge of running down and killing a boy on the streets of New York City, will do more to stop speeding and reckless driving with automobiles than all the laws a legislature could frame. So much was public sentiment in favor of this conviction, that with truth Judge Mulqueen could tell the prisoner that seven years imprisonment was regarded as a lenient sentence for his crime. It was high time to put a check on the recklessness and audacity of men who recognized no limit or restraint on their mad indulgence. In New York alone last year over seventy persons were killed by fast and reckless automobile drivers, and yet Governor Hughes was asked to sign a bill removing speed restrictions and holding automobilists accountable for reckless driving only. Apparently they had interpreted the legislation which has hitherto prevailed, and the inadequacy of police measures and the leniency of the courts as a sanction of their disposition to regard their sport as something over and beyond the law. Nothing breeds arrogance so much as disregard of authority and breaking the laws with impunity. It is not merely selfishness, but barbarism, which prompts a man to think that human life is so cheap that it may be sacrificed for his pleasure.

LITERATURE

Sayings of Buddha: The Itti-vuttaka, a Pali work of the Buddhist canon, for the first time translated, with introduction and notes. JUSTIN HARTLEY MOORE, A.M., Ph.D., (Columbia). Instructor in French in the College of the City of New York. New York, 1908. 8vo. pp. XIII-142 (Columbia University Indo-Iranian Series, ed. by A. V. Williams Jackson, vol. V.).

Since the publication in 1841 of the first European edition of a Pali text by Friedrich Epiegel much progress has been made in editing the sacred texts of Buddhism, especially through the work of the Pali Text Society of London. At the present time the majority of the important texts of the Pali canon are accessible in good critical editions. The "Itti-vuttaka" was edited as early as 1890 by Windisch, in the "Publications of the Pali Text Society," and the English translation of Dr. Moore is the first version of this work in a European language. The Southern Buddhist canon, of which the work before us is a part, was settled according to tradition shortly after the death of the great teacher. It consists of three books or pitakes (literally "baskets") and hence is called the "Tipitaka" or "Three Baskets." The second book, the "Sutta-pitaka," contains five nikayas (collections) of the fifth of these being again subdivided into fifteen minor divisions, among which are the famous "Jatakas," or "birth-stories" and the "Itti-vuttaka," or "Sayings of Buddha."

The title, which literally means "Thus it has been said," is derived from the incessant recurrence of this phrase. The work itself contains one hundred and twelve sections on a wide range of moral subjects. The Buddhist doctrines of Nirvana, previous existence and others are well touched on. These Logia or sayings are attributed to Buddha himself, and are supposed to have been written down by an anonymous disciple. This is not impossible, at any rate so far as the verses are concerned, but Dr. Moore is inclined to attribute the prose portions to the redactor. The cardinal virtue of Buddhism is love, and the most important passage on this topic occurs in "Itti-vuttaka," 527. The Pali word metta employed, is translated as "friendliness" by Professor Pischel, in his "Leben und Lehre des Buddha," and explained to correspond to the "brotherly love" preached by Christianity. The insistence on this quality is the brightest feature in Buddha's atheistic and pessimistic philosophy. We have nothing but praise for the accuracy and painstaking care with which the translation has been made. A glance at the foot-notes is sufficient to convince the reader of the careful and discriminating scholarship that Dr. Moore has brought to his task. His work is a welcome contribution to a field which has not been exploited nearly as much as it deserves.

The Æneid of Virgil. Translated into English verse by THEODORE C. WILLIAMS. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Co.

Mr. Williams' version avoids the stilted, the commonplace; it is lucid, truthful, scholarly; it has energy and movement. It does not attempt "the impossible task of bringing over the full magic and suggestion of every Virgilian phrase." Who could? The translator's blank verse is compact, virile, the rhythm is correct, the cadences varied, and the pauses well managed. In some of the pathetic passages, severe critics might find the translation cold. Mr. Williams' version does not suggest the tears that the original drew from Fenelon.

"Attollens humerò famamque et fata nepotum," is rendered by Mr. Williams:

Then for burden on his shoulders bore

The destined mighty deeds of all his sons

Conington is preferable:

And high upon his shoulders rears

The fame and fates of unborn years.

But for a few failures, Mr. Williams has dozens of felicitous renderings. In his preface Mr. Williams might have modified his criticism of Dryden's Æneid, which, though "it will never cease to offend the taste, will never fail to captivate the attention."

The Changing Values of English Speech. By RALCY HUSTED BELL. New York: Hinds, Noble and Eldredge.

As he proved before in "The Worth of Words," the author is on ground familiar to him. When he treats of words and their history he is, if not a pathfinder, at least an interesting guide. He is suggestive, not exhaustive. In the chapter on "Syntax," where he goes a-tilting with Prof. Lounsbury, on "Intensives," on "Style," the writer swerves from his course, but picks up so many waifs and derelicts that we forgive him. On "Style" he is forcible and practical. "English Orthography" tells how John Cheke in the sixteenth century, and Sir Thomas Smith in the seventeenth attempted a spelling reform. Mr. Bell unfortunately does not always hew down to the bed-rock of Truth. His principles about our concept of God, and about the soul are unsound, his evolutionary theories of the origin of language rejected by the most eminent scientists. Those tottering theories, underpinned by the unscientific methods and dishonorable tricks of Mr. Haeckel, here fail absolutely.

Rational language, not emotional expressions of joy, anger, etc., but a system of conventional signs representative of thought, formal enunciations of "the what," "the why," cannot rise from any state, any progenitors destitute of reason. Speech to be rational must use names consciously, as objects of thought. This requires super-sensuous powers of abstraction, reflection. No scientist has proved that animals possess such powers, use such names. Rational speech is man's exclusive privilege. As William von Humboldt puts it: "Man is man only through speech, but in order to invent it he must already be man."

J. G. REVILLE, S.J.

The Haunted Temple. By EDWARD DOYLE. New York: Knickerbocker Press.

This is a handsome little book of poems by an author who, though deprived of sight has never lost the vision of beauty, the upward power

Aglow in man and star, blown by God's breath—
Creation in its culminating hour.

Though one notices occasionally a lack of technical finish, there is none of poetic insight; and the reader should remember:

'Tis now three decades since the shores of light,
With their green forests, cities, peaks of blue,
And wandering birds were blasted from my view,
And I have been storm-tossed from blight to blight.

Between Friends... By RICHARD AUERLE. New York: Ben-zinger Bros. Price 85 cents.

Richard Aumerle, a pen-name, if we are not mistaken, has a good ring, a certain directness and vigor; the sentences are short and crisp. We should like a little more distinction of tone, a little more delicacy and refinement. There is a point of school-boy honor involved; it could have been driven more forcibly home. Some of the incidents are neither new nor strikingly developed. The author evidently knows boys, perhaps too much from the surface only.

Even though we are shown but one phase of the life at St. Nicholas, we find it strange that studies in this Catholic school seem to be of secondary importance. They are scarcely mentioned. Baseball and football appear to be the main thing, and the Good Conduct Medal seems to be put on a par with the captaincy of the football eleven. The faculty, with the exception of the president, who has a real power over the boys, exercise very little influence on the pupils, and its members are referred to in language bordering almost on contempt.

Literary Notes

Civics and Health. By W. H. Allen (Boston, New York, Chicago, London; Ginn & Co.)

This is an age of public sanitation. We are understanding better than ever before the causes of disease and the methods of prevention. Too much, however, of our knowledge is merely theoretical without adequate practical application. The book on Civics and Health by the Secretary of the Bureau of Municipal Research is a strong plea for practical, efficient work in promoting general conditions of good health.

The initial chapters endeavor to show, without any philosophic depth, however, that we have as much right to proper sanitary conditions in our environments as we have to political equality.

The author rightly insists on the fact that in our country there is sanitary legislation galore and by far too little enforcement of existing laws. He enters deeply and with great wealth of illustration into the question of physical examination of school children, its manifold advantages to parents as well as to the child. It would be well for Catholic educators to study these chapters carefully and to apply their practical features before State inspection is forced upon our parochial schools. There are other interesting and practical chapters on industrial hygiene, on the cure and prevention of consumption, on the patent-medicine evil, etc. The book is particularly emphatic in showing that in matters of public health sins of omission are as bad as those of commission. There are, of course, the usual exaggerations to be expected of an author who seems to think that health is the highest aim in life, and we particularly take exception to his statement that sex immorality among young people would be practically eliminated if they had perfect health and interesting occupation.

Napoleone e Pio VII (1804-1813): Relazioni storiche su documenti inediti. By P. Ilario Rinieri. Turin Unione Tipografica Editrice. 1906; 2 vols in 8.00.

Father Rinieri may be called the historian of the diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Napoleon I. The first volume deals with Napoleon's coronation, and the second treats of his rupture with the Pope. The period covered "presents a real historical epopee in which the chief actors in the drama and its unexpected cataclysmic solution appear as though moved by the hand of inevitable Fate, as pagan antiquity conceived it." Hitherto incidents in the period have been narrated or merely touched on; and if we except Count d' Haussonville's work, which is imperfect from lack of documentary evidence, this is the first time a full account of the diplomatic relations of the period has been given. Father Rinieri had at his disposal all the documents in the Vatican archives, as well as other sources of information, and he has used them with judgment and penetration.

Compendio de Patrologia par el Doctor C. Rausch, Professor de Theologia in la Universidad de Bona del Reno, ofrecido a los paises de lengua Espagnola, par el Doctor Emilio Roman Torio. St. Louis, B. Herder.

Now that Modernism has obscured the intellectual atmosphere there is danger, unless we have some safe guide, of either taking Modernism as critical science or rejecting critical science as Modernism. We must avoid the one and the other as fatal mistakes. Dr. G. Rausch, Professor of Theology in the University of Bonn, is the author of several works on the Fathers of the Church, which are of a conservative character and are much esteemed. The present compendium has a special value as containing briefly the critical history of the writings of all the Fathers of the Church. While we highly commend this work, we consider it proper to admonish the reader that critical science has not yet said the last word about everything; that in general what was thought conservatism is often found to have been over-critical; in reviewing its work it corrects many mistakes, becoming more and more conservative. This caution applies to Dr. Rausch's compendium.

A Manual of Bible History, Vol. II, the New Testament. CHARLES HART, B.A. Benziger Bros., New York, Cincinnati, Chicago.

This volume completes the whole of the Manual, and is dedicated by the author to St. Cuthbert's College, his alma mater, on the occasion of her centenary. It does not impose with the display of huge bulk, of great erudition or by a huge list of names of consulted authors, or of various quotations. The author has studied this matter well, and therefore is able to teach the student the truth and the whole truth. He teaches it most profitably; he enlightens the mind and he warms the heart.

To narrate thus one needs to have meditated well on the Scriptures, read the Fathers and the Saints attentively, to have profited by the progress of modern studies in giving each fact its proper place and position that it may be well understood. This is to give out the nova and the vetera. Nowhere does he seem to bring in Rationalists in order that they may present their objections and that he may refute them. Their tenets, however, are well known to him, and their refutation is never wanting.

Again it is known how Modernists stumble at every turn, pretending to correct the Gospel narrative on the ground that the statements of the four evangelists clash. The author is familiar with their objections; and the very fact that he is never embarrassed sets them at naught. Every fact has its proper place in the arrangement, always warranted by the narrative of the evangelists; every apparent contradiction disappears. He makes this a special point, and we congratulate him on his success. The volume has a chronology of the New Testament; two maps, one of Palestine, the other of the journeys of St. Paul; several learned appendices on subjects connected with the history of the New Testament, and a complete alphabetical index of the contents.

Reviews and Magazines

In the June Ecclesiastical Review the editor weighs the arguments for and against a vernacular liturgy, and reaches the conclusion that an alternative use of the vernacular in the administration of Baptism, Confirmation, Extreme Unction, Burial, the Sacramentals, the lessons of Holy Week, Candlemas, etc., would be serviceable to many within and without the fold. He quotes largely and appositely from Church History to show that there is nothing unorthodox in such a change; but the reasons in its favor do not hold for the liturgy of the Mass. Father Martin continues his lucid exposition of the Congregation of the Index according to the new Apostolic Constitution. John R. Fryar's "Whitsuntide in Olden Times" throws an interesting light on English character before the Reformation. His picture of the English peasantry, when all were Catholics, explains why that country was once called "Merrie England." The title was not a misnomer then. The peasant whistled "and shrilly too will sing" on his way to fair or feast, and the Whitsuntide holiday was the merriest. But the innocent amusements of the evening—the Holy Ghost Drama and Morris Dance—were always preceded by holy Mass, and generally by the reception of holy Communion. With their religion and its customs went their merriment, till now "the agricultural laborers have almost forgotten how to laugh."

Fra. Arminio's "A Page of Pontifical History and Modern Catholic Journalism" is a remarkable study of a book and a period brimful of interest and significance. It is a review of Father Ballerini's "Le prime pagine del Pontificato di Papa Pio IX," the reasons for delaying its publication forty years and for establishing the Civiltà Cattolica, the program and conduct of the new organ and its stimulating effect on Catholic journalism. The writer's ideal of a weekly Catholic journal is admirably outlined; and it is particularly gratifying to the editors of AMERICA that in his judgment we bid fair to attain his ideal. The conferences, notes and criticisms are up to the usual high standard of the Ecclesiastical Review.

In Etudes, May 20, Louis de Mondadon proves there is no contradiction between the works written by Augustine in his retirement at Cassiciacum and the "Confessions" of about fifteen years after. The soliloquies and the dialogues against the academics were meant by the Catechumen of Cassiciacum as an "apologia" for his conversion; they were intended to prove how reasonable that course had been. They were a hymn to the truth, the "Confessions" were to be a Te Deum for the goodness and mercy of God.

Writing of Marian Congresses, Pierre Brückner praises the spirit of the International Marian Congress of Saragossa (Sept., 1908), but finds that it was not sufficiently practical. A national Marian congress at Barcelona did far more efficient work.

Translating and adapting a chapter from Granderath's "History of the Vatican Council," Jean Delattre gives an account of the debates relative to the "Schema de Vita et Honestate Clericorum." The reader will see how outspoken the Fathers of the Council were, and what holiness of life the Catholic Church requires in her priests.

In his second article, "A Christian Painter, Joseph Tustes calls Murillo a really popular artist, the painter of the "Immaculata," a subject he treated sixty-two times, never repeating himself. More than Rubens, da Vinci, Zurbaran, Raphael, Murillo is the preacher of "the easel and the brush." He not only created masterpieces, he made men pray.

Discussing "Heroism in the Drama of Edmond Rostand," Alphonse Parvillez points out serious defects, but gladly recognizes that Joffroy Rudel in "la Princesse lointaine," Cyrano de Bergerac, Sergeant Flambeau in "l'Aiglon," embody a noble thought, abnegation, devotion to an ideal, hidden self-sacrifice.

Joseph Huby acknowledged the historical accuracy of Paul Perdrizet's monograph on "Our Lady of Mercy," Gauvain's famous picture at Nancy, but calls attention to the undignified, sarcastic tone with which the author speaks of Catholic practices.

Jules Lebreton reviews Jacquier's fourth volume of the "History of the New Testament Books," Brassac's "Manual," Cam-erlynck and Coppieter's "Synopsis of the Gospels," Fouck's "Parables," Belser's "Epistle of St. James." Dom John Chapman's "Notes on the Early History of the Vulgate Gospels" are especially praised for their originality and accuracy.

"Thirty-five Years a Bishop," Selections from the Works of Mgr. de Cabrières, affords Léonce de Grandmaison an opportunity of paying a well-deserved tribute of praise to the valiant Bishop of Montpellier, one of the bravest champions of the Church of France.

In Harper's Monthly Magazine for June Professor Lounsbury gives to the reader a delightful paper on "Wardour Street English." He explains the term by telling us that "as Wardour street justly or unjustly gained the reputation of having been the great mart for the sale of imitation old furniture, it seems fair to apply the term Wardour Street English to those productions which set out to show us how men spoke in a particular age and succeed only in giving us something which men never spoke in any age." The professor's purpose is to show how attempts to reproduce the language of the past are fairly sure to end in failure. No new theme this; we all recall Ben Jonson's observation that "Spenser writ no language." In the old dramatist's opinion an attempt to reproduce the language of a previous period was neither practicable nor desirable—"affecting the ancients," as he phrased it, was objectionable in whatever language attempted. Professor Lounsbury is evidently quite in accord with "rare Ben Jonson." Spenser's imitation of Chaucer, Thomson's reproduction of Spenser, the followers of Scott in the nineteenth century are all entertainingly drawn upon to prove his theme. Bulwer is claimed to be a shining example of its truth, and even Thackeray is affirmed to have failed in his purpose to reproduce in Harry Esmond the language of Queen Anne's time, although it has been asserted time and time again that hardly an anachronism can be detected in the romance.

The courageous exploit of the young Englishmen who tried to reach the South Pole has created new interest in the lands and people of "the farthest south." Charles Furlong, Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, attempted to satisfy this interest in his sketch of the Yahgan Indians, "the southernmost people of the world," who inhabit "Hoste Island, head dressed with perpetual snows; a region grand, desolate, elemental, teeming with the stories of gales, cold and disasters, where for one whole year there was not a single fine day, but three hundred of continuous rain, including twenty-five storms; a region which is the southernmost limit of vegetation."

The June Scribner's Magazine contains the third paper of the series of "General Sherman's Letters Home." The vivid interest of these intimate letters, supplementing as they do the more restrained narrative of the general's memoirs, must appeal to all of us. Especially full of character are these "words to the home folks" written during the campaign of the Carolinas and the opening days of the Reconstruction Period following the collapse of the Confederacy. Sherman's detestation of politics and politicians rings out in many of these letters: "I do want peace," he says in one place, "and do say if all hands would stop talking, and writing, and let the sun shine and rains fall for two or three years, we should be nearer reconstruction than we are likely to be with the three or four hundred statesmen trying to legislate amid the prejudice begotten for four centuries."

In the same number Professor Laughlin contributes another of his illuminating economic papers. This one considers the "Abolition of Poverty" from the viewpoint of his special science, and asks what economics has to say "as to the elevation of a race, or class, in the scale of living. Has it any practical advice to offer for the abolition of extreme poverty?" No doubt, as he tells us, the contrasts in possession of wealth form the best soil for the socialist propaganda and have given the socialists their greatest opportunities. Therefore it is not amiss to try to discuss with candor the problem of improving the condition of the very poor. Rejecting, naturally, the proposals of anarchism, state or municipal ownership, the nationalization of the land, the demands of unionism and, in a measure, profit-sharing and minor proposals like consumers' leagues, Professor Laughlin resorts to certain constructive proposals which follow from the results attained by economic science. These involve the development of practical schemes to create and stimulate among the very poor desires for more economic comfort, as well as for gratifications of a legitimate kind, and for sufficient character in the worker to persist throughout the economic processes needed for the continued production of what will satisfy these desires. These secured we face the need of practical methods of teaching the very poor how to produce.

Everybody's Magazine for June offers evidence that it has lost none of the cunning which has won for it a certain notoriety. "Robbing the Hand that Feeds" and "The Tricks of the Wall Street Game" are articles which, no doubt, are the result of diligent investigation on the part of the authors. No doubt, too, every statement made in them has been conscientiously verified—but still one asks, cui bono?

SCIENCE

Two French naval lieutenants, Messieurs Colin and Jeance, have made very important experiments lately with a wireless telephone, which they have operated between Paris and Melun, a distance of fifty kilometers. One of these gentlemen has published his experiences in the Pèlerin. "We operated our wireless telephone with Hertzian waves, but instead of being rapidly decreasing they were continuous. Transmitting with the aid of a microphone of special construction, the words became intermingled with the waves, or to express it scientifically, they modified the waves. These latter were taken up by a receiver of particular mechanism, that is by the electric receiver of Captain Ferier or by the "pélicon." The receiver restored the original sounds, and an extremely curious fact is that, by means of the equal waves, the vocal sound is transmitted much better than the wave itself as it is transmitted by wireless telegraphy. It seems that the vocal vibration of the waves may be independent in some way of the force of these same waves. The result is that with an apparatus which is, relatively speaking, weak, the vocal sounds may be sent a great distance. For example, the messages we are sending from the Eiffel Tower to Melun, fifty kilometres, could be transmitted 400 kilometres at sea. We use antennae, as in wireless telegraphy; that is, we have constructed a sort of conductor curtain, in the form of a fan, which we place in a position as elevated as possible. The wires are brought together at the foot of the pole for use of transmitter or receiver, the one or other apparatus being attached to the same antennae as may be required.

"The first experiments have given very satisfactory results. The object of the trial is to discover the possibility of using the invention on war-vessels and at marine stations. In fact, the new apparatus is more sensitive than that used in wireless telegraphy; moreover, it has the advantage of not requiring that the operator should be a skilled specialist. A ship commander could himself transmit or receive messages.

"Finally, if the hope of the inventors be well-founded, it will be possible to limit the powers, at least of the transmitter, so that its sphere of activity shall be within the circumference of a fleet's action. If this hope be realized it will be a kind of revolution in wireless transmission." R. W., S.J.

At the recent Scientific Congress in Madrid the Rev. Richard Cirera, S.J., Director of the Observatory of the Ebro, was appointed Secretary of the Terrestrial Physics Section of Astronomy. An interesting note on this important scientific reunion is that among the many Spanish scientists gathered in Madrid, those who have acquired the most fame in their respective departments are men whose loyalty to the Church is beyond question.

SOCIOLOGY

The greatest source of anxiety to Cuba is the financial problem facing the Government to-day. The general feeling of uncertainty and lack of confidence apparent are not lessened by the protracted delay in the presentation of the budget for the coming year. Governor Magoon's last budget, providing for the fiscal year ending on the thirtieth of the current month, had an apparent surplus of $2,750,000, his schedule of expenditures calling for $24,250,000 and his estimate of revenue showing a little more than $27,000,000.

Careful estimates of the revenue for the coming year place the total at not more than $24,000,000, exclusive of the taxes available for the payment of the interest and sinking fund of the $35,000,000 loan for the payment of the Army of the Revolution. On the other hand a temperate forecast of the expenses of the Government for the same period places the total at not less than $30,000,000 and by some authorities as high as $40,000,000. The indicated deficit is thus under the most favorable conditions a very serious one.

The Joint Committee on Conservation which last March took up the work of the National Conservation Committee, prohibited from continuing its work under the Government by an amendment to the Sundry Civil Act, has announced its plans. Inventories of the natural resources of every state and territory are to be made and all of the forty-eight national organizations now working with the joint committee through their conservation committees are to be asked to help, each in its own special field. The plan throughout follows the conservation principle set forth at the notable conference at the White House a year ago.

In suggesting inventories of state resources, the plan calls for definite statements as to "what we have, where it is, what we save and waste, and what we need to do." The natural resources thus to be inventoried are classed as far as practicable under five general heads: Water Resources, Forest Resources, Land Resources, Mineral Resources, all considered in relation to public health.

In a recent interview with Baron Takahira, the Japanese Ambassador to the United States, on the subject of Christianity in his home-country, the Baron spoke freely of the strong hold the religions of the Japanese have upon that people, deep-rooted as they have grown from generation to generation. "However," added the Ambassador, "the Japanese are willing to be taught. At the present time, so far as I am able to learn, the work of the Christian missionaries is bearing fruit rapidly."

"How many years do you suppose it will take to bring Japan to Christ as a nation?"

"That is hard to say," replied the Ambassador, "but my opinion is that it will take a long, long time. You will understand, from what I have just said, that the religions of the people of the empire have a strong, very strong hold upon them. The religions also have their ministers, who are devoted to them, and who are natives. You see, therefore, that Christianity will not succeed in winning without a fight.

"I will say, however, that the educational movement is strong in my country, and growing stronger each day, and if Christian missionaries are able to convince the people that Christianity is the truth then they have won their battle. That is all my people desire in the way of religion—the truth.

"If the workers for Christianity prove this to them Japan will accept this creed. When I say Japan I mean a majority of our people. Under our constitution all creeds are allowed, and, as in this country, no religion is persecuted. All have the protection of the law."

As noted in AMERICA, May 8, a sub-committee was sent to Texas by the Illinois Senate Committee on Municipalities to collect information regarding the working of the Commission Government in Galveston on the "Galveston plan." Such cities as Joliet, Peoria, Galesburg and Springfield had been asking for a similar form of government and as the report of the sub-committee was favorable a bill embodying the usual features of the Commission Governments for cities, described in the issue of May 8, was drafted and passed in the Senate.

Owing to conditions not affecting the act itself an untimely fate met the Senate bill when it was taken up in the Committee of the House, and with scant courtesy practically laid aside without serious consideration. The action, however, is by no means final. The bill was earnestly desired by the best element in the cities named, representatives of which had done energetic work to convince the Senate that authority should be given to reorganize their municipal government according to the Commission plan. The effort will be continued and Governor Dineen will probably be asked to include this subject in the call for a special session of the legislature which he intends to issue.

In a comprehensive and sympathetic survey of the scheme of government in the Philippines, Albert Bushnell Hart, in the Boston Evening Transcript of May 22, mentions some conditions which render successful administration there very difficult. The machinery in the Philippines depends after all on the character of the men who make up the Government, and that in turn depends on the sense and good will of the Federal Government, and especially of the President. The number of self-seeking officials in Washington makes it uncertain that resolute and upright men will always be sent out as mainsprings of the Philippine Government. Moreover the salaries seem to many of the officeholders less than called for by the risk to life and the separation from home. It is a significant fact that almost every American official in the Philippines expects to go back to the States, which means a rapid change in the personnel. Then, too, "in everything that relates to trade, the Islands are subject to Congress, which, somehow, has very little sympathy with the dependencies. So far, the one simple method which would probably do more than anything else to reconcile the Filipinos with their masters is withheld; namely, that unrestricted trade with the States of the Union which the States and Territories have enjoyed amongst themselves since 1789. From the Filipino's point of view the main criticism on the Government is not that it is bad, but that he does not wish a good government imposed upon him by Americans." Unfortunately "he has read somewhere something about how 'just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed.'"

The incorporation of the Catholic Institute for the Blind was approved by Supreme Court Justice Gildersleeve, of New York, on May 28. The object of the institute is the physical, mental and moral education of blind children, and the maintenance and conduct of a school for their instruction in the sciences and manual arts.

Judge W. R. Hammond of Augusta, Ga., a Southerner of distinguished ancestry and whose official position is subject to popular vote, sent the following communication to the Georgia newspapers, May 28, on the industrial position of the negro, in reference to the Georgia railroad strike:

"I want to say a word in behalf of the negro firemen of the Georgia railroad, and I want to say it first and principally to the striking firemen who insist on forcing them down and out.

"The principle of shutting men off from suitable lines of industrial employment on account of color is wrong and dangerous. The negro's only protection in this southland is in the fair-mindedness and generosity of the southern white man. He is in a hopeless minority and if the white men in all lines of industrial employment combine against him, he will be reduced to a hopeless state of serfdom, a condition worse than slavery. As a slave he had the care and protection of his master, and, oftentimes, if not always, his warm and generous affection, but he has no master now, and must needs make his own way. To shut him out from the places where he can earn a livelihood is unjust, and because it is unjust it is unworthy of the white man of the south. The negro is here, not by his own choosing, but because his ancestors were sold into slavery to our ancestors. He did not ask for freedom, but it came to him, as did his condition of servitude, without his seeking. Those of us who lived during the four years of bitter struggle which resulted in his freedom, know how faithful and loyal he was to the wives and children of those masters who were at the front fighting to keep him in bondage. His faithfulness and loyalty during this trying period have no parallel in all human history. Is it fair, is it just, is it right to say to him now, 'You shall not occupy your humble place in our social organism'?"

The Staatsverband (State Federation) of German Catholic Societies of New York celebrated its annual convention at Schenectady, May 2 to June 1. Eighteen thousand members in good standing were reported, represented by nearly three hundred delegates. Last year the Staatsverband was invited to join the German American National-Bund, a non-sectarian body, and a committee was appointed to consider the invitation and report on it at this year's meeting. The report gave rise to a lively debate in the Schenectady gathering, and it was finally resolved to accept the committee's report which was adverse to affiliation. The central executive committee of the Staatsverband was empowered to support the actions of the "Bund" if in particular cases it sees that they are in harmony with the aims of the federation; local branches, however, shall not be allowed to take any step without approval of the executive committee. The latter, in its turn is to be guided always by the prudent counsel of its spiritual director.

The resolutions recommended that at least one Catholic paper be subscribed to by every family; that the endeavors of the police to keep immorality from the cities be actively supported; and that parents be urged to give their children their whole education in Catholic institutions. "Let us gladly support our schools without asking help from the State," says the resolution, "and God will reward us in our children."

The Cologne branch of the "Catholic Journeymen's Society" recently celebrated in that city its sixtieth anniversary. This is one of the first of the local branches of an organization which now counts nearly twelve hundred branches with a membership of 75,000. Affiliated with the branches are 120,000 independent artisans or craftsmen. Each branch is under the direction of a priest, appointed by the bishop. The buildings occupied by the society offer lodgings to the traveling and often to the resident members, serve as clubhouses and provide night schools and other educational opportunities. A life insurance and sick fund is optional to the members; nearly a million and a half dollars are deposited in its savings banks. The society which has worked untold blessings for hundreds of thousands is the foundation of the Rev. Father Kolping, called the "Gesellenvater" (father of the journeymen). He had been a shoemaker before becoming a priest, and knew from his own experience the misery and especially the social and moral dangers surrounding working men. There is a branch of this society in New York.

The Charles Borromeo Society for the Propagation of Good Books was founded in 1845 in the Archdiocese of Cologne. According to the amount of their yearly contributions the members are divided into three classes. The society distributes every year to its members a certain value of books according to the class to which each member belongs. But the rules provide that there shall always be a large surplus to be devoted to the partial or complete support of circulating libraries. The society also acts as agent for its members in the purchase of books. In 1895 the society celebrated its golden jubilee. In the twelve following years its members contributed nearly a million dollars, received each his allotted share in books and a million books were distributed among the lending libraries. Practically, the society covers only the Archdiocese of Cologne and the Dioceses of Münster, Paderborn and Treves, which contribute more than a hundred thousand of its hundred and thirty thousand members.

EDUCATION

A committee made up of five priests and five laymen was recently appointed by the local Federation of Catholic Societies of Brooklyn to study the Catholic school question under the following points of view: (1) Have the Catholics a legal right to claim State support for their schools? (2) Is it advisable to ask for such support? (3) What practical answer should Catholics give to the school question?

The answers were: (1) Neither in the State and Federal Constitution nor in any positive law enactment is there any clause on which such a claim may be based. (2) Experience teaches, that wherever the State supports the schools, it demands the right of inspection in return. And it is preferable not to ask for State aid, if it is offered under conditions which endanger the independence of the schools. (3) We should at any cost or sacrifice improve and develop our educational system, so that our children need not go out of the sphere of our own influence to finish their education. We may thus work to lead the State to recognize that the parochial school is the ideal school.

Dr. Frank O'Hara, formerly of Notre Dame University, Indiana, has been appointed Professor of Political Economy at the Catholic University. Doctor O'Hara, who is a graduate of the University of Berlin, where he studied under the most distinguished professors of that science, is about thirty-five years old and is married. The Chair of Political Economy at the University was endowed by the late Joseph Banigan, Esq., of Providence, R. I., a generous benefactor of the University.

Very Reverend Doctor Edward A. Pace, Dean of the Faculty of Philosophy in the Catholic University, represented the latter at the late celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the second foundation of Louvain University. Doctor Pace was appointed to this distinguished office by His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, Chancellor of the University. The celebration took place May 9 to 11, and was attended by a multitude of celebrated scholars and distinguished dignitaries from all parts of Europe. Doctor Pace is a graduate of the American College of Rome, and will also represent the Catholic University at the festivities of the fiftieth anniversary of that College which will be celebrated in Rome, June 6 to 16.

The public schools of the Kingdom of Saxony are denominational. But the Protestant public school teachers (95 per cent. of the inhabitants are Protestant) are now in a state of open rupture with the ministers of their church. In the "Church and Pastoral Conference" at Meissen, on May 11, Dr. Rietschel, Professor of Theology in the University of Leipzig, raised the gravest charges against the teachers. "They are imbued," he said, "with the spirit of modern paganism and of that unbounded self-esteem which rejects all order in state and society. Their policy will speedily bring about a destructive antagonism between the Christian family and these teachers who claim for themselves the exclusive knowledge of the child's mind. Their program is," the professor continued, "banish first the Church from the school, then all religion, and finally all morality. Many teachers," he went on, "firmly believe in the 'results' of Haeckel's researches and make every effort to propagate Haeckel's monism and the teachings of an infidel Bible criticism among the masses." Unfortunately the professor was opposed by certain radicals among the members of the conference, and though the conference resolved to send his speech to every teacher in the kingdom, it could not muster courage enough to take very effective steps.

The sincere Protestants of the Free City of Hamburg are alarmed because of the growth of infidelity among the public school teachers. To counteract the danger they have founded a Christian normal school. However the governing ecclesiastical body of the municipality, the "Kirchenrath," is progressive, and it refuses to remove from office several ministers who openly deny the divinity of Christ.

Marquette University, Milwaukee, has recently organized an advisory Board of Regents which is intended to be a bond of union or connecting link between the university faculty and the citizens of Milwaukee. As the university is designed to form an important factor in the civic life and development of the city, the Board of Regents unites these two; on the one hand to direct their energies for the best interests of the city, and on the other hand, procuring the substantial cooperation of public-spirited citizens in furthering the activities of the institution. The functions of the board are chiefly of an advisory and representative nature—to advise with the faculty as to the best means and methods of meeting the higher educational requirements of the city, and to represent to the public-spirited citizens the ways and means by which they may render the work of the university efficient for the best interests of the city.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—Mgr. Delamaire, Bishop of Cambrai, has addressed a lengthy open letter to M. Briand on the confiscation of church property in the Département du Nord. The Bishop asserts that having paid 20,000,000 francs for the privilege of freedom from the government he has a right to criticize the minister's actions. "Instead of ruining us your persecution has given us back our youth, and won for us our old-time popularity. In a sense we owe you a debt of gratitude. But the money you have stolen from us will prove a curse to your government. It has already begun to work. The State has lost hundreds of millions by accidents since the rupture with the Holy See. The old adage: 'qui mange du Pape, en meurt' is still true. May the lesson prove useful to those who come after you, and save the country from the precipice towards which it is headed. In spite of the blasphemies of you and your friends, I know and believe that 'God is always on the side of France.'"

—It is announced by cable from Rome that the general chapter of the Redemptorists assembled there has elected Father Joseph Schwartz, formerly provincial to the United States, promoter general and Father Fidelis Speidel of New York one of the five consultors general.

—Bishop Hugh MacSherry, of Port Elizabeth, South Africa, laid the cornerstone of the new convent of the Sisters of the Precious Blood, Brooklyn, N. Y., on June 6.

—Elaborate preparations are being made for the reception to be given to Archbishop O'Connell when he returns from Rome to Boston. It will take place on Wednesday evening, June 30, in Mechanics' Building, and the program will include addresses of welcome from distinguished laymen and several musical numbers by the local church chorus.

—Archbishop Ryan observed the silver jubilee of his appointment to the see of Philadelphia on June 8. He was consecrated coadjutor of St. Louis, Mo., April 14, 1872, and appointed titular-archbishop of Salamis January 6, 1884.

—It is stated in De Maasbode, the Catholic daily of Rotterdam, that the new Princess Royal of Holland is a lineal descendant of St. Elizabeth of Hungary and related to St. Aloysius Gonzaga.

—The conversion is announced of Miss Holmes, daughter of Sir Richard Holmes, for many years librarian at Windsor Castle, and granddaughter of the late Dr. Gee, Vicar of Windsor and Canon of St. George's. She was received into the Church at St. Bernard's Convent, Slough, by the Rev. J. Francis Drake.

—Statistics prepared for the Congress of Missionaries held in Washington, D. C., June 9-11, show that during 1908 there were 28,709 converts made in the United States. The location of these conversions is of interest. For New York the number given is 1491; Cleveland, 737; Mobile, 488. In New England there were 1,772 converts in a population of over 2,000,000, or one in 1,200, while the average for the country at large is about one in five hundred.

—There is a native Chinese Sister of the Holy Childhood now in the New York convent of her community. She was stationed at the convent in Yokohama, Japan, for twenty-seven years. In New York there are now eleven young Catholic Japanese women brought up by these sisters, and there are many more in San Francisco.

—In the excavations on the site of Jericho, carried on under the auspices of the Deutsche Orient-Gesellschaft, the following results have been obtained. The ruins are situated on a terrace which rises about thirty or forty feet above the plain. It is of an oval shape, extending about thirteen hundred feet from north to south and six hundred feet from east to west. On this little plateau there are seven mounds, about thirty or forty feet high. On one of them a Canaanitic fort, the best preserved on record, was discovered. Besides a strong tower of brick it contained seventeen rooms in three stories. On the next hill a castle had been hewn out of the rock. The city wall everywhere follows the edge of the plateau. It consists of huge blocks which rise to fifteen feet supporting another row of narrower blocks on which stood a brick wall. The latter was probably between twenty-five and thirty feet high. The average thickness was seven feet. Though the excavation is not half finished, the conclusion can be safely drawn that there was on this place an ancient Canaanitic city, existing before the Israelites had conquered the land. The remains show that it must have been destroyed at the beginning of the Israelitic period and lain in ruins for several hundred years. At the time when Jewish civilization was at its height a new settlement appears to have arisen which was inhabited even after the Babylonian exile, perhaps until the time of the Maccabees. Again in the sixth and seventh centuries of our era there seem to have been some villas there. Thus the excavations prove the exactness of Holy Scripture, which tells us that the city was destroyed under Josue and cursed by God; that contrary to God's will it was rebuilt under the wicked King Achaz, and that the curse was fulfilled (III Kings xvi, 34). The sacred writer does not make any statement about the duration of this new Jericho. But the remains also give the best explanation why the courage of the intrepid Israelitic warriors sank at the sight of the formidable structure on the elevation. There have been, however, several settlements called Jericho in the same region. Eusebius and St. Jerome mention three.

—The receipts of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in 1908 were $1,280,517.35. These figures show a slight decrease as compared with 1907, though they exceed, by over forty-three thousand dollars, the receipts of five years ago. The alms given by Catholics throughout the world for the missions are far below the amounts subscribed for Protestant foreign missions by Protestant England alone. The following is a summary of the amounts contributed to Catholic missions in 1908. Receipts of less than a thousand dollars are not here tabulated: France, $616,427.37; United States, $193,122.36; Germany, $133,411.31; Belgium, $76,837.42; Italy, $48,226.00; Argentine Republic, $36,003.06; Spain, $34,359.72; Mexico, $24,135.02; Switzerland, $17,964.30; Ireland, $14,080.97; Holland, $13,983.68; Austria, $11,872.65; Chili, $10,410.26; England, $9,114.41; Uruguay, $6,376.40; The Levant, $6,227.79; Portugal, $5,076.93; Luxembourg, $5,061.47; Africa, $4,868.18; Canada, $2,571.21; Asia, $1,593.29; Scotland, $1,533.50; Peru, $1,505.50; Bolivia, $1,481.76; Central America, $1,366.01. The relative positions of the first six countries is the same as for 1907. The most notable falling off is in Ireland, whose contributions a year ago were more than twice the present amount. The banner diocese is that of Lyons with $97,580.52, an increase for the year of $26,000. New York is second with $69,614.61, an increase of $4,000. Last year Boston was third, but it shows a falling off of about $13,000, and has surrendered its position to the diocese of Metz.

—Priests wishing to attend the International Eucharistic Congress in Cologne, August 3 to 8, can have an altar assigned to them for the whole duration of their sojourn in Cologne, if they apply before July 15 to the Central Bureau of the Eucharistic Congress, Eintrachtstrasse, 168, Cologne. The same bureau gives information as to the Ordo of the Divine Office and Jurisdiction for hearing confessions. These favors, however, suppose that a certificate of full or partial membership has been obtained or is at the same time asked for.

—Sunday, June 6, the first anniversary of the laying of the cornerstone of Brooklyn College was celebrated on the college campus. There was a large attendance. The speakers, Rt. Rev. Mgr. McNamara, V.G., Hon. Luke Stapleton, Hon. John J.

Delany, Rev. Lewis Drummond, S.J., and Rev. J. F. X. O'Connor, S.J., president, congratulated Brooklyn on its sympathy and support which had enabled the college to enroll 340 students in its first year, and laid the moral and intellectual grounds why this support and progress should be continued.

—A great demonstration took place in Montreal last Sunday afternoon, when five thousand men belonging to the Sacred Heart League marched in solemn procession from the Champ de Mars, through Craig, St. Denis, St. Catherine and Metcalfe streets to the Cathedral. This large body of men, representing fourteen city parishes, sang the League hymn, "En avant, marchons!" as they filed through the huge portals of the church. Rev. Father Bélanger, pastor of St. Louis de France, preached a stirring sermon, which was followed by solemn Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament. A striking feature of the procession was the allegorical car of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, drawn by six horses and guarded by six horsemen in brilliant uniform. The demonstration, which was organized by the Rev. Leonidas Hudon, S.J., editor of the Messenger Canadien du Sacré-Cœur, was a successful public act of practical faith. Before the close of the ceremony the Rev. Canon Gauthier, Rector of the Cathedral, read to the immense throng an enthusiastic letter of approval and best wishes from His Grace Archbishop Bruchési, absent from Montreal because of the annual visitation of his diocese.

—When ex-President Roosevelt visited the mission at Nairobi, British East on May 30 he found the Rev. Peter Goetz, formerly of Detroit, Mich., a member of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, in charge.

PERSONAL

On the last day of May the Laetare Medal that the University of Notre Dame conferred upon Mrs. Frances Tiernan, "Christian Reid," was formally presented to her at the Benedictine College of St. Mary's Belmont, N. C. The presentation address was made by the Rev. James A. Burns, C.S.C., representing the university. Mrs. Tiernan's response to the presentation by Bishop Haid was worthy of the occasion and of the recipient. "I cannot close," she said in concluding it, "without saying that there seems to me a very exquisite appropriateness in the fact that the presentation of this medal has taken place within a Benedictine abbey, for if there is one spot above another on earth where letters and art, and all the fair company of the humanities, should find themselves at home it is in a Benedictine abbey. Who is so ignorant, reverend Fathers, as not to know what a vast debt civilization owes to your great order? Within the walls of your monasteries classic learning was preserved when the flood of barbarism arose which overwhelmed the ancient world, and out of those walls came forth letters together with art—handmaids of religion then, now divorced, but bearing still the traces of their high origin. 'If,' as Cardinal Newman said, 'there is not a man who talks against the Church in Europe to-day who does not owe it to the Church that he is able to talk at all,' we may add that there is not a writer or an artist of the modern world whose culture has not come down to him from that which you preserved and taught."

ECONOMICS

Lady Aberdeen, the vicereine of Ireland, delivered a notable address at the New York Catholic Club June 6 in the interests of the movement she has established to check tuberculosis in Ireland. Lady Aberdeen's sympathy with Ireland and the practical help she has given in promoting industries and creating a market for their output have endeared her to all classes. She described the steps taken to stop the ravages of the "white plague," which was sapping Irish vitality even more than emigration. She paid a handsome tribute to the benevolence of the late Peter Collier, who gave the first donation towards establishing tuberculosis exhibits, and she invited other Americans to follow his example. Lady Aberdeen is attending the Women's International Congress at Montreal, but came by New York to express her appreciation of the help Americans had given her in her Irish enterprises.

As our readers will remember, the Catholic workingmen of Germany have formed "Catholic Workingmen's Guilds," which now number about 400,000 members. Each branch is under the control of a priest. In addition very many Catholic workingmen belong to what are called "Christian Guilds," which admit both Catholics and Protestants, provided that the latter deserve the name Christian and are not merely anti-socialistic. It is interesting to know what Father Henry Pesch, S.J., one of the foremost students of sociology and economics, has to say concerning them. In an article in the Stimmen, October, 1908, he writes: "All forms which represent the guild idea have not met with unlimited approval. Many influential Catholics thought it their duty to show a reserved and even antagonistic attitude towards the Christian guilds. This gave rise to dissensions and bitter feuds. But is it not possible to arrive at an understanding? As matters stand this is not likely to happen soon, but it may come about gradually. Both movements are in existence, and we may say with Pius X: "The ideal is the Catholic organization. Under certain conditions the other form may become admissible." The Holy Father does not state how far these conditions are realized in Germany. He says, however, that he embraces both organizations with love. It might be too much to expect of either party to look at the other's methods with the same approval as at its own: to say the least, however, they should not act as enemies. It is unjust and entirely unfounded to charge the Christian guilds with secret socialism or the leader of the Catholic guilds with duplicity. The Christian guilds will never be able to deny their Catholic origin. It is an open secret that certain prominent Catholics are their advisers, that by far the greater part of their members consists of practical Catholics, and that in future too they will have to draw largely on the Catholics for membership.

The greatest danger of the Catholic members in the Christian guilds will be that they are tempted to deny the bishop's authority in all matters concerning the activity of their guilds under the plea that economics and social matters are not ecclesiastical. This has indeed been done before applauding audiences made up largely of Catholics. It is of course evident that many economic and social questions have a moral side, and in all such questions the Church has the full right to give directions to her children. In Holland the Catholics and Protestants have separate societies, which combine only for action, and this principle of federation works very well. In Germany things are different. We have to take and utilize them as we find them. But Catholic authority must be respected in questions of faith and moral, and the Catholic members of Christian guilds must not be interfered with in obeying their bishops."

The protest against the British Budget as affecting Ireland has become universal, even Irish Unionists insisting that the agitation should be made "as rebellious as possible." It is contended that the special exemptions and abatements granted to Ireland by the Act of Union have been and are completely disregarded. Ireland's per capita taxation has been doubled since the Union, and England's reduced by 40 per cent. At the time of the Union Ireland's population was two-fifths of Great Britain, her capital one-third; the proportions are now as 1 to 9 and 1 to 31. It was on this account the Financial Relations Commission concluded that Ireland was overtaxed by $12,500,000 annually. Yet though the assessable capital of the two countries is as 1 to 31, the actual assessment is as 1 to 15, and official salaries assessed are five times larger in Ireland than in Scotland, a richer and more populous country. The general conclusion is that "in considering the amount and form of taxation and the time of its imposition, the British principle is that its suitability to Great Britain shall be alone regarded; that Ireland's pleas and protests shall be disregarded altogether." Mr. McVeagh is relying on an act of George IV, 1823, which exempts Ireland from duty on carriages, to nullify the tax upon Irish motor cars. The chancellor has given some hope of adjustments in land and liquor duties that will make the incidence of taxation less severe on Ireland.

OBITUARY

Col. John G. Healy died in New Haven, Conn., of which city he was a native, on June 6, aged 69 years. He served in the Civil War as lieutenant-colonel of the Ninth Connecticut, and held with honor several public offices in civil life. As an occasional contributor to the Catholic Transcript he recorded a number of interesting historical incidents of local and general subjects.

The cable announces the death, on June 3, of Archbishop Apollinaris Wnukowski, of Mohilev-Minsk, the Latin Metropolitan of Russia. He was born at Grodek, diocese of Lutsk, July 23, 1848; ordained priest July 15, 1862, and appointed Bishop of Plotsk April 20, 1904. In August, 1901 he succeeded Mgr. Szembek as Metropolitan of Mohilev-Minsk which includes in its jurisdiction all of Latin Russia, or three-fourths of Russia in Europe and nearly all of Russia in Asia—the largest diocese in area in the world. There are 460,000 Catholics in Mohilev and 262,384 in Minsk.

Z. J. Pequignot, for the last six years president of the Philadelphia Particular Council of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, died at his residence in that city on June 3. He was born in Switzerland in 1845 but came to this country when four years of age. He was for many years one of the most active Vincentians in Philadelphia.

Dr. Theodore Barth, the well-known German radical politician and journalist, died suddenly at Baden-Baden on June 3, aged 59. He traveled for several months in 1896 through the United States with William Jennings Bryan and other American campaigners studying electoral methods. In 1907 he received the degree of LL.D. from Harvard. Die Nation, which he edited until its demise in 1907, was a relentless critic of the régime in Germany and especially of Chancellor von Bülow.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In my former communication I brought to the notice of the readers of AMERICA (may their tribe increase!) the folly of disregarding the names of saints for children and of substituting for them the silly Buds and Bubs, Gladyses and Evelyns.

Another equally reprehensible practice, and one alarmingly common, is that of contracting or abbreviating or corrupting good saints' names into something quite nondescript. How a Catholic mother can be content, instead of calling her daughter after one of the most beautiful saints of Ireland—St. Bride, or Brigid—to inflict upon the child some such appellation as "Birdie" or "Byrdie," is one of those things almost past finding out. Winnie cannot be said to be as beautiful as Winnifred, nor Nettie as Agnes, nor Betty as Elizabeth, nor Flossie as Florence. As a matter of taste, to many Mayme for (I suppose) Mary, is incomprehensible. Is there an improvement in either sound or sense?

Are the bearers, or more strictly the mothers of the bearers of these nondescript names ashamed of those saints whose real names have been thus corrupted? One may ask really whether any children of the good old Irish stock are now-a-days ever christened Patrick or Brigid.

Of course it is only fair that one who has formulated his grievance should suggest a remedy. A grumbler is a nuisance unless he is able to give a sensible answer to the question: "What are you going to do about it?" A little thought will convince us what a Catholic name stands for with a child, and how much association of ideas has to do with the formation of character in the young. It is possible that one cause of the paganizing of children's names comes, not from being ashamed of the heroes of God, but from a lack of knowledge of many of these beautiful names.

This is, then, what I "would do about it." I would suggest that a large publishing house, early every December issue a cheap calendar in which, for every day in the year, are collected all the names from the Roman Breviary, the Roman martyrology and from other reliable sources. By this plan every day of every month would contain a number of names either of martyrs, confessors, virgins, popes, doctors, and apostles, so that every family would have an abundance of names to select from.

Parish monthly calendars could adopt a similar plan. Pastors and others who see and lament the folly and the evil, as well as the loss of Catholic thought, and the dimming of Catholic instinct by the present practice, would soon appreciate the value of such a list, and in a very short time fathers and mothers would have under their eyes and become familiar with a list of beautiful Catholic names which will be a revelation to them.

C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your article in the issue of May 29th on the Society of St. Thomas of Canterbury, prompts me to write, asking Roman Catholics to be more charitable toward their Anglican friends.

When we consider that many of these good men have received from the earliest periods of their existence a training antagonistic to Roman Catholicism, that principles and prejudices have been inculcated which are hard to eradicate, that many matters perfectly clear to us are to them questions involved in a misty haze, we should thank God for the existence of such a society which can do far more with Anglicans because its deliberations will reach them, where they would never hear of such discussions if held by Roman Catholics. I think we should assist them in every possible manner and on the friendliest terms. In my humble opinion, these men have a place in the designs of the Almighty. They are the necessary leaven to bring the more Protestant element closer to us. Frequently, Roman Catholics knowing their position to be right, cannot conceive that people brought up in another atmosphere are equally positive about theirs.

Let our pleadings to the throne of the Almighty be "ut omnes unum sint."

Philadelphia, May 31. F. J. Voss.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The originator of Children's Missions," was Father John Furniss, C.S.S.R. No one could be more successful than he in dealing with children. His method and discourses to them have been repeatedly published under the title of Furniss' Tracts. They are worthy of being studied by catechists, and especially by those who are engaged in giving "Children's Missions." Some forty years ago the eloquent and zealous Father William H. Gross, C.S.S.R., who became Bishop of Savannah and then Archbishop of Oregon city, had deservedly a great reputation as a missionary of children. Later on other Redemptorist Fathers, such as Fathers Cook and McLoughlin in the Middle West, gave many very fruitful missions to children. Of late years such missions have been rarely given, chiefly because their necessity and usefulness were not sufficiently appreciated.

The book best calculated, in the opinion of competent judges, to render the mission a lasting one is "The Children's New Mission Book of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, a Manual of Instructions and Prayers, adapted to preserve the fruits of the mission and of the first Holy Communion," published by B. Herder, of St. Louis, Mo. It consists of two parts; of which the first is chiefly instructive in the Faith and in the special duties of children, and the second contains all the principal devotions adapted to their wants and capacity. A special feature of the book is, that interesting and appropriate anecdotes are interspersed throughout both parts. Experience proves that no other book is better suited for "Children's Missions," and that the children eagerly read it over and over again. The undersigned offers to send, through the publisher, a sample of the book to every missionary of children and also to every pastor of souls desirous of examining it. FERREOL GIRARDEY, C.S.S.R.

To the Rev. Walter Drum, S.J., we are indebted for the following significant correspondence:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Living Church, an organ of Episcopalianism, has almost weekly references to converts from Rome to the Episcopal Church. These references have, with one or two exceptions, given no clue whatsoever to the names of the converts. I have made a test case of the following letter:

To the Editor of The Living Church:

"I don't understand how it is that anyone who reads history can be anything but a Roman Catholic," said a young man attending a Jesuit school.

"What was my answer? Well, thrusting aside controversy, I handed him Westcott's 'Catholic Principles,' and invited him to give me a report on his conclusions.

"He read it in the quiet of the night, he said afterwards, and behind locked doors. Then he searched the Scriptures, for he was a stranger to the Bible, like the huge majority of Romanists. From the Scriptures he went to Wakeman's "History of the Church of England," and soon found it difficult to swallow the Roman pill relative to Henry VIII founding the Anglican Church. Then I loaned him my best friend, the "Book of Common Prayer."

"During his period of research I was ready to help him further with explanations and often apologies, but he soon saw the flimsy foundation on which the Papacy has reared its court at Rome, and after repeated visits to his own priest, turned to one of ours.

"And the final result? He is to-day enjoying the blessings of Christ's Catholic Church, not Roman, just plain Catholic.

"The conversion of several Roman priests to the Episcopal Church within a short time and the great influx of laymen each year are proof that Romanism is on the downward path. B. F. McGUIRL."

This letter appeared in the issue of May 1, 1909. I made bold to ask the editor of The Living Church to get for me from Mr. McGuirl a direct answer to these questions: (1) What is the name of the Jesuit student of whom you write? (2) What Jesuit school did he attend? When? How long? (3) Who was the priest that failed to solve the young man's difficulties? (4) Who was the priest that solved them? (5) Who are the Roman Catholic priests that have recently entered the Episcopal Church? (6) To what diocese did they belong?

In answer to these clear-put questions, I received this typical reply:

My dear Sir:

Your letter of the 10th inst. to me as editor of The Living Church is forwarded while I chance to be in the East and cannot therefore give it the attention I should like to give. The article in question is so indistinct in my mind that I cannot at the present moment say whether my judgment would be that the writer expressed himself fairly and reasonably; on the whole I doubt the usefulness of a discussion along the lines you have suggested, and since I do not know the address of the gentleman referred to, I think the matter must be allowed to drop.

I shall return to my office about the middle of June when I could take up any further correspondence that might seem required.

Yours very truly,

FREDERIC C. MOOREHOUSE.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

The United States needs just such a publication, and we see no reason why AMERICA should not secure a large circle of readers, not only among Catholics but also non-Catholics. There is an air of up-to-dateness about the new publication which we hope will give a new impetus to Catholic journalism in the United States. We have the editors' promise that telegraph and even cable will be freely used whenever required. Such talk sounds well; it signifies what in our quickly moving times is known as aggressiveness—the kind of capital that accomplishes things. Energy, push and alertness, dominated by brains, must bring success. If the editors follow the program outlined in the initial number, we believe that AMERICA will outclass in national importance the two quasi-religious publications—The Independent and The Outlook—whose combined circulation we hope it will exceed within a short time.—Extension, Chicago, Ill.

AMERICA has arrived after many weeks of eager expectation. And it has come as a surprise to all. The high-water mark of Catholic journalism has been reached at last, and AMERICA takes its place beside the best American secular weeklies of the day.—Catholic Register and Canadian Extension.

A magazine that essays to reach so high a standard will appeal to the educated Catholic and to the serious-minded non-Catholic. The numbers which have already reached the light well fulfill the promises of the editors. The welcome accorded AMERICA has been hearty and widespread.—The Pacific Calendar.

The contents of the review embrace subjects constantly discussed, problems, vital and otherwise, daily thrust upon the public. . . . The periodical should prove invaluable to non-Catholics who must desire to see things in their true light.—The Mountaineer.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The most important event that has occurred recently in Catholic literature, as embodied in the wide-spread English tongue, is the establishment of a new Catholic weekly review which will indeed be not merely journalism but literature. It has taken the great name AMERICA.—The Irish Monthly.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

. . . The sample of AMERICA indicates something worth twice the money—T. J. Callery, Harrison, N. J.

. . . I have seen AMERICA and I am highly pleased with it. I would not be without it under any circumstances. Enter a subscription for the Knights of Columbus Library, and also for myself.—James A. Flaherty, Philadelphia, Pa.

. . . Whoever selected the name of your magazine is to be congratulated.—Patrick E. McCabe, Albany, N. Y.

. . . "Ad Multos Annos" to scholarly and beautiful AMERICA.—Rev. John F. Boland, Lenox, Mass.

. . . I congratulate you warmly on this publication, and wish you all success. In this busy age of many publications . . . we must have reliable reviewers to guide us, and this is indispensable.—Rev. F. Roney, Mt. St. Clare, Clinton, Iowa.

. . . Such a review is indispensable in our days and time.—Rev. M. Connolly, Eau Claire, Wis.

. . . I have read AMERICA from cover to cover, and I predict for it a most brilliant future. Its scholarly treatment of the leading topics of the day will soon place it in the foremost rank of English periodicals.—J. T. Fitzgerald, Gibson City, Ills.

. . . AMERICA improves with every issue. The present number is a splendid one.—Wm. Fanning, S.J., St. Louis University.

. . . I am pleased with AMERICA, and trust it will keep to its standard in the future. In educational matters much good can be done by a truly fearless Catholic organ.—John B. Berteling, M.D., South Bend, Ind.

. . . I will do all in my power to increase the circulation of AMERICA.—A. Ransom, San Jose, Cal.

. . . AMERICA is the style of periodical we need. The new-born babe in its swaddling clothes looks like a lusty youngster. I hope to see it grow more virile with the progress of time, and bespeak for it a most cordial "Ad multos annos."—Rev. T. M. Crowley, Waterbury, Conn.

. . . AMERICA . . . gives a survey of the world by competent men living in every part of it. The facts given about Belgium show an intimate acquaintance with the situation there.—Julius E. De Vos, Chicago, Ills.

. . . Now that we possess "The Catholic Encyclopedia" and your new weekly, we have the comfortable feeling of people who have come into a rich and longed-for inheritance.—Madame T. Ryan, Sacred Heart Academy, Manhattanville, N. Y.

. . . It seems to me that we have in AMERICA a paper on the right lines. It is comprehensive, varied, that is, variations of tastes seem to be consulted, and restrained in utterance. In a word, it is actual without being purely utilitarian. If its business management can be made to equal in effectiveness its editorial management it is sure to be a success.—Hon. Maurice Francis Egan, U. S. Minister to Denmark.

. . . AMERICA deserves the earnest support of every reading Catholic in the United States who has the welfare and progress of our holy religion at heart.—Rev. Stephen M. Donovan, Franciscan Monastery, Washington, D. C.

. . . I admire your AMERICA very much, and at first thought you were aiming very very high as a starter, but every succeeding issue has proven to me thus far that you will be able to support your ideal from a literary viewpoint, and these noble efforts on your part will meet a support financially from your many representative and intelligent readers.—C. Beckmeyer, Botkins, Ohio.

. . . You certainly have just reason to feel gratified because of the cordial and universal welcome which this Catholic weekly review is receiving. The good work which you have accomplished for the cause of Catholicity in the United States by the publication of The Messenger is, as no one will deny, very great; but one needs not prophetic vision to foresee that the good which you are about to accomplish for the same cause through the instrumentality of AMERICA will be immeasurably greater.—Rev. Patrick J. Sloan, Syracuse, N. Y.

. . . I am proud to be a charter member of your valuable paper, and feel, with the other subscribers, that it fills a much-needed want in these days of wild journalism. Your editorials are especially good, inasmuch as they nail the lies of the daily press, and diffuse the truth.—William E. Kolb, Brooklyn, N. Y.

. . . AMERICA comes so near being what I had hoped it would be that I gladly contribute what I can,—my deep appreciation, my subscription, and my cordial good wishes,—to make it the permanent success it so richly deserves to be.—Chrysostom Schriemer, O.S.B., Nassau, Bahama Islands.

. . . What an arsenal of erudition and Catholic thought!—F. C. Kleser, Brighton, Wis.

. . . I congratulate you upon your new and noble enterprise, and promise you my support not only by way of subscription, but also by recommendation of your paper to clergy and laity.—Joseph E. Heyde, Middleton, Wis.

. . . Very timely, and should be fostered, aided and encouraged by every Catholic in season and out of season.—Henry A. Horstman, Logansport, Ind.

. . . I am always very much pleased in reading the review, inasmuch as nothing more interesting could be expected, and as much as possible I shall try to make it known inside and outside the seminary.—A. C. Denis, Kenrick Seminary, St. Louis, Mo.

. . . May I compliment you upon the evidence your new magazine bears of achieving a notable place for itself, something more nearly fitting the dignity of position that a Catholic paper ought to occupy than is generally the case in this country.—Frederick S. Jackson, New York.

. . . If the succeeding issues equal in tone and character the first issue, your periodical will serve a very useful purpose and should have a very large patronage.—John A. Aylward, Madison, Wis.

. . . While I regret very much the discontinuance of the Messenger, I wish to congratulate you on the already assured success of AMERICA, which cannot fail to interest both Catholic and Protestant readers.—Patience Warren, Chestnut Hill, Pa.

. . . I sincerely hope you will realize in AMERICA the lofty ideal of Catholic journalism which you have so bravely placed before you.—P. E. McCorry, New York.

. . . The paper promises well. I never thought to read anything as good in this country.—P. R. Macauley, Waverly, Ill.

. . . I read every line of the copy of AMERICA you sent me. I want it with a great want. In my estimation, it is just what we all have waited for these many years. "God bless AMERICA!" an old toast with a new meaning.—C. A. McLeod, Norborne, Mo.

. . . I thank God I am able to contribute my mite to the glorious work which it is your privilege and grace to undertake.—Alfred W. McCann, Rutherford, N. J.

. . . A weekly of this kind supplies a long-felt want, and I have, with great delight, read every article of the first two numbers.—Augustus Bomholt, Dubuque, Ia.

. . . AMERICA is one of the brightest, if not the very brightest star in the firmament of American Catholic literature.—H. E. Schlingmann, Croghan, N. Y.

. . . A magazine that essays to reach so high a standard will appeal to the educated Catholic and to the serious-minded non-Catholic. The numbers which have already reached the light well fulfill the promises of the editors. It is really a Catholic newspaper in tone, in information, in its interests. Catholics who read the Literary Digest for Catholic information should also read AMERICA to see if it's so.—The Pacific Calendar, San Jose, Cal.

. . . To AMERICA, champion of the truth, fearless and flawless! Greeting! What an encouragement and incentive to your zeal and high enterprise must be that instantaneous and tight hold you have taken of the public approval and favor! Welcome herald you surely are of noteworthy tidings, and fully deserving of heed and regard and attention in response.—Rev. Hugh J. Erley, S.J., Chicago, Ill.

. . . I wish to express to you my great pleasure in the work you and yours are doing in your excellent review, AMERICA, which I receive regularly. I sincerely hope it will receive the generous patronage it so well deserves, and that it will become a power for good in the world of Catholic literature.—Rt. Rev. Edward O'Dea, Bishop of Seattle, Wash.

. . . Cardinal Mercier, of Mechlin, lately made the following astonishing statement: "I, Bishop as I am, would delay the building of a church in order to help in the founding of a newspaper." It were worth the delaying of the building of many churches to get out such a paper as AMERICA, the first copy of which lies before us. It has filled a want in the strictest sense of the phrase. It has not come to crowd other Catholic papers from the field; no, it has come to occupy a place all its own, a place hitherto unclaimed. AMERICA is not an experiment. The number shows that it is a success.—St. Xavier Calendar, Cincinnati, Ohio.

. . . I do not desire to bother you with my praise of AMERICA, but I thank God for its existence, and I appreciated highly the treatment of Joan of Arc in the book review column.—Henry O. Bisset, Harrodsburg, Ky.

. . . I sincerely hope that the voice of AMERICA will never be stilled. I trust that its clarion tones will instill into the Catholic layman an enthusiasm to study especially history and historical matters affecting the development of religious thought.—John M. Barrett, Assistant Corporation Counsel, New York.

. . . I trust your success will spell the extinction of the paste-pot editor, who is too careless to correct the inaccuracies of the daily press, and offends Catholic spirit too often by his banalities.—John W. Ryan, Marconi Wireless, Sagaponack, N. Y.

CHRONICLE

Home Review of the Week.—The Board of Army Engineers appointed to look into the project places the cost of a fourteen-foot channel from the Lakes to the Gulf at the stupendous sum of $159,000,000 and claims that eighteen years of labor would be entailed in its completion. The same board claims, in its report, that a nine-foot canal will amply suffice to accommodate all commerce which would seek the Mississippi for generations to come.—The suit of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Company against the American Sugar Refining Company for $30,000,000 damages for the closing of the refinery established by the former company was settled out of court. The trust agreed to pay the plaintiff about $3,000,000. Following this private settlement the Department of Justice begins an investigation of the Sugar Trust with a view to criminal proceedings.—Another Federal investigation of conditions in the meat packing industry has been ordered by the Department of Agriculture. Two experts have been ordered to proceed at once to East St. Louis to make an exhaustive inquiry into conditions in the National Stockyards at that point.—Wreckers succeeded in floating the Antonio Lopez, the liner from Cadiz, which had been for days stuck on the sands off Fire Island beach. Her four hundred passengers had been previously taken off in a tug and brought to New York.—The Cunard liner Slavonia was wrecked near the Azores. A wireless message brought the steamers Batavia and Princess Irene to the rescue and her four hundred and ten passengers were taken off in safety.—

Fifteen of the Japanese strike leaders in Honolulu were arrested and in a preliminary hearing twelve of them were held on charges of conspiring to riot and three for conspiring to murder.—In his baccalaureate sermon to the graduates, President Wilson, of Princeton, declared that men who have been heaping up wealth and keeping just inside the law have nearly ruined the country and nearly debauched the nation. He warned labor unions, too, that the regulation of the amount of work an employee may do is economically disastrous and may cost America its supremacy among nations.—Edward Everett Hale, author and chaplain of the United States Senate is dead; leaders of the nation unite in mourning his loss.—Senator Aldrich shows his control over the Senate by blocking all attempts to reduce the Finance Committee's tariff on wool.—Works of art remain on the free list, as recommended to the Senate in an amendment of the House bill. The only stipulation made is that the works of art be at least twenty years old.—The amendments of Senators Bailey and Cummins providing for an income tax were consolidated into one and will be taken up for consideration on June 18.—The Wright brothers received gold medals and the thanks of the American people, from President Taft, for their aerial triumphs.

Accident Damages Soo Lock.—As the result of a misunderstanding of orders a steamer entering the lower or Canadian canal at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, was driven into the lock gates, carrying them away. One steamer was sunk, two others caught in the crash were damaged, and the $4,000,000 locks of the Canadian canal were put out of commission for probably two months. Great delays will result in the handling of traffic on the upper great lakes during the summer, as all of the craft will be forced to use the American canal and locks. This will cause much crowding of the single waterway, as the two canals during the open season carry the heaviest shipping traffic of any similar course in the world.

General Stephen D. Lee's Statue.—The Confederate Reunion at Memphis, June 10, was marked by the presence of Gen. Fred. D. Grant, U. S. A. An extraordinary ovation was given him by his father's ancient foes; every veteran of Forrest's Cavalry insisted on grasping the hand of "his father's son." On the following day a statue of Gen. Stephen D. Lee was unveiled in the National Park at Vicksburg on the spot from which Gen. Lee directed the defence of Vicksburg against Gen. U. S. Grant's besieging army. When Mr. Henry Watterson had spoken on "The Reunited Sections," Gen. Evans, of the Confederate Veterans, presented the statue to the Federal Government. It was received by General Grant, representing the Secretary of War. The applause that greeted him lasted twenty minutes and was renewed when he said at the close of a touching speech: "Here brothers fought for their principles. Here heroes died for their country. A united people will forever cherish the precious legacy of their noble manhood."

The Biblical Institute.—From the text of the Apostolic Letters by which a Pontifical Biblical Institute is founded in Rome we learn that "the aim of the Pontifical Biblical Institute is that there may be in the city of Rome a centre for the higher studies relating to the Sacred Books, designed to promote in the most efficacious way possible Biblical learning and all the studies connected with it. . . . The government of the Institute is to be entrusted to a president to be nominated by Us. He, by virtue of his office, is to represent the Institute, to refer to Us on all the more important affairs connected with the Institute, and to render to us every year an account of his rule. . . . The supreme guide and rule of the studies and government of the Institute shall consist of the principles and decrees published or to be published by the Apostolic See and the Pontifical Biblical Commission." This commission, established by Leo XIII, is not, as some supposed when the foundation of the Institute was first cabled to AMERICA, superseded. On the contrary, it shall prescribe the course to be followed for the attainment of academic degrees in Scripture. Thus it is not the Institute but the commission that will confer degrees.

The second paragraph of the laws appended to the letter, says: "The president is nominated by the Supreme Pontiff, on the report of the General of the Society of Jesus, who shall propose to him three candidates for the office. The Adjutor and Socius of the president shall fill the duties of secretary, and in ordinary affairs shall take the place of the president when he is absent or hindered." The Roman correspondent to The Tablet confirms our cable as to there being "some reason to believe that the new president has already been chosen in the person of Father Fonck, S.J."

The Pope to the American College.—On the occasion of the golden jubilee of the American College in Rome, now being celebrated, the Pope has sent to Mgr. Kennedy, its rector, an apostolic letter in which he expresses his extreme gratification "at the plentiful harvest of sound knowledge and wholesome discipline that the college has yielded." "It is a fact," writes the Holy Father, "that with the blessing of God Catholicism flourishes well in the United States. This is due in no small measure to this Roman home of piety and learning in which the flower of American youth have been trained to go forth and labor successfully in every line of activity which the sacred ministry demands."

Earthquake in France.—Despatches report from seventy-five to one hundred dead and one hundred injured as the estimated total of the casualties caused by the earthquake which ruined several towns and villages in the southernmost part of France, particularly in the Departments of Herault and Bouches du Rhone. The casualties may be greatly underestimated as the ruins have not been entirely searched. Many of the wounded are still imprisoned in the ruins and soldiers are working desperately to rescue them. Survivors are sleeping in tents, and the streets are impassable. In many places they have been torn up and are encumbered with masses of rock. Houses, public buildings and churches crumbled to pieces. Great suffering is reported from the remoter villages, because of the difficulty in sending to them food and other necessities. The loss of property measured in money will be very heavy.

Statistics From England.—The Local Government Board has issued a Blue Book dealing with social conditions in England. It points out that the population of the United Kingdom, in 1851, was 27,368,736, and in 1901, 41,458,721, being an increase of 51%. Between 1851 and 1908 the population of London increased 103%, and during the same period the increase in eighty-four large urban areas was 182%. During the same period the agricultural population had decreased by 30%. In 1850 the average weekly wages for agricultural labor was 9s 3½d ($2.25), and in 1907 it stood at 14s 6d ($3.50). The growth of education is illustrated by the fact that whereas in 1865, 225 out of every 1,000 married men in England were unable to sign their names, by 1907 the number had fallen to fourteen out of every 1,000.

Ireland.—The Imperial Home Rule Association has circulated among Unionists a striking pamphlet which contrasts government methods and results in Ireland and Scotland. In 1850 Ireland's population was nearly three times that of Scotland, now it is half a million less than Scotland's, though Irish families are fifteen per cent. larger. In Ireland there are eight, in Scotland only two, policemen for one convict, and the convicts cost twice, the officials five times as much in Ireland.—Two of the Australian delegates to the Imperial Press Conference were natives of Ireland, and nearly all were of Irish origin. They "do not want trammeling bonds," but unity of feeling. One question urged was the laying down of State-owned cables between Great Britain and Ireland and Australia.—Mr. Lloyd-George has granted a small subsidy—$30,000—to Irish-grown tobacco, but refused a rebate as against Free Trade principles. Mr. T. M. Healy said Protection and Free Trade had both been used to destroy Irish industries, though there was nothing sacred in either.

Germany.—The Reichstag has passed a new law against fraudulent practices in business competition, many of its best provisions being due to the activity of representatives of the Centre party. The new law is more definite in detail than was the old legislation concerning such practices, making specific mention of a greater variety of unlawful practices and increasing the penalty set upon them. Among its provisions is one fixing a year's imprisonment and heavy fine for conviction of bribery, the penalty applying alike to one who offers the bribe and to one who accepts it.—A declaration recently made by the Württemberg Ministry of Public Worship will be of welcome interest to Catholics. In that kingdom the Catholic Ecclesiastical Seminary is considered a State foundation and its charter provides that no seminarian shall be dismissed from the institution without the consent of the Kirchenrath, which is a State Commission. The minister was asked recently in Parliament why he had not interfered in the case of a Seminarist dismissed without the concurrent approval of this commission. In his reply the minister declared that this provision of the charter was obsolete, and had been so since 1853. He added that the seminary was a purely ecclesiastical institution, as nobody could oblige the bishop to ordain one whom he personally did not deem fit for the priestly office.

Natal Votes to Join Union.—The Colony of Natal, by the decisive vote of 11,121 to 3,701, has accepted the plan of the new South African Union lately arranged in a conference of British and South African Commissioners. This assures federation of the South African colonies, the Transvaal, Cape Colony, the Orange Free State and Natal, and the establishment of a new dominion in the East to rival the Dominion of Canada in the West.

Japan's Commercial Invasion of America.—The Japanese Ambassador, Baron Takahira, in an address at the University of Michigan, discussed the so-called commercial invasion of America, declaring it impossible to avoid commercial rivalry, which is simply an outcome of the development of international relations.

"The only way to meet such a situation is," said the Baron, "to conduct such rivalry in a friendly and right spirit."

Referring to the unpleasant, unthinkable stories, as he termed them, which were propagated in some quarters in recent years consequent upon certain unfortunate incidents in the West, the ambassador affirmed: "There can be no stronger evidence to prove the genuine friendship of the United States and Japan than the several compacts exchanged between the two countries in the course of last year."

Belated Wisdom.—The French Government is beginning to regret its mistake in holding aloof from the Blessed Jeanne d'Arc celebrations. An article in Le Temps, June 1, laments the Government attitude. "Because of a few sectarians at Orleans," it says, "the Government took up a position which allowed the adversaries of the Republic to unduly appropriate the recognition to La Pucelle. What ought to have been a national rejoicing, was left to become a party affair. Self-interest, if not tact, ought to have taught the Government better. . . . Some 'trainers of youth' aim, it is true, at blotting out of our school books the story of our victories. But it is impossible to admit that patriots can disassociate their faith in the promises of the future from the fitting reverence for the glories of the past."

Belgium.—It is a well-known fact that King Leopold takes a lively interest in building improvements, etc. The new Zeebrugge canal is due to his initiative, as are a hundred other projects. His latest plans included the beautifying of three different quarters of Brussels, all of which were combated by the people of Brussels and rejected by the chamber. His Majesty has just returned from his winter station on the Riviera. A rumor is current that as a token of his displeasure his splendid gallery of paintings will be sold abroad. This is confirmed by the news that comes from England to the effect that the sale of his paintings has already begun; some having been sold at Christie's in London for 200,000 francs by the "Duke of Saxony," and others at the same place for 150,000 francs, by the "Count Ravenstein," both of which titles he bears. The general attitude is one of suppressed irritation on both sides.—The military question remains uncertain; no one knows what will happen, not even the Catholic Deputies, who have not been taken into the confidence of the Government. The work of the military commission, announced in AMERICA some time ago, is over, and its report handed in, and it is stated on good authority that M. Schollaert, the Premier, has in hand a bill which he will propose soon.—Germany's attitude towards Belgium always causes anxiety. A passing visit to Antwerp, the great Belgian seaport, and the strategic key to the Flanders, is enough to show that German influence in that city is strong; the very architecture has a German air, one hears the language everywhere; on the other hand, the Germans are intensely disliked by the people. La Croix of Paris publishes an interview with a high naval officer of Germany on that subject. The latter denies all intention on Germany's part of political expansion over Belgium and Holland, says her wish is for the open-door everywhere and holds that, commercially speaking, the competition that the industries of a German Belgium would bring to bear on Germany would be too strong for the latter. This may be taken for what it is worth; the German military balloons that periodically drop down around the Antwerp fortifications may mean no harm; yet it is certain that a haunting fear of Germany is behind all the anxiety over the military question.—Some interesting statistics are published regarding Belgium's population and its progress in the last decade. For that period, only two provinces have had an abnormal increase, that of Antwerp, with seventeen per cent., that of Brabant with fourteen per cent. This has been the same in the whole history of Belgium. The increase is very unequal; thus, while the population of the whole country shows an increase of fifty per cent. in fifty years, that of the province of Antwerp has doubled. In certain parts, in the south, there is a decrease. Indeed, the general tendency is towards a much more rapid increase in the farming than in the industrial districts. A year ago the population of Belgium was 7,317,561, or 372 to the square mile. Brussels has now 730,000, and it is said, in twenty years, will reach the million mark.

Taxation in Germany.—It is largely the merit of the Centre party that a system of tax laws can be presented to the Reichstag at all. The finance committee has been at work for half a year. When the bloc began to be less manageable, the chairman of the committee, Dr. Paasche, of the bloc, who was justly or unjustly blamed for its inefficiency, resigned. The new chairman was elected from the Conservative party, which had separated itself from the bloc. With skill and energy he took the matter in hand. The business went on too fast for most of the bloc members of the committee. Joined by the Socialists they "struck," leaving in the committee a majority of Centrists, Conservatives and Poles. In endlessly long sessions, utilizing the material that had accumulated, this majority finished its financial plan, the main principle of which is: We want no financial reform unless Capital bears its share of the burden. Most of the taxes proposed are of a general nature. But Capital is to be taxed for about 120 million marks out of the 500 which has to be raised.

Another law due to the activity of the Centre is now going into effect. It modifies the already existing income tax so as to grant considerable reductions to those who have to support children or other needy relatives.

The reduction favors persons with small incomes but ceases if the income is more than 9,500 marks ($2,375).

John Nepomucene Sepp.—The Catholic historian, John Nepomucene Sepp, born at Tölz in 1816, died recently in Munich. In 1843 he published a "Life of Christ," to counteract the blasphemous work of Renan. In 1844 he was made professor in the University of Munich. At that time a Scotch adventuress, posing as a Spanish dancer, under the name of Lola Montez, became the King's favorite, organized the students of the University, and with their assistance kept the King under her sway. The whole population was enraged and Sepp was one of the loudest opposers of the tyrannical power the woman exercised and the mischief she created among the students. With seven of his colleagues he was deposed and banished from Munich. The King also dismissed his whole cabinet because it refused to consent to the naturalization of the dancer. Later, when the riots of the students had necessitated the closing of the University, she was exiled, and Sepp was allowed to return and resume his position. He kept it until 1867, when he was suddenly dismissed for personal reasons. While continuing his literary activity, especially in the line of religious history, he was several times elected member of the German and Bavarian Parliaments. His books, truly learned though not free from erratic views in religious matters, gained him a well-deserved reputation. The most important of them are besides the "Life of Christ," which was also translated into French, "History of the Apostles," "Joseph von Görres," "Religious History of Upper Bavaria," "Critical Contributions to the Life of Jesus and New-Testament Topography of Palestine," "Discoveries on the Second Journey to Palestine."

Anglo-Benedictine Orders.—Mar Timotheus, who has been in the background for some time, has once more come into ecclesiastical lime-light. Two Anglo-Benedictine "Monks" from Llanthony, South Wales, have journeyed to Winnipeg, Canada, seeking ordination at his hands: and Mar Timotheus consented "to ordain them with full jurisdiction in their monastery."

There are in England, or rather in Wales, two Anglo-Benedictine communities, one at Llanthony, the other on Caldy Island, Pembrokeshire. The attempt made by "Father Ignatius" to introduce the monastic life into the Anglican Church, eventually led him to repudiate Anglicanism though he never found his way into the Catholic Church. A section of his followers at Llanthony under the leadership of Mr. Aelred Carlyle proclaimed their loyalty to Anglicanism and "went out from their brethren," and have succeeded in establishing themselves on the Island of Caldy. When Mr. Aelred Carlyle sought ordination a few years ago he came to Bishop Grafton of Fond du Lac.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Bishop Grafton's Divided House

During the past year the Right Rev. Charles Chapman Grafton, S.T.D., the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, has published five pamphlets, two of them appearing under one cover, and all of them dealing with the relative merits of the Roman Catholic and Protestant Episcopal churches. The pamphlets are entitled, "Bishop Grafton's Letter to the Oneidas," "Pro-Romanism," "The Tractarian Movement," "A Rejoinder," "A Correspondence." The Letter to the Oneida Indians was criticized in The Catholic World, February, 1909, by the Rev. Lewis J. O'Hern, C.S.P., and the Bishop answered with "A Rejoinder." "Pro-Romanism" was attacked in the pages of The Daily Commonwealth of Fond du Lac, by the Rev. J. J. Keenan, Rector of St. Patrick's Church in that city. The Bishop replied in the same paper and there resulted a lengthy controversy which appeared afterwards in the pamphlet called "A Correspondence." That Bishop Grafton is responsible for the publication of this pamphlet we gather from its preface, which is entitled "An Eirenicon, or Olive Branch," and is signed C. C., Fond du Lac. Our task at present is not to review the discussions which have taken place up to this, but to say a few words about the Anglican Church and its daughter the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, reserving the right to inquire at some future time into the spirit which pervades the Bishop's part of the controversy. As the Bishop admits the essential identity of the Anglican Church and the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, what is said of the one holds good for the other.

In "Pro-Romanism" the Bishop makes a lengthy comparison of the faith of the Church of Rome with that of the Church of England, always against Rome and in favor of England. Then follows a chapter with the title, "Secession to Rome—What does it mean and involve?" In the present paper we shall make no comparison. It will not be necessary. But we shall put a like question and give one answer to it. One will be sufficient. Our question is, Secession to the Church of England—what does it mean and involve? Our answer is—Hopeless confusion in doctrine. The Bishop does not include Confusion among the marks of Christ's Church. The Bishop's answer is—Unanimity and Certainty in doctrine. He tells us ("Pro-Rom." p. 30): "In teaching this faith which an Anglican clergyman does he has for his authority the whole Catholic Church. If asked what is his authority he replies, 'It is God's Word in Holy Scripture, testified to by the common consent of undivided Christendom.' He stands on an immovable rock and speaks with a heaven-sent authority." Again he says (p. 31): "In the whole Church we have certainty, in the Roman Church uncertainty as to the faith. The Anglican Church, like a wise mother, carefully confines her dogmatic teaching to the essentials of the faith as embodied in the Creeds and manifested in the Sacraments."

That Bishop Grafton in the above quotations claims that the Anglican Church through its ministers teaches with certainty and unanimity the faith of Christ, is convincingly clear. For if the ministers of the Church of England preached contradictory doctrine in essential articles of faith they would not stand on an "immovable rock" of faith, but would rend that rock asunder and prove that it was not immovable. This would be to stultify themselves. Again if they taught such contradictory doctrine with "heaven-sent authority," they would make the Church of Christ a divinely authorized teacher of confusion. This would be to stultify God.

That Bishop Grafton would not wish, in theory at least, to stultify his church and his God, is certain. And so his claim must be that the ministers of his church, if, in truth, they stand on "an immovable rock" of faith and preach with a "heaven-sent authority," must necessarily teach with unanimity and certainty.

To testify to this unanimity and certainty which Bishop Grafton claims is in his church and which we deny, we shall call the following witnesses. We think they will prove acceptable to the Bishop: (1) The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, which "do contain the true doctrine of the Church of England agreeable to God's Word"; (2) Bishop Grafton; (3) Dr. Pusey, recommended by Bishop Grafton ("Pro-Rom." p. 60) as a man "of enormous learning and spiritually illuminated reason"; (4) Dr. Bright, recommended also by the Bishop "for his learning and scrupulous honesty and fairness" (Rejoinder, p. 57); (5) Canon Liddon, said by the Bishop to be one "of a great number of learned and saintly Anglican divines . . . who have examined and rejected the Papacy" ("Rejoinder," p. 10); (6) Dr. King at Oxford with Pusey, Liddon and Bright, Canon of Christ Church and Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology, thereafter Bishop of Lincoln; (7) Father George Angus, at one time ordained clergyman of the Anglican Church, later a priest in the Roman Catholic Church. For a quarter of a century he ministered to his flock in the University town of St. Andrews, where he died the 17th of March last, mourned alike by Catholic and Protestant. His funeral was attended by the members of the Town Council, many of the professors of the University, clergymen of all religious denominations and the Right Rev. the Primus of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. Father Angus had a deep knowledge of the faith of the Anglican Church and a love for truth. His testimony is unimpeachable (cf. London Tablet, March 27, April 3, 1909); (8) Father Henry Van Rensselaer, S.J. He studied at the General Theological Seminary (Protestant Episcopal), New York City and at Oxford. On his return to New York he was ordained Deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He re-visited England in search of truth, and though he had not spoken to a priest on the matter, nor entered a Catholic Church, and had "a mass of prejudices" against Rome, truth compelled him to become a Catholic. Later he became a Jesuit, was ordained priest, and labored many years in the ministry in New York City, where he died, as he had lived, a noble priest. From his "Life and Letters," published soon after his death, we have taken much of the testimony (given before his conversion) of Pusey, Liddon, Bright and King, quoted in this article.

To these witnesses we may add a few others, in the main Anglicans, and all of them with full credentials of their worth as witnesses. We have taken pains to fully accredit all these witnesses, because in the discussion which has taken place up to this Bishop Grafton has found fault with the worth of the witnesses brought against him, whether justly or unjustly it is not our intention here to determine.

We are now ready for our investigation, which, be it remembered, is not to establish the truth or falsity of a doctrine, but to answer a question of fact, viz.: In the Anglican Church, in its teaching of the Christian Faith, do we find hopeless confusion or unanimity and certainty? Bishop Grafton answers: Unanimity and certainty. Let us see.

On reading the nineteenth of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, which "do contain the true doctrine of the Church of England agreeable to God's word," we find there declared that the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch and Rome have erred in matters of faith, and we are forced to conclude that the Church of England also may err in like matters as it is no more a branch of the true Church than Rome. This judgment is further strengthened by the twenty-first article, which affirms that "General Councils . . . (for as much as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the spirit and word of God) may err and sometimes have erred even in things pertaining to God. Wherefore things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture." And so practically the matter stands in this wise that there is not and never has been an authoritative teaching body in the Church of England. "No Episcopal pronouncement," writes Fr. Clarke ("Vitality of Anglicanism," The Month, Vol. XCI, p. 272), "not even that of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the whole Bench of Bishops, will be regarded by Anglican clergymen who hold a different opinion as more than the misguided utterance of an individual or a number of individuals. Over and over again we shall witness, not Athanasius contra mundum, but the Rev. Mr. Smith, or Jones, contra universum Episcopatum Anglicanum. Each Anglican clergyman is of necessity his own Pope as regards the religious convictions which he holds to be true. If he professes to accept his beliefs on authority, it is not on the word of any living authority, but on that of some authority in the past which he chooses for himself, and of whose utterances he is his own interpreter, whether it be the Bible, or the three creeds, or what he calls 'the undivided Church,' or the Anglican Church before the Reformation. If the Bishop happens to hold the same doctrine as himself all will be well; if not, so much the worse for the Bishop."

The appeal to tradition and the Scriptures, then, is practically useless, for who is to tell precisely what tradition held and what the Scriptures exactly mean; what are the doctrines essential for salvation, what the doctrines not essential. (This distinction into non-essential and essential articles of faith is used in the Protestant sense, for articles which may and articles which must be believed. Catholics deny the right to make this distinction.) But even granted that the tradition preserved in the Church of England be sure, and that it has surely determined, what articles of faith are essential and what not essential, all this is of no avail unless its ministers preach with unanimity and certainty the articles which are essential, for otherwise they destroy the rock of faith which they claim is immovable.

And yet as we pass on to the next article which asserts that "the Romish doctrine of Purgatory . . . and also invocation of Saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded on no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God," we find Bishop Grafton beginning to rend the rock of faith by standing for that which is "repugnant to the word of God" when he praises ("Rejoinder," p. 8) the Roman Catholic Church for "its loving recognition of the intercession of saints." We find the same article flatly contradicted and publicly at that, in the Anglican Church of the Holy Innocents, Hoboken, by the celebration of a Solemn Mass of Requiem. We quote Father Van Rensselaer, at that time a deacon in the Anglican Church, with no leaning Romewards ("Life and Letters," p. 127). "Another sample of the absurdity of ritualism was given at a funeral of one of our choristers. We decided to have a Requiem Mass. Of course there is no provision made in the Book of Common Prayer for a Mass of any kind, as the Articles of Religion in that book denounce Masses as an abomination and a Popish invention. But such a denunciation only whets the desire of a ritualist." Bishop Grafton may tell us that he is not a ritualist, but that is not in question. The ritualist is an Anglican and what he teaches he teaches as Anglican doctrine. Besides, we shall find the Bishop further on, shoulder to shoulder with the ritualist in defending the notion of sacrifice, explain it as he will.

With the twenty-fifth article which treats of the Sacraments the confusion increases. Yet the Bishop attaches importance to Anglican teaching on the Sacraments.

The Educational System of Japan

The present educational system of Japan is comparatively of recent creation. It began with the Imperial restoration of 1867. The first elementary schools on modern lines were started in 1873; these were followed in due time by middle schools and universities. Freedom of education, as practised in America, is unknown in Japan. All the schools, private as well as public, are under the active control and inspection of the Educational Department. Besides, red-tape pervades the whole system. The Minister of Education governs through the medium of the governors of the provinces, the local assemblies and special inspectors sent to all parts of the empire. This control secures uniformity, but is irksome to a degree and destructive of all wholesome initiative among the educational staff.

The common elementary course extends from the age of six to twelve. It is a State monopoly. Attendance is compulsory for boys and girls. The course is free of charge, or nearly so, as the fees, if any, are insignificant, ranging from five to ten cents a month. Liberty of education begins from the higher elementary course upwards. The fees range from fifteen cents a month in these schools, to seventy-five cents in the middle schools, two dollars in the high schools, and about three dollars per month in the universities. These fees cannot meet all the school expenses; the taxes pay the balance.

Hence a serious handicap for Christian schools, which, being private, can admit the children only after the age of twelve, and then they must take the risk either of driving off the pupils by raising the fees high enough to pay the yearly expense, or the teachers by cutting down the salaries within the limits of the funds they dispose of. The teachers, even in public schools, are underpaid, earning, as a rule, hardly enough to keep body and soul together; but by way of compensation they enjoy certain privileges of official rank, and receive a slight pension after fifteen years of service. But after all, titles and honors confer but little comfort, and the lack of competent teachers is felt every year more keenly, especially so when we compare it with the steady increase of attendance at the elementary schools, and the enormous multiplication of all kinds of schools during the last few years. In 1873 the percentage of children of school age, attending the elementary schools, was 28 per cent, in 1883 it was 51 per cent, in 1903 it was 93 per cent., and in 1905 it was 96 per cent., namely, 98 per cent. for boys and 94 per cent. for girls. Most elementary schools are mixed. The curriculum comprises the Japanese language, morals, arithmetic, gymnastics, drawing, history, geography, object lessons and singing, with handiwork and sewing. To these branches are added in the higher elementary schools, a smattering of English and bookkeeping in the towns, and some notions of agriculture in the country districts. The hours of study vary from 21 to 30 per week.

The curriculum of the middle schools covers five years of study, pupils being admitted after the common elementary course. The program comprises morals, the Japanese, Chinese and English languages, universal history and geography, mathematics, natural science, physics, chemistry, drawing, singing and gymnastics, with some notions of political economy.

In 1906 there were 271 middle schools in Japan, of which 40 were private. The total number of students was 105,000; but 40 per cent of the candidates had to be refused for want of accommodation.

Middle school pupils enjoy the following privileges: (1) right to undergo the competitive entrance examination of the high schools; (2) postponement of military service until the age of 28, if necessary, to attain graduation; (3) optional military service of one year.

These privileges apply also to private schools approved by the Educational Department; but to obtain that approbation they must conform entirely to all the official regulations and programs and abstain from all religious teaching in class hours.

High schools cover three years of study, and prepare directly for the universities. At present they number eight in all and are open to graduates from the middle schools.

There are two State Universities in Tokyo and Kyoto, and several private ones, the principal of which are Waseda and Keiogijiku in Tokyo. The regular university course covers three years of study, supplemented by five years of post-graduate courses, which makes in all a total of twenty-two years of study from the first year of the common elementary school to the final graduation from the University Hall at the minimum age of 28.

This is rather late when compared to the average graduating age in the West. But what constitutes an appalling handicap for the Japanese student in his race for science and places him hopelessly behind his more favored Western brother, is the exceptional difficulties inherent in the study of the Japanese language and the almost superhuman amount of energy and perseverance required to master it thoroughly. Imagine a spoken and a written language differing at least as much as English and French, with special grammars and vocabularies; add the epistolary style which is simply Greek when compared to the ordinary written language; then remember that the written language is ideographic and that to be anything like a scholar you must be able to handle freely at least six thousand Chinese characters, each one written in three or four entirely different ways and harder to remember than most chemical formulas; besides these you are supposed to decipher readily some 20,000 more, and even then you know hardly one-fourth of the language—after that the astonishing thing is not that the Japanese lads need so much time to attain graduation, but that they can attain it in so short a seal of Divine origin. She is true to herself, even in time. Such is the outline of the regular classical department of Japanese education.

The progress of technical education is not less noteworthy. Roughly speaking, the various institutions for this purpose—commercial, agricultural, industrial and nautical—have increased threefold since 1901. In 1908 there were all together as many as 5,000 technical schools with about 200,000 pupils.

Girls are not admitted to middle schools. Their education ended at first with the higher elementary course; but soon higher girls' schools were established with a program much similar to that of middle schools, including a kind of callisthenics not to be distinguished by the profane eye from military drill, and more fit to produce Spartan-like, stout and muscular amazons than gentle house matrons.

There is no public provision for the education of young women beyond these higher girls' schools. The rest is left to private enterprise. There is a flourishing woman's university in Tokyo, with over a thousand pupils. As a matter of fact, the country is at present literally covered with educational institutions of every kind, all well equipped, working excellently and teeming with pupils. The grand total of children and students attending Japanese schools in 1905 was 5,841,302, out of a total population of over fifty-one million inhabitants. The teachers and instructors formed a grand army of 130,000 men.

This fact, wonderful as it is, becomes still more wonderful when we consider the scanty resources Japan could dispose of to produce this momentous effect in the short space of thirty-five years. It speaks volumes in favor of the earnestness of the Japanese nation.

Rhodesia and the South African Union.

Now that the Draft Act of Union has been approved by the various legislatures and finally amended by the delegates representing the different South African states at the Bloemfontein convention, it seems likely that the difficult problem of unification is well on its way to being definitely solved. Either unification or tariff war—that seems to have been the dilemma which presented itself as inevitable to every one of the delegates and prepared them to make whatever sacrifices were necessary for the end in view. The fact that people were found in each of the states concerned who thought that their interests had been betrayed in the draft scheme, is a strong argument that the scheme was reasonable. The Transvaal, the richest state in South Africa, naturally does not like the prospect of paying the debts of its poorer neighbors, while the colony of Natal, which is British, not less naturally, has its misgivings about forming part of a state which will be predominantly Dutch. It is a noteworthy fact that those present in the earlier sittings of the convention at Durban, were very soon agreed that unification and not federation was to be the object of their sittings.

Rhodesia, in all probability, will not join the union in the very near future. Its area is about equal to that of France, Germany and Austria combined, but it has only 15,000 white inhabitants and prefers to shape its own development towards maturity. Its great mineral resources are being exploited with steady progress, and Rhodesians consider that the supply of native labor in their country ought not to be diverted to purposes in which they are less intimately concerned. They will have to join the union later on, but they have received pledges that, when they do so, it shall be on terms acceptable to themselves and of their own free choice. These pledges were secured largely by the efforts of Mr. C. P. Coghlan, the only delegate who represented the people of Rhodesia, as distinguished from the chartered company, at the three meetings at Durban, Cape Town and Bloemfontein.

Mr. Coghlan is a loyal Catholic who has earned the respect of his fellow citizens by his ability and his public spirit. He is likely to play an important part in shaping his country's future. As regards the native question, he is strongly opposed to colored franchise. There is a black vote in Cape Colony and it will probably continue to exist there if the Act of Union is passed, but it is not likely to be extended to the rest of South Africa. Another working principle of Mr. Coghlan's is that Britishers in South Africa must trust their Dutch fellow subjects; in the first place because they are trustworthy, and secondly because, as things are, there is nothing else to be done.

For better or for worse the Boers have been given most of the rewards of victory as a consolation for defeat and, having superior numbers as well as the franchise, they form the predominant element in the population of South Africa. Personally Mr. Coghlan is in favor of the inclusion of Rhodesia in the union though, for reasons already given, he does not think that the time is yet ripe for such a step. He insists, however, on the fact that, sooner or later, its absorption is inevitable. The country has no ports of its own and all its external trade is carried on via Cape Town and Beira in Portuguese East Africa. Moreover Rhodesia is dependent for its defences upon help coming from its southern neighbors.

It seems a strange thing that a population of 15,000 white men can sleep securely in the midst of one and one-third millions of natives and that when, as is the case, there are no regular soldiers in the country and when most of the irregular force has been disbanded. There is not a settlement or a town in Rhodesia which could not be carried by a well organized night attack on the part of the natives. Yet no one is greatly apprehensive. The truth is that the natives do not know their power. They have been beaten in two great wars and they do not realize that the white man is, at present, living on his prestige rather than upon his immediately available strength.

Moreover, it is difficult for them to combine. They have no recognized leader under whom they may rally while, in case of any attempt at a concerted rebellion, the numerous Christians and such other natives as deem themselves better off under the white man's rule, would be sure to give information about the proceedings of their fellows.

Differences of opinion about the way in which the black races ought to be treated have been already and probably will be a difficulty in the way of agreement between the different states who are now endeavoring to unite. Besides the difficulty of the franchise there are the further questions of property-holding, of education and native police regulations. No white man in Rhodesia is allowed to strike a native, yet grave scandals have already arisen in cases of fatal assaults, when the jury, in spite of the influence of the judge, have refused to inflict condign punishment on white savages who richly deserved hanging.

The native problem cannot be solved without the help of the missionary. Yet this is not the universal view. A number of letters have been written to some of the English papers to deter people at home from supporting native missions. One writer says: "The Kaffir in his own country is moral, honest and trustworthy. But how different he is when he gets into British territory. Here he takes to drink, as a rule, and all the vices which follow in its train." The supposition is that the average black is naturally a gentleman and that he is transformed into a rogue by education, especially my missionary education.

Of course there is evidence forthcoming to support such theories. If a savage is secretly a rogue to begin with, his education will make him a cleverer and a more manifest rogue, especially when it enables him to find employment in places where temptations and bad example abound. But it is not the missionary who is to blame but rather the decivilized white man who thinks that he too has no need of the missionaries' teaching. As for the "noble savage" theory, they who broach it have no personal knowledge of the African native. A missionary writing in the Zambesi Record for April says:

"It is true that some of the most abominable vices known in civilization are not to be found among the raw natives and that a certain outward observance of morality is imposed by native custom . . . He (the native) has no idea of morality: his thoughts and conversation, from childhood upwards, are steeped in all that is vile and low, and as he grows older he gives, as far as he can, full vent to his passions, unrestricted by any sense of guilt or fear of future punishment . . . After many years spent among natives we have come to the conclusion that truthfulness is a virtue in which they are conspicuously wanting."

Catholic missionaries in Rhodesia have many reasons for gratitude for the support which they have received from the present government. It is to be hoped that the union, when it comes, will find a solution of the native education question, which will bring the secular and the religious ideas still more into harmony.

A Visit to the Bollandists.

The new College of St. Michel at Brussels is vast, one long centre-piece of five hundred feet, with two wings at each end and a church in the middle. In the large projection beyond the wings on each end are the Bollandists' quarters and we go in without delay. We enter the great glass door, leaving the employees' room to our right and the long corridor behind us, and step into a spacious hall. This is their library. It is four stories high and contains 150,000 volumes. We pass on to another set of doors, which open into the very sanctum sanctorum, and it is with something like awe that we step in. It looks like a library, too, for they keep their most needed books and manuscripts here, but there is something more. The floor is clear and there are three tables at each end. Here is where they work: and here in the very atmosphere of the place, we shall sit down and listen to their story.

What, and who, are the Bollandists? I wonder how many people could tell? Few, to be sure, are so ignorant as the lady who asked if they had been condemned by the Church, and most people know that they write saints' lives and are Jesuits. They are chosen from among the best linguists and historians of the Jesuit Belgian province, and are trained for the work long before they are even ordained. Nor is it quite true to say they write saints' lives. Their aim is, on the contrary, to furnish to those who wish to write the lives of saints all that they need in the way of original material and genuine sources. Hence their work is twofold, one of research and one of criticism, but not one of composition. They aim at collecting all that has been written of the saints,—especially first-hand evidence and that which is generally inaccessible,—and have thus scoured the libraries of Orient and Occident, passed judgment on what they have found and presented it with an accompanying commentary—and the result is the long series known as the "Acta Sanctorum," or more simply and popularly, "the Bollandists." So you see they are wholesale dealers rather than retail, they handle the raw material rather than the finished product.

Father Heribert Rosweyde, who lived in the early seventeenth century, had a penchant for delving in old documents, and as we may suppose he was naturally pious, his search took him chiefly to what was said of the saints. With this end in view, he spent all his vacations, for during the year he was a hard-worked professor of rhetoric at Douai,—going over all the monastery libraries of Belgium and France, and after twenty years, had amassed an enormous quantity of matter. At this point, however, he was carried off by death. Then

Father Bollandus comes on the scene, for with Rosweyde's papers, he also inherited his ambitions, and continued the work, following the order of the martyrology and beginning with January. However, his ideas were vague, and besides, too wide and optimistic. Disillusionment came soon, at the hands of his first two helpers, former brilliant pupils of his, Godfrey Henschen and Daniel Papebroch, who indeed it was that gave the final cast to the work. With their accession a new era began for the Bollandists. These two young men set out in July, 1660, on a tour of exploration of the libraries of Europe. Everywhere they were cordially met and assisted by the great savants of the time, among whom Father Bollandus' name had already won great respect; and when they came home in December, 1662, they were laden with thousands of manuscripts, or copies they had had made. The success of the work was now assured, but it was a vast undertaking. However, for a century and a half it went on, rapidly at first, but slowing down and lengthening out as time went on, and methods became more scientific. When the final crash came that ruined the Society of the Jesuit Fathers the work had only reached the sixth volume of October, and it was not till 1836 that it was again put on a footing. From that time to this, the work has gone on steadily, and the Bollandists and their methods have stood for all that is best in scientific criticism.

At present there are but five Bollandists actually engaged on the work; that other desk over there will be occupied in a few years. According to their admirable division of the work, Father Delehaye deals exclusively with the origins of Christianity up to the fifth century and all that concerns the Greek or Byzantine church in any epoch; while all the Oriental saints have been confided to Father Peeters, a young man still, and a very prodigy of learning;—he had, spread out on his desk, when I was there, books in nine different languages, and showed us books in ten others, most of them in strange exotic print that looked to our profane eyes as mere ungainly daubs of ink. The Occident is divided into two parts,—the early middle ages—from the fifth to the twelfth centuries, which Fathers Poncelet and De Smedt (their chief) look after, and which will also occupy the attention of the owner of that empty desk, who bears the distinguished Antwerp name of Moretus, and is now studying theology. All the period from the twelfth century on is the province of Father Van Ortruy.

One of the curiosities of the place is Father Peeters's composing room. As not every printer has the precise type he generally deals in, he has set up an establishment of his own, where, with his own hand, he composes the texts he needs, in the original language, and then sends them off to the printer. It might be well to mention that the next volume to appear will be the Vol. III of November,—the sixty-fifth of the whole series,—containing the 5, 6, 7, and 8th days of that month. Of course when December is finished, they will recommence, but as they say, the present Bollandists will all be dead before that.

There then are the Bollandists; hagiographers, extensive linguists, historical writers of marvellous and unequalled power and training, with sound traditions and yet strongly devoted to progress and fully abreast of the times.

J. WILFRID PARSONS, S.J.

The English Reformation

Honest Protestant historians are proving more and more convincingly that the time-honored Protestant tradition is not founded on fact, but on "fable and fiction." The latest and most notable return to Catholic tradition is illustrated by Dr. James Gairdner in his "Lollardy and the Reformation in England: an Historical Survey." The work has been reviewed at length by W. S. Lilly in the April Dublin Review.

On the first page of his work Dr. Gairdner quotes the late Bishop Creighton's account of the Reformation as "a great national revolution which found expression in the resolute assertion, on the part of England, of its national independence," and his statements that "there never was a time in England when the Papal authority was not resented," and that "the final act of the repudiation of that authority followed quite naturally as the result of a long series of similar acts which had taken place from the earliest times." From these pronouncements Dr. Gairdner emphatically dissents. He knows of no evidence which warrants them. He thinks it is clear that "Rome exercised her spiritual power by the willing obedience of Englishmen in general, that they regarded it as a really wholesome power, even for the control it exercised over secular tyranny." He tells us "it was only after an able and despotic King had proved himself stronger than the spiritual power of Rome, that the people of England were divorced from their Roman allegiance." He finds "abundant evidence that they were divorced from it at first against their will."

This is a striking confirmation of the late Cardinal Manning's favorite phrase, that "the English people were robbed of their faith," and this confirmation gathers additional strength from Mr. Lilly's expert opinion that Dr. Gairdner and Abbot Gasquet "are probably the only men living who have personally investigated the original documents connected with the change of religion in England." Dr. Gairdner's work shows that the Reformation in England was not the result of any religious movement, but the outcome of Henry VIII's personal quarrel with the Pope. Lollardy had become so unpopular that the very name was almost disused in 1539, "and the expression 'the New Learning' had generally taken its place, as putting a better face on the same kind of heresy."

One strong proof that no religious motive prompted Henry VIII's rebellion against the Holy See, is the fact that, after that rebellion, he "constantly maintained that though Papal authority was gone, the Faith remained in his kingdom inviolate." He terrorized the clergy, he destroyed the religious houses and seized upon their property; but he regarded himself as being no less orthodox than the Pope. As Dr. Gairdner puts it, "the Vicar of Christ recognized by other nations was at Rome; but Henry had displaced him, so far as his own dominions went, and had taken upon himself the full responsibilities of the position." He was the English Pope, infallible judge of doctrine in his realm, and he upheld it, standing upon the ancient ways, as he had received it, against heretics who impugned it.

In the Statute of Six Articles, which was passed by Parliament eight years before his death and remained in force for the rest of his reign, he asserted transubstantiation, the sufficiency of communion under one kind, the obligation of clerical celibacy, the validity, "by the law of God," of vows of chastity, the excellence of private masses, the necessity of the sacrament of penance. Clearly, then, Henry meant to remain and to keep his subjects Catholic as far as he could while rejecting the supremacy of the Pope. It was not till after the tyrant's death that Cranmer, who was now the depositary of that headship of the English Church which the boy Edward VI could not exercise, used his power to bring about changes for which his late master would have sent him to the stake. He repealed the Six Articles and drew up forty-two others, since reduced to thirty-nine and slightly recast. For the Missal he substituted a Communion Service, framed chiefly on a Lutheran model and purged of the sacrificial idea. The Mass was denied and blasphemed. The doctrine of the Teaching Church disappeared, and what has been called Solibiblicism, or "the Bible and nothing but the Bible," was substituted for it. Dr. Gairdner boldly calls it a superstition, and it is a superstition with which, as Mr. Lilly says, the Book of Common Prayer is saturated. Thus the great theological change called the English Reformation, far from having been the cause of "breaking the bonds of Rome," was a gradual consequence of that schism. As Dr. Gairdner expresses it, "theological change followed in the wake of political and social changes."

Remembering the state of public opinion at the period when Macaulay wrote his famous essay on "Hallam's Constitutional History," it is not easy to overrate his courage in declaring to his astonished readers that the Reformation in England "sprang from brute passion and was nourished by selfish policy," that the "bluff" monarch who wrought it was "a shameless tyrant," that honesty was the last quality attributable to the singular "Martyr" who "rose into favor by serving Henry in the scandalous affair of the divorce," who was always ready to prostitute his spiritual authority to the amorous or bloodthirsty passions of his master, "who changed his religious creed backwards and forwards as the King changed his," and "who died solely because he could not help it," and "could not succeed in purchasing by another apostasy the power of burning better and braver men than himself"; that, of the accomplices of Cranmer, "Ridley was, perhaps, the only one who had any important share in bringing about the Reformation who did not consider it a mere political job." Time has justified this vehement indictment. One article after another of the great Protestant tradition has gone, as the actual facts, long buried under a mass of misconception and fable, have been brought to light.

Of the schism itself, imposed by the iron will of a dissolute and cruel despot, Dr. Gairdner says: "Never was a new principle introduced in more revolting form than that Royal Supremacy which has governed the Church of England ever since Henry VIII's days." As Mr. Lilly points out, people may talk of "Papal Absolutism," but it is an altogether foolish and misleading phrase. The Pope is "fettered on all sides: by the Divine Law from which he cannot dispense; by the opinions of theologians; by the prescriptions of the canonists; by the formal Acts of his predecessors which he may not ignore; by the longeval traditions of his office; by the advice of the Sacred College which may be regarded as his Privy Council. From all these checks Henry VIII, in the exercise of his ecclesiastical supremacy, was altogether free. It was for not accepting this monstrous intrusion of Cæsar into the spiritual sphere, that Fisher and More, and so many other holy and humble men of heart were ruthlessly butchered." And yet, strange to say, Dr. Gairdner, with a lack of logic which seems to be the common heritage of Protestants, admits the principle itself, for he writes: "The Royal Supremacy, though brutally enforced by Henry VIII, was nevertheless a true principle, and remains with us still." These are almost the concluding words of his second and last volume. On reading them Mr. Lilly exclaims: "A true principle! Why it is the essential principle of ancient Paganism which knew of no distinction between the temporal and spiritual, which made the State lord of men's souls as of their bodies. It was as witnesses against this principle that the Martyrs victoriously died. It was by vindicating the diametrically opposite principle which denies to the secular ruler rights over the immaterial part of man, over conscience, over religion, that the Church wrought out the liberty where-with Christ has made us free."

L. D.

Lamennais.

Whenever the name of Lamennais is whispered the Catholic mind reechoes his eloquent chant over the mighty dead, of which each strophe ends with the words "Happy are the dead who die in the Lord," and thinking of his own end Catholic charity repeats over and over the words of mercy he spoke to the widowed Mme. de Lacan: "The slightest turning towards God, the very last breath if breathed out in prayer to Him are enough for His mercy; what man cannot perceive He sees and is content with." May it have been so with Lamennais. The current issue of the Revue des Deux Mondes revives or revivifies old controversies by the publication for the first time of some letters that passed between Lamennais and Mme. de Lacan, who by a second marriage became the Baroness Cottu. At no time were the relations between the Abbé and his friend other than those strictly in keeping with his sacerdotal character.

The magnetism of his work "L'Essai sur l'Indifférence" drew Olympe de Saint-Luc, married unhappily to M. de Lacan and standing at the parting of the ways between God and a life of frivolous pleasure, to seek an interview with the writer. Lamennais' laconic reply granting the request was the beginning of a correspondence dating from 1818 and of which the last letter was written in January, 1854, just one month before his death.

Count d'Haussonville who contributes the article in the Revue des Deux Mondes promises a complete edition of the letters in the near future. Comment and controversy they are sure to arouse, but at least we may take the mournful pleasure of welcoming their appearance as another proof of how inevitable was Lamennais' excommunication. The letters of the dead are not sacred in this prying and critical age; an age of body-snatchers of literature. Yet, if ever silence had claims it was here.

Vex not his ghost: oh! let him rest.
He hates him who on the rack of this tough world
Would stretch him out longer.

It is idle to speculate on what might have happened had the Rome of Leo XII been the Rome of Leo XIII. A priest's duty is not measured by such standards, and docility was not one of Lamennais' virtues. To say the least and the kindest of him it was illogical to think he could forward an explicit submission to Rome, and at the same time publish "Les Paroles d'un Croyant." Pride stood in the way of reason, and towards the end reason itself seems to have been dethroned. There is perhaps no sadder page in history than that account given by Madame Cottu of her visit to her old friend at Paris in 1840. The crucifix had been removed from his wall. The prie-dieu was no longer in the room, and our Lady's statue had been replaced by a statue of Liberty with the inscription:

"Liberty, dear Liberty,
Be on the side of thy champions."

"What a Madonna!" exclaimed good Mme. Cottu to her husband on her return home. "I have been for two hours with M. Lamennais," she writes, "he spoke frankly of questions that have hitherto been barred between us.

. . . On opening his heart to me he showed me a deep abyss, a chasm as vast as had been in his mighty intellect the thought of God that had at one time filled it. He expressed a sort of horror for the ecclesiastical state. 'I have never been so happy,' said he, 'as since

I shook off all that sort of thing.' I took courage to reply, 'Nevertheless it was in the fulness of your intellect and will that you took up all that sort of thing.' He made me repeat this obvious reply twice as though he had not properly caught it, but really because he had no answer ready. Then he said with embarrassment and under difficulty, 'I had had great sorrows. . . I was looking for consolation. . . .'

"He spoke to me of the way Rome had treated him. 'By accusing of heresy my doctrine as to authority it drove me to consider my position. I wanted to keep my eyes closed, and it is not my fault if by forcing me to open them they drove me to see clear.' Assuredly that was not the result of the objections raised against him."

Lamennais lies buried in an unknown grave in Père La Chaise. After life's fitful fever why disturb the silence of his sleep?

The Independence of the Holy See

The Roman correspondent of Le Temps publishes an interview he has had with "une très haute personnalité," an important dignitary at the Vatican relative to Austria's refusal to take part in the Italian international exhibition.

"The coming of Catholic Sovereigns to Rome, and the participation of Catholic countries in an exposition are two entirely different things. The world knows the attitude of the Vatican towards royal visits. Experience has shown that the staying away of Catholic Sovereigns is a matter of deference to the spiritual power of the Pope."

"Spiritual power," I asked; "do you not mean temporal power?"

"Do not forget that the papal claims to temporal power are but an assertion of the claim for freedom of spiritual ministry which the Pope finds practically impossible as long as another sovereign power presides at Rome. An Italian politician, as noted for his cleverness as for his anti-clericalism, has very well expressed it when he said that the Pope's continual protest against the occupation of Rome is the only means left him for reminding the world that the Pope is not the puppet of the rulers of Rome, and that thus the world may rest certain that in the exercise of his spiritual ministry the Pope is not influenced by the masters of the Eternal City. . . ."

"All those who tried loyally to understand the reasons for Catholic Sovereigns abstaining from visiting Rome, have understood the gravity of the Pope's decision on the point. I am aware that the decision finds little favor with militant anti-clericals. . . . The Vatican maintains its attitude on the question of Catholic Sovereigns because such attitude furnishes an official international support of its protest for liberty and independence de jure and de facto. . . . But the Holy See has nothing to do with expositions, and in proof of this, Spain and Portugal, Catholic States in diplomatic relations with the Holy See, are taking part in the 1911 Exposition."

CORRESPONDENCE

A Sketch of the French Chamber

The French national character has altered but little since Tacitus described it as a love for rem militarem et argute loqui. A new element not easy to define but known as gauloiserie has grown up. It is best illustrated in M. Waddington's reply to a reporter who, after a diplomatic banquet at which Prince Bismarck, M. Waddington's neighbor, had related many highly spiced stories, asked whether the Iron Chancellor spoke French with ease. "Oh, yes, he speaks French fluently, voire même le Gaulois."

It is in politics, a modern factor in French life, that the national characteristics have been most fatal. The argute loqui has wedded the rem militarem and from the union intrigues and faction fights have been born. The average Frenchman remains, however, a "politician of the village pump." Questions of national importance do not interest him; his vote is cast on local issues or given on personal grounds, with the consequence that the French Chamber is by no means representative of the national mind or will. It is composed of a number of deputies gathered into factions or groups for the furtherance of personal ends on the principle of "ca' me and I'll ca' thee." The physiognomy of Parliament is very puzzling for the stranger: and the puzzle is made more difficult by the nomenclature of the parties, for instance the Right, the Extreme Right, the Left, the Extreme Left with the multifarious sections that lie between these extremes. To understand the present situation it is necessary to go back to the establishment of the Third Republic. At that time the Extreme Right was composed of uncompromising Royalists; the Right, of Legitimists and Bonapartists; the Right Centre of nominal, half-hearted Republicans; in the centre sat the Orleanists without any policy. The Left Centre was composed of Republicans loyal to the Republican ideal but moderate in their expression of it; the Left was reserved for Republicans of more energetic stamp, while on the Extreme Left the Radicals made merry. At the present day the Radicals have moved up a place and the Extreme left is the citadel of the Socialists. For a ministry to carry on the Government it was necessary to count on the good will of several of these sections. Gambetta inaugurated a union of the various Republican groups along opportunist lines, but as a matter of tactics the Right and Right Centre joined their forces with the Radicals under M. Clémenceau and ministries fell almost as fast as they were formed. The Boulanger scare brought about closer union among the bloc républicain and with its aid the various Cabinets have been working ever since. Within recent years a section of the Right or Monarchist party in obedience to Pope Leo's advice has joined the Republican party and is known as the "Ralliés." These main divisions of the Chamber are again subdivided into lesser fractions, so much so that even Socialism is a house divided against itself, and ministerial crises, while not as frequent as formerly, do sometimes occur. It may be pointed out, for the American reader at all events, that a ministerial crisis far from calling for an appeal to the country merely entails the patching up of a new cabinet from among the members of the bloc républicain.

The president of the Republic, M. Fallières, a self-made man, was chosen rather because he was a safe man than for any great brilliancy of parts. Any attempt at personal government on the part of a president would be a signal for suspicion and uneasiness on the part of the bloc. The most important figure in the Chamber to-day is M. Clémenceau, its president. As a young man he mixed drugs and politics with journalism, and in 1875 (he was born in 1841) he started the Radical opposition to Gambetta. When Gambetta died his opposition died with him and little was heard of Clémenceau till he sprang to the front in 1906. Clémenceau is a clever parliamentarian and a very skilful debater. M. Combes is now an old man, but is well known for his fanaticism against the Church of which he formerly received minor orders. M. Briand, another Republican leader, poses as a philosopher and holds all religion as a superstition in which an enlightened State can have no part. M. Pelletan, another newspaper man, became Minister of Marine and reformed religion out of the Navy. The most eloquent man of the Chamber is undoubtedly Count Albert de Mun, formerly a Royalist, but now a Rallié. Owing to ill-health and advancing years (he is sixty-eight years old), his voice is now but seldom heard. During the debates on the Separation of Church and State a prominent figure on the Right was that of M. Denys Cochin. But on the whole political personalities in the Chamber are but mediocrities, puppets of freemasonry, who do battle against Religion while the State perishes. The psychology of the French people is a puzzling one, but the lessons from the past show that while long suffering under misgovernment they are subject to paroxysms of frenzy when aroused from their lethargy, and recent quarrels between Capital and Labor may prove to be the first rumblings of a mighty storm that will sweep away all existing landmarks. A Display of Anti-Clericalism

ROME, MAY 29.

After the discussion on the Budget of Agriculture in the Chamber of Deputies, the question of the Budget of the Minister of Grace and Justice was taken up. The occasion was seized on by the Socialists and Radicals for a display of anti-clericalism. Things had been going on smoothly until an out-and-out Republican, Chiesa (a toy manufacturer from Milan), made an attack on the Church, dragging in the Queen-mother's charities. The ministers reply rejecting Chiesa's motion met with the approval of the House by 169 votes to 53. The vote is an index of the feeling in the country, and shows the united front those who are on the side of order and religion are making against the inroads of Socialism. As was pointed out in the first number of AMERICA a systematized anti-clerical movement in Italy is out of the question. There are occasional flashes of anti-clerical feeling but they never last; and it will be some time before the Socialists again venture to challenge the House on the matter. The ecclesiastical policy of the Italian Government, while by no means ideal, is far from being so oppressive as in other Latin countries. And the fact that the anti-Clericals could find no more doughty champion of their cause than the toymaker from Milan shows how mean they really are. Moreover, some hints dropped by Minister Orlando on restricting the rights of association seems to presage that the Socialists are likely to fall into the trench they have been digging for the Church. It would be going too far to say that in the Cabinet there are not some, and among them Minister Orlando himself, who accept anti-clericalism in theory, but they are few, and their views have to give way to Giolitti's policy of non-interference with the Church.

It is a happy sign of the times that among Catholic parties a more charitable tone is being adopted. This is a result of a recent federation of Catholic journalists in Italy. It is to be hoped that the discussion in the Chamber will have the effect of opening the eyes of those in high places who would gladly see anti-clericalism given a trial. The fact that the Queen-mother was attacked together with the Church, ought to show the Quirinal that anti-clerical spells also anti-dynastic. On the whole then the people of Italy may congratulate themselves on the fact that the mandate of ecclesiastical peace confided by them to the deputies of their choice has been loyally obeyed.

Among the most recent pilgrimages received in Rome was that of the Catholic Union of French Railway Employees, 1,000 strong, with sixty banners, and representing 40,000 associates. They visited their national church, St. Louis des Français, and sang their union hymn, a most spirited imitation of a trip to Heaven by railway. The pilgrims were received by the Holy Father on May 25 and everything passed off in perfect order.

On May 22 there came a pilgrimage from Spain for the canonization of Bl. J. Oriol, and on the twenty-third, one from Austria and Moravia for the canonization of Bl. C. M. Hofbauer. In receiving them the Holy Father had the pleasure of announcing that he had received congratulatory telegrams from the sovereigns of Austria and Spain. That from Austria is as follows:

"TO HIS HOLINESS, POPE PIUS X. THE VATICAN.

"The canonization to-day of Blessed Clement Mary Hofbauer gives me special joy and satisfaction. I avail myself of the occasion to assure your Holiness of my friendly participation in this auspicious event, and to express my warm thanks for this mark of honor shown to a most holy son of a country forming part of my state.

"FRANCIS JOSEPH."

The telegram from Spain read:

"TO HIS HOLINESS, POPE PIUS X. THE VATICAN.

"I take pleasure in expressing hearty thanks for the canonization of St. Joseph Oriol, which Catholic Spain hails with joy as a new proof of the affection of your Holiness. With renewed expression of our enduring filial adhesion, the Queen and I beg your Apostolic Blessing.

"ALPHONSUS."

These consoling messages must produce a marked impression in both countries, and show that the two sovereigns are not Catholics merely in name.

L'EREMITE.

A Period of Enthusiasm and Organization

INNSBRUCK, MAY 27, 1909.

The atmosphere in the political world of Austria during the last ten days has been charged with enthusiasm and the spirit of organization. The latter received its tone at the beginning of last week from the reception accorded the German Emperor and his consort on the occasion of their visit of state to the Emperor Franz Joseph in Vienna. They received a welcome such as only Viennese can give; and there is no doubt that the incident has gone a great way to deepen the assurance of the people in the fidelity of Germany to its Austrian ally, and to strengthen the desire of the people for the continuance of peace. Peace was the prevailing sentiment expressed by the two emperors in their toasts at the state banquet, but especially by the Emperor of Austria, and it was reechoed by the press throughout the land. A significant incident was the despatch of a telegram of greeting and friendship by the two emperors to the third monarch of the Triple Alliance, the King of Italy, whom the Emperor of Germany had visited in state shortly before.

There is a tendency on the part of some foreign newspapers to estimate the price Austria has paid for peace as too high in comparison with the obligations she is now under to Germany. But even if Austria be bound to reciprocate the action of Germany in case the latter need her assistance in a similar international complication, it is only what was to have been expected. Mutual fidelity would seem to be of the very essence of the Triple Alliance.

On Thursday of the same week, 25,000 representatives of the Austrian peasant class met in Vienna for their first general convention. Although there have been numerous local organizations of the farming classes in the Austrian states, there has been no great general organization. One important result of the convention was the determination to push forward this organization rapidly and thoroughly. Another not less important resolution had reference to the desire on the part of some, to isolate the peasant class politically from the other classes. This desire was repudiated; and it was determined that the peasant should work hand in hand with the tradesman and the aristocrat for the economic and moral betterment of the nation under the guidance of Christian principles.

In Innsbruck, on Friday, the first general assembly of Tyrolese Catholics was opened. The impulse that led to the summoning of this Catholic congress was not only the desire to make a striking profession of loyalty to Church and Fatherland, on the occasion of the jubilee of the patriotic uprising of Tyrol in 1809, but to discuss ways and means of meeting and overcoming the numerous economic, religious, and moral dangers that of late years have been growing in, and threatening the peace of, this little land of loyalty. Tyrol had been for long immune from these dangers; at least among the great bulk of the people outside the cities they were not especially imminent. But constitutional, as well as economic, changes within the last decade, have brought these perils closer. Universal suffrage, while it is a measure of justice welcomed by the Catholic parties, is at the same time an opportunity for the Social-Democratic party of which they are taking the utmost advantage. This party is already well organized and it carries on a vigorous propaganda in the press and from the platform against the fundamentals of Christian society, and even against the monarchy. As yet, indeed, their influence in Tyrol is confined mostly to the cities, but they are looking farther afield, and a solid Catholic organization is demanded to resist them, as well as the remnants of the free-thinking parties that exist in various parts of the state.

Other dangers are the influence of an evil press of peculiar virulence and the recent enormous increase in tourist traffic; the number of tourists reached above 800,000 in 1908. The former of these is common to the whole of Austria, but there are signs that its special attention is turned towards Tyrol, in the persuasion that a victory in this land of faith and loyalty would be more valuable than elsewhere. At first sight it may seem hard to realize that the presence of tourists should constitute a danger to be guarded against. But the difficulty vanishes in the presence of the facts. Not only do the sojourners themselves influence both directly and indirectly the religious beliefs of the simple Tyrolese peasants, but the small army of servants and helpers that have flocked from all parts to health-resorts like Meran and Bozen, is an element that has not left its mark for good on numbers of the inhabitants. Proselytizing is not by any means unknown. It is an abuse of the whole-hearted hospitality which Tyrol knows so well how to extend, an abuse that drew forth an eloquent protest from one of the speakers during the congress.

The remedies for these evils recommended in the resolutions of the congress were the continued support of the admirable "Piusverein" for the furthering of the Catholic press; the thorough organization of all classes, especially the working and the peasant class; the apologetic education of the people against their Protestant and free-thinking enemies, and the union of the Christian Socialist and Conservative parties, both Catholic, whose differences and discord have done not a little to hinder Catholic progress and to help the Social Democrats.

On May 22, there was a magnificent celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the victory of the Austrians under the Archduke Charles over the French under Napoleon at Aspern. On the battlefield itself, now within the Vienna city limits, the Emperor laid the corner-stone of a magnificent monument, and presided at the celebration of the military Mass and review which accompanied the ceremony.

In the lower house of the Reichsrath there reigns an ominous quiet, which is probably the calm before the storm. It is said the Slovenians and Social-Democrats intend acting in union to bring about the fall of the Bienerth ministry. The Hungarian ministerial crisis is not yet over, and it is rumored that an attempt will soon be made to force the Emperor-King to put an end to the provisional cabinet, and to appoint a permanent one. The difficulty will be to find a minister willing and able to lead such a cabinet in the present delicate political situation in Hungary.

The burning question of the differences between Czechs and Germans, especially in Bohemia, should in the interest of peace be promptly settled. Then there is the budget, which must make provision for raising the revenue, to meet the great expense incurred during the recent mobilization of troops on the Servian frontier. Finally comes the increase in the navy. Rumors have been widely spread that Austria contemplates the construction of sixteen Dreadnoughts, but this has no official foundation. Three or four battleships of this type will in all probability soon be built. Indeed it does not seem as if the ministry would dare to propose four times this number of ships, as it has assured the people that the total military expenditure it has in view would not exceed the cost of the number of Dreadnoughts rumored, and this expenditure includes both land and sea defenses.

The rumors of the proposed increase in naval armament caused considerable uneasiness in Italy. In a recent sketch of the situation Admiral Count Montecuccoli showed that Italy need have no fear on this score from Austria, as at the end of 1909 the Italian navy would be very considerably superior to that of Austria in the number of battleships, cruisers, speed and armament, as well as in offensive power. In regard to the latter, in fact, it would be three times as powerful. It is pointed out also that any increase of Austria's naval strength must be favorable also to Italy, since both, as members of the Triple Alliance, have common interests in the Mediterranean.

Some Irish Affairs

DUBLIN, JUNE 5.

On the occasion of the blessing of the new mortuary chapel attached to the Church of St. Andrew, Westland Row, Dublin, on the last Sunday of May, the Most Rev. Dr. Walsh, Archbishop, in his address referred to the wonderful progress made in providing school accommodation in the city and throughout his diocese. Within the period from 1886 to 1895 no fewer than forty-three schools had been built and many others enlarged, whilst from the last date six additional schools had been erected—making a total of almost fifty schools within twenty-three years. "This," said His Grace, "was no mean tribute to the zeal of the people against whom the taunt had been leveled that they could find money for everything but for education."

Cardinal Logue, during his recent visit to Derry to preside at the reopening of Long Tower Church, made an interesting reference to the Budget, when replying to an address presented to him by the priests and people of the city. His Eminence describes the increased taxation as the heaviest hand laid by the English Government on Ireland for many years. "For all the years," said the Cardinal, "that the agitation for Home Rule has been going on, we have not had a stronger argument for Home Rule than that presented by the present Budget. In itself it would be sufficient for me, if I were not a Home Ruler up to the present, to become one. The country will never go forward until we have the shaping of our own destinies in our own hands. We will pay only what is due. We will not permit extortioners to come upon us."

The erection of the memorial bust to the poet James Clarence Mangan which has been placed in St. Stephen's Green, is mainly due to the efforts of the National Literary Society, and will serve to recall the memory of one of Ireland's most gifted sons, and will, it may be hoped, awaken a greater interest in the beautiful poetry of the sad and gentle bard. Born in 1803, Mangan's whole life may be said to have been spent in his native city of Dublin, where he died in 1849. While his education advantages were limited, owing to the personal circumstances of his life, he nevertheless acquired a knowledge of many languages, and from the poetry of other countries he derived much of that peculiar, weird fascination which tinges so many of his verses. Mangan's translations from the German constitute some of his best work. In his luminous Irish translations he was, however, aided by his friends O'Donovan and O'Daly. One of his most touching laments was written on a lover who proved false, which commenced with the lines "I saw her once a little while, and then no more." "My Dark Rosaleen" is the best known of his lyrics. The reading or study of his works, in latter days, has not had the appreciation or attention due to their merit. In 1849 the cholera raged in Dublin, and numbered poor Mangan among its victims. He was attended by his friend, Father Meehan, in his last illness and died happily.

The latest organization formed for the social and economic uplifting of Ireland is the "Home Brightening Society"—the object of which is to cultivate a higher appreciation of domestic comfort in the homes, and foster a spirit of contentment with their surroundings among the agricultural classes. The society originated in the County Wexford which has already given the rest of the country useful examples of what might be accomplished by well-directed local efforts for the betterment of the population in rural districts.

Letters to the Editor

Like many excellent titles this is often a misnomer. Letters so addressed are as a rule meant less for the Editor than for some one else, who has already sent him a letter also intended for some one else more than for himself. It is a pleasant way of airing one's news and expressing one's sentiments, with the assurance that some one will notice them and perhaps reply. At times the letters are a safety valve to overcharged brain or excited nerve; at others they are a stimulus to quicken the mental activity or sensitiveness of those who are indolent or indifferent. When considering the advisability of opening our columns to this correspondence, we were warned that it might prove to be a dangerous experiment; that it would bring down upon us crank and theorist and lobbyist; that too often the exchange of views would not be amicable, and even, as in other periodicals, terminate in bitter and fruitless controversy. On our part we do not regard this open forum in the light of an experiment; in our view it was to be or not to be, and to be permanent, if at all. We had the advantage over other editors, when planning a new periodical, that we knew our audience, and could rely upon them to write on topics of actual interest, to display good taste, and to observe the urbanities even in the most lively controversy. Moreover, we reserved to ourselves to insert or publish letters. In placing space at the disposal of correspondents we kept in view that the reader, as well as the writer of letters, should be considered, and that he would look to us to spare him the infliction of correspondence that might be in the slightest degree unscholarly, insincere or ill-tempered. It is already apparent that we were correct in our appreciation of our writers of letters to the Editor. It is also apparent that this department of AMERICA is destined to grow and to become an important factor of its influence. Views which the editors might not excogitate, or which they do not consider ripe for editorial expression; opinions with which they may not wholly agree, proposed, of course, with due deference to the opinions of others, and always in open questions; suggestions, informations, counsels, even exhortations—all these, and other sources of topics offer a vast range and variety of topics for "Letters to the Editor," which will keep editor and readers in close touch and be a means of bringing thousands together in harmony with what AMERICA represents.

The Carnegie Foundation

Shall we come to have a self-constituted critic and arbiter of educational methods and means? The announcement some years ago that Mr. Carnegie had set aside a considerable part of his millions to establish the Foundation for the Improvement of Teaching in the United States was received with general approval. Here and there a dissentient voice, it is true, sounded a note of warning.

Might there not be danger in the foundation to the freedom and independence necessary for the development of educational systems among us? Might not the lure of a possible share in the material advantages of the foundation lead men to forget or to put aside certain cardinal principles which had hitherto made for good in the building up of our institutions of learning? Might not the dominant influence of the educational trust, likely to grow out of the foundation, create a monopoly destructive of the emulation which had wrought such excellent results in educational work throughout the country?

The popular acclamation, however, paid little heed to what it considered a baseless fear. The function of the Foundation was chiefly to add to the efficiency of instruction in the class of institutions to which it was limited by giving pensions to professors who had grown old in the service of their college or university, thus enabling them to retire while their places could be filled by younger men. And surely there was room for such a beneficent institution to stand as an honorable almoner toward men who had served their country and their generation well, but whose usefulness had been impaired with advancing years.

Still as time runs on the Foundation gives evidence of its power to go beyond this beneficent purpose and to play another and not quite so agreeable a rôle in the educational world. First we had the putting forward of seeming subterfuges on the part of academic bodies here and there by which to divest themselves of the denominational character which barred them from sharing in the benefits of the fund. And the dissentients, recognizing the good achieved by the so-called small colleges of the country, the outgrowth of the striving of religious bodies in educational work, saw in these subterfuges the first clear evidence of the dominant influence of the Foundation which they had feared. Then came the dropping of George Washington University from the list of benefactions, and the reported criticism of New York University, Columbia and Harvard. Holding the purse-strings, does the Carnegie Foundation mean to discipline and rule the institutions it would patronize?

True, the claim is made that the action taken proceeds from a desire to raise the standard of American education. But it is not too late to insist upon a truth which is not unknown even to the strongest advocates of a rigid "credit system" in educational work—the truth, namely, that the cultural value of the system is not always to be absolutely accepted. Strict requirements for college entrance may and should be laid down, but in every instance a certain flexibility in the following out of rule must be granted lest we unfairly close to deserving students an opportunity for training in college or university to which their ability and ambition call them.

Certain features of the iron-clad ruling of the Carnegie Foundation in this regard do not commend themselves to men who have grown gray in the service of their fellow-men in our educational institutions; and they, it is, who are beginning to openly ask—Shall we accept the Carnegie Foundation as a self-constituted critic and arbiter of educational methods and means?

The Church and the Separation Law in France

Persecution has taken on a new phase in France. During the recent celebrations in honor of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc, Premier Clemenceau is said to have exclaimed: "Let the Bishops beware! The Separation Law has not freed them." That threat is now being executed. On June 16, five nuns were brought before the Courts in Cambrai charged with forming a "Congregation" as forbidden by law. The nuns were acting as nurses in the private hospital conducted by Doctors Depoutre and Jacomez at Cambrai. A few days ago Bishop Laurens of Cahors and ten of his priests were summoned under charges arising out of the Separation Law; and now it is the turn of Cardinal Andrieu of Bordeaux.

According to the despatches the Cardinal was charged with having in a sermon incited his hearers to disobey the law. Contrary to the press despatches he did not refuse to appear in court. On entering he was acclaimed with enthusiasm by an immense crowd. Addressing the court, he is reported to have said that his presence was merely an act of courtesy, and must not be taken as an acknowledgment on his part of the court's competency to cite him under the circumstances. What he had said, he said as Bishop, and was answerable for it only to his conscience, the Pope, and his God. He took full responsibility for the words he used against the laws of the Republic which interfere with the free exercise of religion.

It would seem that the words in the Cardinal's sermon which gave umbrage to the Government, are as follows:

"To Cæsarism we shall answer with the Apostles: non possumus. Laws cannot compel consciences; and when laws are opposed to the most sacred and vital interests of the church and the family life, not only is it our right but our duty to disobey them."

Cardinal Andrieu has written a letter explaining that he cannot appear in court again, adding: "The moment a law is condemned by the Pope, the supreme guardian of morality, as inimical to the freedom of the Church, such a law has no binding force for Catholics."

The law in question, our readers will recall, is the Separation Law, which was not only a breach of the solemn compact between the French Government and the Holy See, but also an act of spoliation of Church property and funds. While the State observed its part in the contract, the Church authorities used other means of prevailing upon the Government to avoid unjust legislation and refrained from public denunciation of civil measures or policies. Now that the relations are severed, they have no other means of redress except freedom of speech.

Blasting the Rock of Ages

Mr. Bolce's now famous articles, "Blasting at the Rock of Ages," with their astounding revelations, leads to one conclusion: that many of our large secular universities are undermining the morality as well as the faith of those attending certain lecture courses in their halls. Granting that no accusation was made by the writer, whose honesty and accuracy have not been impeached, against any Catholic college or university, the safer places to send students are those seats of learning conducted under Catholic auspices, where the decalogue is not regarded as ancien régime or relegated to the musty background of practical life.

Without a farthing of assistance from the State, and, in most cases, laboring under a burden of debt, our Catholic institutions offer as a rule courses in no way inferior to the secular universities with their large endowments and yearly State appropriations.

What effect will these Bolce revelations eventually produce? What influence will these disclosures of the unwholesome conditions of secular institutions of learning have upon our wealthy Catholics? Never was there a better opportunity for public-spirited men of our faith of large means to advance the cause of righteousness and truth than at the present. A few generous endowments of our Catholic universities would be a practical protest against the semi-paganism of the times.

Routt College of Illinois and Creighton University of Nebraska are the only two endowed Catholic institutions of learning in this country, and these, being relieved of the carping care of "ways and means" are going forward with leaps and bounds. Will our Catholic millionaires come forward at this crucial time?

LITERATURE

Historical Records and Studies. Volume V. Part II. 1909. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

The editor is to be congratulated on this valuable number of the "Historical Records and Studies." For the interest and variety of its contents as well as for the value of the different contributions, the present volume is far in the lead of any previous issue.

The sketch of Governor Edward Kavanagh, by Mgr. Charles W. Collins, of Portland, Me., is a scholarly and appreciative study of the career of the first Catholic Governor in the United States. Governor Kavanagh was deemed "one of the most modest as well as one of the ablest men of Maine." The Catholics of his native state are indebted to his able pleading for the adoption by its Constitutional Convention, in 1819, of the clause providing that no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any of the State offices or trusts. Twice elected member of Congress, he was appointed by President Jackson Chargé d'Affaires in Lisbon, negotiating successfully what were probably the first claims that Portugal ever paid the United States. On his return to Maine, Mr. Kavanagh was elected to the State Senate, made president of that body, and in 1843, when Governor Fairfield resigned to enter the United States Senate, became acting Governor of Maine. His death occurred in 1844, shortly after he had declined the nomination as candidate for the Governorship. A careful study of the character and life-work of Edward Kavanagh leads Mgr. Collins to place him among the most distinguished sons of the Pine Tree State and "in the first rank of Catholic Americans."

The "Capuchins in America," a contribution of eighty pages, divided into six chapters, is full of interest. The writer, the Rev. Otto Jeron, O.M. Cap., was preparing a history of his Order in America, but died in 1907 before the work was completed. By way of introduction there is a sketch of the rise and development throughout the world of this famous branch of the Franciscan Order. One is surprised to learn that there are to-day more than ten thousand Capuchins, five thousand of them priests and the rest clerical students and lay brothers, distributed through fifty provinces with over seven hundred convents and hospices. During the seventeenth century the only Capuchin missionaries in North America were in Acadia, but in the eighteenth they were numerous and active in the territory then known as Louisiana. In the chapter on the Capuchins in the American Revolution, we read that of the ninety chaplains in the French fleets, which carried Rochambeau's army to these shores and cooperated with the American land forces, twenty were Capuchins. One of these, an Irish Capuchin, Father Whelan, was the first resident priest and the founder of old St. Peter's, the first Catholic church in New York.

The story of the expulsion of the Capuchins from Guatemala in 1872 reads like a romance. Thirty-nine helpers and unoffending religious of the Order were with only an hour's warning hurried by night from their monastery and led by brutal soldiers an eight days' journey to Champerico where they were put on a steamer and carried to California. Eighteen were welcomed and for ten weeks hospitably entertained by the Sons of St. Ignatius, at their college in San Francisco, and twenty-one at the College of Santa Clara. The whirligig of time brings in its opportunities as well as its revenges, and this was the first time the North American Jesuits were able to make a return in kind to the Capuchins for charity to their brethren at the time of the suppression of the Society of Jesus in the Spanish dominions. The Capuchins of New Orleans had at that time received the banished Jesuits with every mark of sympathy and affection and had obtained a house adjoining their own to shelter the exiles. A few days after they were received at the Jesuit house of Santa Clara, eight of the Capuchins pronounced their solemn vows, among them Father Joseph Calasanz, now the well-known Cardinal Vives y Tuto. Nothing perhaps has ever done more to strengthen the bond of fellowship between the two Orders than this sojourn of the Capuchins with the Jesuits of California. The Superior of the exiles in a letter written at the time tells the Father General of the Capuchins that "they (the Jesuits) have acted towards us as if each Capuchin were a Jesuit; verily we are encircled with mercy and love."

The other contributions to this volume are all of a high order of merit though obviously of varying interest. There is a further and final installment of unpublished letters of that prolific letter writer, Father de Smet, S.J., a sketch too of the Rev. John Kelly, pastor of St. Peter's Church, Jersey City, from 1843 to 1846, written with the personal touch that always charms, by the Rev. Dr. Brann. "The Catholic Bar of New York from 1808, to 1908," by Edward J. Maguire, A.M., links the illustrious names of O'Connor, McKeon, the two Bradys, Glover, Bliss and others, with eminent Catholic jurists of the day. The present paper only whets one's appetite for more; it would serve admirably as an introduction to a series of papers on the respective careers of these and other illustrious Catholics of the bench and bar.

The recent action of the United States Government in making a Monument Reserve of the site where the remains of Father Aulneau, S.J., young De la Verendrye, son of the discoverer of the Red River valley, and nineteen companions were massacred by the Sioux in 1736, directs attention to the importance of having a permanent and authentic record of the discovery. Father Paquin, S.J., a member of the successful exploring party, writes the account and furnishes a map and photographs.

These are some of the treasures in the three hundred pages of lore in the "Historical Records and Studies." The pen of the distinguished editor, Dr. Chas. G. Herbermann, is as active as ever. He furnishes appreciative reviews of Father Campbell's "Pioneer Priests of North America," of the "Life and Letters of Henry Van Rensselaer, S.J.," and of the "History of the Society of Jesus in North America," by Rev. Thomas Hughes, S.J. A masterly sketch by the same hand pays beautiful tribute to the memory of the late M. Hugh Kelly. The fine portraits of the editor, of Mr. Hugh Kelly and Governor Kavanagh, add to the attractiveness of the publication. The volume before us is the best possible proof of the need of these publications. While serving as a stimulus to editor and contributors to continue their labors it should make strong appeal to all Catholics who are interested in the doings of their brethren to add their names to the roll of subscribers. The Great Problem. A Sermon for Every Sunday and Feast Day. By J. J. BURKE. St. Louis, Mo.: M. Herder.

Books of sermons may answer two purposes: they may afford the faithful wholesome reading and supply hard-worked priests with ready-made discourses to their congregations. The work here noticed appears to suit both these objects. For pious reading we find in it copious, sound Catholic doctrine, and warm-hearted exhortation, uttered in a racy style which is apt to command attention and secure a favorable hearing. Many a pastor, too, will find this spiritual food suitable to feed his own flock; for most of our churches are attended by honest, plain and common sense worshipers, who are pleased to hear the truths of religion clearly stated and their duties forcibly explained.

Literary Notes

Ireland and Her People: A Library of Irish Biography. Edited by T. W. H. FITZGERALD. Vol I. Chicago: Fitzgerald Bros.

This is a substantial octavo volume well printed, bound and illustrated, containing the biographies of some three hundred men and women of Ireland, distinguished in many lands and ages, and by a great variety of accomplishments. At first there appears to be no order in their selection, but an accompanying slip explains that the editor has made grouping of character, and not the alphabet, the principle of coordination. He also aims at "making the lives of our race illustrate noteworthy epochs of Irish, European and American history, especially in connection with great political, social and industrial developments." Vol. I is to be followed by ten or twelve others, containing 4,000 lives of natives of Ireland and 4,000 of Irish origin; also an historical dictionary, explanatory notes and an alphabetical and classified index. The present volume has a thoroughness and a universality of character that the writer has not observed in any similar work. The subjects are apparently selected for distinguished accomplishment only, whether their views were in accordance with general Irish sentiment or not. Their biographies are records of facts and not panegyrics, and the whole world is ransacked to find the men and the facts. Covering every department of human endeavor,—war, art literature, statesmanship, theology, commerce, science,—every or any page is interesting and instructive. If the succeeding volumes are completed on the same principle, they should form a hitherto unparalleled encyclopedia of Irish biography.

Graduale Romanum. Editio Ratisbonensis juxta Vaticanam. New York. 926 pp. Price $1.80. F. Pustet & Co.

The volume presents the complete Graduale and Ordinarium Missae in Gregorian notation, without rhythmical signs, and altogether in strictest conformity with the official Vatican edition. The beautiful vignettes scattered through it give it a pleasing, artistic finish. The binding is neat and strong; hence well adapted to stand the rough usage to which the "Graduale" is liable to be subjected. We sincerely hope that the present edition will influence many to heed the earnest injunction of the Holy Father, in virtue of which this new version of the chant is "is to be introduced in all churches without delay, and to the exclusion of all other forms heretofore still temporarily tolerated."

For practical purposes it might be desirable to have the "Proprium," special to each diocese or religious order, appended to the volume; while, for the same reason a considerable number of feasts that form a part of the complete "Graduale," but never occur in our Calendar, might profitably be eliminated. This need will, we trust, soon be provided for by the publication of the various "Propria," as well as a good "Epitome ex Graduali Romano," which, we are informed, is already in preparation.

In a review of the Hibbert Lectures delivered by Professor William James and published under the title of "A Pluralistic Universe," the Athenaeum compliments the lecturer on the cleverness or adroitness with which he addressed himself to a two-fold task, a discussion of Theism and a criticism of Absolutism. "With consummate art," says the reviewer, "the lecturer weaves a double thread right through the texture of his discourse"; and again, "Prof. James rejoices in categories of homely brand. In a former work minds were classed as tender or tough. Here we have philosophies distinguished as thin or thick . . . Prof. James does all he can to make us feel the thickness of reality." How far the Professor succeeds in his self-appointed task may be reasonably inferred from the words with which he concludes, ". . . the drift of all the evidence we have seems to me to sweep very strongly towards the belief in some form of superhuman life with which we may, unknown to ourselves, be co-conscious. We may be in the universe as dogs and cats are in our libraries, seeing the books and hearing the conversation, but having no inkling of the meaning of it all." The plight of Plato following the light of unaided reason and yet groping about in the circumambient darkness of paganism is a thousand times less pitiable than that of the modern philosopher who, like Prof. James, of Harvard, deliberately shuts his eyes to the light of revelation, thus sinning against reason, and blindly sets himself the task of solving the riddle of the universe. It is the blind leading the blind.

In a study on the unity of style in St. Mark's, Venice, in Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, Father Beissel thinks that it is hypercriticism to find fault with the variety represented in this wonderful building, a hypercriticism which unfortunately has wrought so much havoc in many ancient churches of Europe. The Catholic Church expresses the vicissitudes of its history, which accommodates itself to the views and ways of the different periods, and yet there is unity. "Let us leave to the temples of God the impress of the centuries which is their charter of nobility," he says.—Concluding his researches on the second sight, which is attributed to the mountaineers of Scotland and the Tyrol and the natives of Westphalia, Father Bessmer accounts for most of the phenomena as "divinations condensed into pictures under the influence of racial properties and physical morbid affections; in some cases telepathy with the usual restrictions must be resorted to."—A more general use of the lightning rod, the advantage of which is beyond question, is advocated by Father Dressel. The heavy expenses, e. g., formerly required to repair the ever recurring damage in the Cathedral of Strassburg, were stopped by the installation of a lightning rod. On the other hand, the relative frequency of lightning strokes in Germany has doubled and in many places trebled.—The Rev. Eric Wassmann concludes his articles on "Haeckel's old and new researches on the problem of Man."

In the Tablet, May 29, Father Thurston continues his examination of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius. The admitted facts are: The two sealed phials containing the blood serve as a non-conductor to heat. The liquefaction takes place at all temperatures, often more quickly at a lower than a higher; yet while the blood almost invariably liquefies at the seventeen expositions from May to September, the liquefaction has been realized on December 26 only thirty-seven times in the nineteenth century. But temperature cannot account for it; in 1906 the hard substance liquefied at 41 deg. Fahr. Experiments, though not conclusive, tend to show that this substance is real blood. It sometimes bubbles during the liquefaction and expands to varying extents, the hard black substance becoming red. The most extraordinary effect of all is that it weighs considerably more when liquefied and the weight also varies, bearing no relation to the increase or diminution of volume. As the phial is hermetically sealed, this setting aside of the laws of gravity (once to the extent of 27 grammes) defies scientific explanation. Science has studied it from every angle, and presents no satisfactory alternative to the simple theory of the faithful who ask God for a miracle and get it.

The June Book News of Benziger's Brothers announces that the publishers have offered one hundred dollars in prizes for the best critique or review of "The Son of Siro," the popular novel published some months ago by Rev. J. E. Copus, S.J. In the success this splendid tale has won. Father Copus does not mean to forget his earlier friends. Another juvenile story, "The Making of Mortlake," is to be published by him within the next few weeks.

SOCIOLOGY

The Slovenians of Carniola and adjoining parts of Carinthia, Styria and the Litorale, who number about one and a quarter million peasants and tradesmen, mostly very poor, have been very active socially and politically during the last fifteen years. They are under the leadership of the Bishops of Veglia and Laibach together with the parliamentarian, Ivan Sustersitsch, an able lawyer, and Rev. Janez Keek, professor of philosophy at Laibach. From the first these leaders directed their attention to the temporal needs of the people. About six hundred Raiffeisen banks and similar societies were started and united into one "Cooperative Federation" which in the year 1908 transacted business amounting to four million dollars, a very large sum for a comparatively poor people. The activity of this federation put an end to usury and the forced sale of property. Another association, the "Economic Union," serves as a clearing house of commercial enterprises. In 1908 its business amounted to three million dollars.

To promote popular education some four hundred "Educational Societies" have been formed. Under the auspices of these societies courses in English, Italian, German and French are arranged. Weekly lectures are given from October to Easter. In the city of Laibach which has only 40,000 inhabitants, these societies count nearly 4,000 members. The "Christian Trade Unions" have become a power; most of the laborers in the weaving factories are organized as well as all those of the straw and paper industries which are of paramount importance for the country. But the most flourishing is the Christian tobacco workers' union.

The success of the Slovenians in the line of organization has attracted so much attention that students of sociology from other countries are studying Slovenian methods.

In a recent lecture before the Manchester branch of the Catholic Truth Society, Father Buckland, S.J., Superior of the House of Retreats, at Compstall, England, gave an account of the first year's work. Results have surpassed even the most sanguine expectations, both as regards numbers and the spiritual fruit derived from the retreats. There have been 17 retreats, for which over 320 men applied, and at which 283 actually assisted. The numbers might have been larger but present accommodations are limited. The men were recruited from all the large towns of Lancashire and also from places still further afield. A railway journey of a hundred or even two hundred miles has been considered no sufficient obstacle in the case of many. Applications even came from Scotland and Ireland. The men have belonged to almost every conceivable variety of occupation and have represented all ages, from the lad of sixteen to the veteran of seventy-six, though these differences were forgotten at Compstall where the bond of common faith bound all together.

One fact in regard to those who have made the retreat at Compstall (and this applies equally well to the men in Belgium, Holland and Italy) is that they always express their intention of returning in succeeding years. This shows what an impression has been made for good. A number of grateful letters from workingmen who have made the retreat have been received by Father Buckland, who has found great encouragement in them. We here give some of Father Buckland's own words as what he says is equally applicable to conditions with us: "The experience of the past year has taught me what was probably known to many before—that we have in this country and especially in the North, a large body of intelligent and active workingmen, who if they are only formed and guided, are capable of doing a vast amount towards realizing the ideal of our Holy Father, 'restoring all things in Christ.' This then is the fundamental idea of the whole scheme—the formation in every parish of a body of men thoroughly well instructed in the practice as in the theory of the Faith, full of zeal and fervor, ready at all times to act as a sort of bodyguard to the clergy; men on whom they can count in time of trial, willing to cooperate with them in all good works making for the advancement of the cause of Christ. During the months of November and December last I visited all the principal Houses of Retreat in Belgium and Holland, and made a very careful study of each one, of its methods of recruiting, of conducting the retreats, and of insuring perseverance. I also took particular notice of the classes of men who frequented these retreats—their occupations, habits, characters, education, etc. Nowhere do they get such an intelligent, well-read, and capable body of men as we can, and please God, will get in England. The results, too, that we are able already to show are better than anything I met abroad. This is particularly true in regard to the frequentation of the Sacraments. In Holland and Belgium the fathers are well satisfied if they can secure monthly Communions, whereas we have already had the happiness of making a number of our men daily communicants; many of them approach the Holy Table every week, and I think I can safely say that all the rest do so at least once a month. It is clear then that we have no lack of the very best material to work upon. Our duty is to do all we can to fashion and mould this material until we have formed a strong body of fervent, devoted, and loyal Catholics. The impetus given to the work of retreats all over Europe is due to the action of the spirit of God, who is ever guiding His Church, and providing new remedies for new ills."

This, then, is an account of the work done in England from its inception, May 21, 1903, until May 21, 1909. It is especially interesting to us as being a review of the work and its possibilities among an English-speaking people. Readers of AMERICA know the great fruit reaped in Belgium, Holland and Italy by the same means. Everywhere one meets with enthusiasm for the work, the approbation of the hierarchy and cooperation from the men. As Father Buckland remarked, it is a new remedy for new ills sent by God to defend His Church. The work has prospered on European soil, it will prosper in America if taken up with equal ardor.

The Superintendent of the New York State Prison has made a census of its 990 alien inmates which shows that, under the law, 319 of them are liable to deportation, having been convicted of felony within three years of their arrival here. He will recommend to Governor Hughes that the sentences of all such aliens, which vary from a few months to life imprisonment, be commuted in order that they may all be deported by the Federal authorities who have jurisdiction in the matter.

Of the 319 aliens subject to deportation 187 are Italians. Russia comes next with 44; Germany has 20; Austria, 19; England, 16; Canada, 8; Hungary, 7; France, 6; Switzerland, 2; Roumania, 2; Holland, 2; Ireland, 1; Sweden, 1, and Greece, 1.

A new law providing that applicants for marriage licenses must undergo medical examination as a preliminary to receiving the license went into effect in the State of Washington June 10. The only exception allowed in the law is made in the cases of women over forty-five years of age.

Officials are generally of the opinion that the new law will make the border towns of British Columbia a new Gretna Green for Americans with physical defects.

Massachusetts is taking steps towards the establishment of a pension system which will make direct State aid unnecessary. The savings-bank insurance policy, recently inaugurated, has made a good beginning, and a new measure it proposes will no doubt receive widespread recognition. This is an interesting old-age pension bill affecting the Boston and Maine Railroad, which the Massachusetts Legislature has passed at the request of both the company and its employees. The bill provides for pensions to be supplied by equal contributions from employer and employees, the former to make up any deficiency if the joint payment falls short of $200, the minimum sum. An additional contribution to meet the needs of those already advanced in years is promised by the company, and a system of annuities to be voluntarily purchased by employees is arranged for, to eke out the pension.

The management of the pension system will rest with a board of trustees made up of representatives of the railroad and of its employees, and it is to be put into effect only after its adoption by a two-thirds vote of the employees. The State enters into the scheme by the aid it lends in supervising the execution of the plan and by exempting from all taxation the funds which are to be guarded by both the insurance commissioner and the State actuary. Once accepted and established the scheme creates legal rights binding all of the 27,000 employees of the railway as well as the railway corporation.

Economists who have given some attention to the pension system above outlined see a great advantage in that it secures obligatory contributions both from the railroad and the employees by laudable democratic methods. No doubt success in the plan will open a way to some similar scheme to include accident insurance and sick benefits. A praiseworthy feature of the experiment will be found in the fact that, while the employee acquires a legal right to the pension, he loses this right if he ceases to remain in the employ of the company. Of course, in this case there is paid to him an amount at least equal to the sum of his own contributions. The pension thus depending on his continued service with the company makes for length of service and should have a reasonably deterrent effect upon agitators who seek to adjust disputes by strikes rather than by arbitration.

A bit of social legislation enacted in the last session of the New York Legislature and approved by the Governor, is worthy of the attention of law-making bodies in other States. It is a bill licensing and regulating dancing academies. The common experience that halls of such academies rented for dances on nights when the schools do not require their use are apt to take on an undesirable character, makes one provision of the bill especially praiseworthy. This enacts that premises which are licensed for dances must maintain the regulations at all times and not only when they are used as dancing academies. The principal features of the bill are the inspection as to safety of construction and the prohibition of the sale of liquor in the dancing academy or in any room connected with it on the same floor.

A praiseworthy feature of the good work done by the members of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in New York is the effort made to secure a summer outing for the children of the tenements and their tired mothers and for working girls. Last summer 2,467 poor children of the tenements enjoyed a delightful two weeks' outing, and during the year 453 overworked mothers and self-supporting girls found needed rest and recuperation on the Society's Fresh-Air Farm at Spring Valley in the Ramapo Hills. This year the society hopes to increase the work. The Sisters of Mercy, in charge of the settlement, will open the farm to the society's beneficiaries on June 16, and the Vincentians have sent out a plea for help to make their efforts for the pale-faced children and tired mothers and friendless girls a record-breaking success.

Apropos of the correspondence from Louvain printed in AMERICA of June 5, it will be interesting to know that the Bavarian Railroad Administration has expended not less than five million dollars to provide its employees with small plots of land and houses. Nearly 14,000 workmen received these small farms and 12,000 houses were granted. There are thirty-seven cooperative building associations among the railroad men.

Governor Hughes, of New York, has taken another important step in the State-wide campaign against tuberculosis by signing a bill lately passed in the Legislature to amend the general County Law by inserting several new sections. These confer authority upon the Board of Supervisors of any county, by a majority vote, to establish a county hospital for the care and treatment of persons suffering from tuberculosis. The unique feature of the bill is its provision for admission without delay of any person found to be suffering from this disease irrespective of his ability to pay for his care and treatment. If it is later found that a patient is able to pay, he is required to meet the regular per capita cost of maintenance. The act provides also for the admission of pay patients outside of the county. An important feature of the bill is that which permits the erection of such hospitals on grounds not connected with the county almshouse.

ECONOMICS

The popularity of American manufactures abroad is illustrated by the detailed export tables of the Bureau of Statistics, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, just published as a part of its volume, "Commerce and Navigation of the United States." These tables show the principal articles exported and in detail the various countries to which they are sent.

In the case of agricultural machinery, for example, principally mowers and reapers, it is interesting to note that no less than seventy-five countries and colonies are named as the destination of this class of our manufactures exported. Russia is the largest purchaser, the value of such machinery exported to that country in 1908 being over three million dollars. American billiard balls, which one would scarcely expect to see as an export, went to sixteen countries. American stove polish contributed in 1908 to the happiness of housewives in thirteen countries and colonies. American candles light homes in more than forty countries of the world. Nearly five million dollars' worth of American automobiles went to fifty countries and colonies. Street railway cars, to the value of two and one-quarter million dollars, were exported to more than fifty countries. American bicycles are in demand in sixty countries, American baking powder in forty countries, American washing powder is in use in fifty countries, while American watches and clocks worth three million dollars were sent out to seventy-five countries. American cotton cloths are in demand in seventy lands, and five million dollars' worth of American binder twine went to a like number of countries.

An interesting list, and one which shows a notable distribution of American products, whilst necessarily mentioning in this detail but a small portion of the American manufactures exported.

The "Annual Return of the Foreign Trade of the Empire of Japan for 1908," just issued by the government of that country, presents interesting statistics of the trade relations subsisting between the United States and the Mikado's people. According to the report the imports from the United States in that year were valued at thirty-nine million dollars, being 17.8 of the total imports into that country. A comparison of the figures with those of former years shows that the value of merchandise sent into Japan from the United States exceeded that of any earlier year except 1907 and 1905. In this latter year, the closing year of the Russo-Japanese War, imports into the Empire were abnormally heavy.

The active rivalry of the various commercial nations for participation in the trade of Japan is recognized from the details of the return. Wheat and flour, petroleum and its products, raw cotton and printing paper are among the strong staples exported from this country; in iron and steel manufactures the products of the United States hold a high place, too, but Great Britain, Germany and Belgium are in this line of commodities active competitors and in many cases they supply greater quantities than does this country.

Exports to the United States from Japan exceed in most cases the imports from this country, the exports to the United States in 1908 being valued at sixty-one million dollars against thirty-nine millions of imports.

Figures drawn from Canadian official publications recently received by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor show that merchandise from the United States forms a steadily increasing share of the imports of Canada. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1909, merchandise from the United States formed 60.4 per cent. of the total imports into Canada, the share of her imports from Great Britain during the same time marks the continuance of the steady decline that has been noted for years, it being last year but 23.69 per cent. of the total.

Manufactures form naturally a large share of the merchandise drawn from the United States by the people of Canada, since the natural products of the two countries are to a large extent similar and the manufacturing industry in the United States now exceeds in total output any country in the world. In 1907, the latest year for which statistics in this detail are available, manufactured goods made up 59.5 per cent. of the total imports into the Dominion from this country. The value of these manufactures imported from the States was eighty-nine millions, as against fifty-four millions imported from Great Britain. The principal articles of import, as learned from the Canadian report, in the order named were: Manufactures, mineral produce, agricultural produce, animals and their produce, forest produce and fishery produce.

A gradual, though not uniform, improvement in the industrial and traffic situation of the United States is indicated by the leading commercial movements for April, as reported to the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor. The coal, textile, and shoe trades show a considerable upward trend from the depressed condition prevailing during the early part of 1908. Movements of live stock, provisions, and grain, on the other hand, suffered a considerable check. Building operations maintained the high record characteristic of the earlier months. The traffic situation, as measured by the number of cars handled by various traffic associations, also shows a turn for the better, though the April figures for the current year are almost 10 per cent. below those reported two years ago.

Under the caption "A Trust Haltered," in an editorial of its issue of June 9, the New York Evening Post sketches the recent history of the experience of the Sugar Trust in the United States courts. After describing in some detail the incidents of the closing of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refinery by the trust, commenting on the compromise by which the trust evaded the consequences of a public exposure of its methods, the Evening Post writer has this to say:

"We have dwelt upon the case because it is typical of the kind of business immorality which made the public accept Lawson's combinations of fact and fiction as unvarnished truths, gave rise to the recent bitter outburst against large corporations, and created for Mr. Roosevelt the opportunity, of which he so readily and skilfully availed himself, of becoming the champion of the people against corporation corruption. We confess to being extremely tired of hearing corporation managers blame politicians for the hard times they have been having. The responsibility is theirs, and theirs alone. So long as the history of the Standard Oil exists, so long as this story of the Sugar Trust remains a written record, the public will believe that the crusaders of the last few years had the right on their side, however crude and mistaken their methods. But we feel almost like apologizing to the Standard Oil for connecting it with the Sugar Trust in any way. Can any other concern have sunk to quite such depths of baseness? It cheated, like the lowest greengrocer, with fraudulent scales; it knocked out a competitor by a low trick. It merits and will receive the contempt of the country."

A woman in Kansas who held a commission as notary public married, and wanting to know if she could still act as notary under the appointment made out in her maiden name asked the Attorney General of the State for a formal opinion on the question. The Attorney General held that she could, but remarked that since she was now married she should drop the notary public business and attend to her household duties. His interpretation of the law was as follows: "The taking of the name of the husband by the wife seems to be a matter wholly of custom and not law, a general custom that has prevailed for centuries."

ART

Whether by coincidence, or of set purpose, on March 29th, anniversary of the birth and death of Raphael, Pius X opened the new picture gallery in the Vatican Palace. The old gallery, or Pinacoteca, as it was always called, was neither one of the largest, nor one of the most important in Rome. It was far beneath the Vatican sculptures in importance; yet it contained the "Madonna di Foligno," "The Transfiguration," and "The Last Communion of St. Jerome." For one thing the galleries were poorly lighted, the pictures ill-arranged and in many of them overcrowded in the few rooms they occupied.

Pius X, who in his unobtrusive way, without flare of trumpets, is mindful of many things besides modernism and French difficulties, has paid attention to the art-treasures which are his appanage. It was a surprise to many to find that by his wishes certain rare illuminated volumes in the library were being facsimiled for the first time; that by his wish an account of the ivories of the museum was printed and circulated; that by his orders plates were made of the frescoes in the Sale delle Nozze Aldobrandine; in fact, that he was quietly putting within reach of art students and scholars many things hitherto unattainable.

The new gallery was a radical, important and much needed repristination. Historically, the Pinacoteca began with a collection formed by Pius VI; it was looted by the French troops under Napoleon and one hundred pictures belonging to Rome and the Holy See were added to the hundred and fifteen taken from various cities of the Pontifical states. All these went to the Louvre. The Congress of Vienna demanded their restitution; it was made—in part. Rome recovered seventy-seven pictures only, but they were of great value. Placed at first in the Borgia apartments they were moved in 1822 to the third story of the Loggie (appartamento Gregorio XIII); under Gregory XVI to the Galleria degli Arazzi; then to the Galleria Pia, where the modern paintings now are; and in 1857 back to the quarters of Gregory XIII where they remained until the present in imminent danger of fire and leakage from the roof.

It was resolved to remove them for safety to the ground floor and put in order for their reception the vast space used for the storing of the old Pontifical state-coaches and traveling-carriages, quaint and picturesque relics of by-gone days. A section of the Floreria was included; and while Comm. Sneider, the architect, was engaged upon the restoration Prof. Seitz, Director of the Pinacoteca, was entrusted with the gathering of the pictures. It seems strange that the handsome, courtly, middle-aged artist we knew as Young Seitz—to distinguish him from this queer old painter's father with his Oriental dress and theories on the Christian art he practised so faithfully—should have done his work and not seen its completion. To enlarge the collection, he asked for the primitives of the library, the best pictures from the Lateran Palace, and a number of canvases unknown to the public because scattered throughout inner halls of the Vatican. Having obtained them, poor Seitz, beloved and esteemed, was called to the "metam unam." His assistant, the young historian of art, Prof. d'Achiaroli, was left alone with the responsibility. Questions will arise in one's mind as to why this and that arrangement, and why this and that classification; but the workers have all vouched that they did their best, according to circumstances, having had to face innumerable grave problems of co-ordination, harmony, space, lighting, etc. On the whole, there can be no question that the general result is splendid and satisfying.

The new gallery lies (those familiar with the buildings will quickly recognize the spot) on your right-hand as, skirting the palace, you ascend the steep hill towards the Sculpture Gallery, with the wall of the Vatican gardens on your left. The halls lie in a straight line one beyond the other along the street, but the windows looking to it have been closed and opposite them, the arches perforated so that the gallery is lighted from the inner side, east, namely, from Bramante's Cortile Belvedere. The entrance is directly from the street, the vestibule occupying about the middle of the gallery, three rooms to your left, north; four to your right. Beyond these latter (south) is a long store-room containing some hundred and twenty pictures of minor importance; and again, beyond that, the Chapel of Pius V. But at present the gallery ends at Room IV, with its culminating Raphaels.

The decorations are simple and artistic. The vaulted ceilings have delicate stucco ornaments in Renaissance style, designed by Comm. Sneider, the pontifical arms in the centre; the doors, marble frames with the name of Pius X in the lintel. Walls are covered with a subdued shade of olive watered silk, meeting the walnut wainscoting, and the new floors are parquet. In the entrance stands a good bust of His Holiness by the German sculptor, Seeboeck; other pieces of decorative sculpture occupy the centre of the rooms.

As to the pictures proper, the first hall is dedicated to the Primitives: Sala dei Trecentisti; archaic art just issuing from the Byzantine, almost entirely an addition to the old gallery—Dante's contemporaries whom he admired so much, though we turn up our noses at their stiff comeliness. Bologna, Hardy Siena, and Florence are represented. Giotto, Margaritone d'Arezzo, the Lorenzetti, Taddeo di Bartolo, Bernardo Daddi. Quaint age in which the Madonna and saints and holy angels had many votaries: and the world was full of monks.

Room II, Sala di Melozzo (divers schools) in which Siena still paints her little narrow panels, all on gold ground and so religious, while round about the Quattro Cento, beginning in archaism is blustering with its accession of bloom and sound-limbed youth. Sano di Pietro and Giovanni di Paolo are doing ascetic solitaires; but here comes Gozzoli, dear Chaucer-like Benozzo Gozzoli, with his spring grass always full of flowers, slim boy-pages handsomely mounted, with perhaps a hawk beating wings on their wrist, and harness studded with gold. But this is not the Riccardi Palace, so Bonozzo paints sedately, though whimsically and poetically. "Our Blessed Ladye, Sent Marye, who when about to depart to the sovereign realm of heaven, did thereupon bestow her holy cincture upon the Blessed Apostle, Seint Thomas" (from the Lateran Museum). There is a "Coronation of the Virgin" by Fra. Filippo Lippi, with Olivetan monks on either side of her; a predella by Francisco Cossa, with episodes from the life of St. Hyacinth; a "Holy Family," by Garofalo and Leonardo's "St. Jerome"; yes, Leonardo, for it has grown to be his time in spite of those Sienese wood-paintings and the Fra. Angelico's at the other end of the roof. Of special historical interest is the portrait of the boy Francesco Sforza, by Bernardino de'Conti, dated 1496. The fresco which gives the room its name: "Sixtus IV founding the Vatican Library" (by Melozzo da Forlì) with the likenesses of his nephews and of Platina, the humanist, who kneels before him, this great fresco dominates the room as it did in the old Pinacoteca—with its magic of life and genius.

Room III, Sala della Scuola Umbra e Marchigiana covers the same period in another part of Italy. Beginning with Allegretto Nuzi, Gentile da Fabriano, Nicolo Alunno and Francesco Gentile we come to Pinturicchio, whose delicate and charming work is always so attractive. His Coronation of the Virgin is delightfully quattrocento. The lovely unknown "Madonna and Child" are also attributed to him. The "Assumption" of Cola dell'Amatrice is less important than the picture by Antoniazio Romanus of the "Blessed Virgin Enthroned," to the gallery, with the Auditors of the Congregation della Rota kneeling around her. A graceful "Nativity," by the Umbrian Spagna and the "Resurrection" of Perugino on which Raphael worked, complete this room.

The fourth room, Sala di Raffaello, or Tribuna, contains only six large canvases. The St. Jerome by Raphael's father, Giovanni Santi, the "Madonna with Saints," by Perugino, his master (painted for the Palazzo dei Priori, Perugia), and the rather mediocre "Coronation of the Virgin" (done after Raphael's design) by his pupil, Giulio Romano, and by Francesco Penni. The Raphael's proper are three in number, and masterpieces. First the early "Tomb and Crowning of Mary in Heaven," one of the most charming of his canvases, for the stamp of the quattrocento is upon it still and no breath of modernity has disturbed the quaint, lovely faces or stirred the stately flowers in Our Lady's tomb. Next comes the "Madonna di Foligno," beautiful enough in all truth, but the day of archaism is spent and over. Raphael has attained maturity and this, in 1512, is contemporary art. On the end wall is the "Transfiguration," which many hold to be the master's greatest production, as it was his last.

One must retrace one's steps from the fourth room back to the vestibule and then start fresh in the opposite direction with Room V, the Venetians' Sala della Scuola Veneta. Carlo Crivelli, a "Madonna and Child," a "Pietà," dreadful in Woe; Vittore Crivelli the son, a polyptych; Mantegna, the admirable "Pietà," known as "Dead Christ and Mary Magdelene." Antonio da Murano, a large altar piece in compartments (1469), with the most delightful figures of saints in pure fifteenth century costume; the "St. George" of Paris Bordone; "Holy Family," by Bonifazio; the "Empress St. Helena," by Veronese in his sumptuous, plastic coloring; Titian, the profile portrait of the disputed "Doge," called alternately Mocenigo, Gritti, and Marcello, and the great canvas (1523) for Sta. Maria de Fratri, with its realistic, splendidly princely saints. Room VI, Sala dei Seicentisti, contains seventeenth century Italian painters of all schools. Indeed, local limitations are growing less marked, even in art; though it is great wonder that, in the early days, painters in all parts of Italy, unknown to one another, separated, their works kept at home, should yet all have seemed to follow tradition, and that Eastern, until Giotto came. Seicento painting is universal, modern, highly developed: its fault want of spontaneity, and affectedness. Domenichino triumphs easily with his "Last Communion of St. Jerome," than which it would be difficult to paint a better picture. Guido Reni's fine "Crucifixion of St. Peter" vies with the "St. Romuald" of Andrea Sacchi, two noble canvases, though there is perhaps a greater pathos in the rugged, hoary head of the Apostle, degraded, and with living eyes turned heavenward. Three subjects which used not to be in the old Pinacoteca are a graceful and devotional "Repose in the Desert" by Martha, and a "Holy Family" by Barocci; and a "Denial of St. Peter," attributed to Caravaggio in which vivid realism predominates. The "Entombment," which was in the old gallery, is unquestionably Caravaggio's own. Here, too, is Guercino's "Unbelief of St. Thomas," powerful in drawing and chiaroscuro.

Room VII, Sala degli Artisti Stranieri, the last in this wing (north), is devoted to foreign artists.

GABRIEL FRANCES POWERS.

PERSONAL

The Hon. Maurice F. Egan, American Minister to Denmark, has been designated to represent the United States at the International Conference of Arts and Literature which will be held at Copenhagen from June 21 to 25.

Very Rev. Thomas J. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University, sailed for Liverpool on the Cedric last Saturday. After a brief visit to his uncle, Canon Lynch, of Manchester, he will go to Rome to confer with the authorities there on the condition and prospects of the Catholic University.

At the general chapter of the Franciscans, held on May 28, at Assisi, Father Sixtus Lagorio, president of St. Anthony Seraphic College and Novitiate at Catskill, N. Y., was elected to the office of Definitor General, which he will hold for a term of six years. Father Sixtus is forty-four years old, and was ordained in Buffalo in 1892, since which time he has been connected successively with St. Peter's Church, Pittsburg, and St. Bonaventure's Monastery, Allegany, N. Y., where for four years he filled the chair of Professor of Philosophy.

The heroic bronze memorial bust to the philosopher, Orestes A. Brownson, will be unveiled on a site in one of the New York parks, to be yet selected, on October 12. It has been ready for several years.

Discursing of authors and books in a recent issue of The Sun, a writer stated that John Ayscough, the author of "Dromina" and "Marotz," is a bachelor and likely to remain so. Both works were recently reviewed in AMERICA. The accuracy of The Sun's statement is vouched for by the fact that "John Ayscough" is the Right Rev. Mgr. Francis Bickerstaffe-Drew, who was born in 1858, received into the Church in 1879 and ordained priest in 1884. He served for many years as army chaplain to the English troops at Plymouth and at Malta.

EDUCATION

The annual session of the Catholic Summer School will open at Cliff Haven, on Lake Champlain, New York, on June 27, and will continue until September 10.

An appropriate feature of the coming tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain, July 4 to July 10, will be the important share which the official program of the celebration concedes to the Catholic Summer School at Cliff Haven. A special effort is being made by the Champlain Assembly to interest the Catholics of the United States and of Canada in the great festivity. And rightfully so, since many of the holy and historic memories with which the Champlain valley is redolent cluster about the Bay of Cliff Haven. An elaborate program has been arranged, worthy of the significance of the occasion for the Catholics of the land; the President and Vice-President, Cardinal Gibbons and other dignitaries of the Church here and in Canada have engaged to be present at the Assembly during its impressive contribution to the nation's tribute to a leading pioneer explorer in the western hemisphere. The exercises, which will last a week, will be opened on July 4. A pontifical high Mass will be celebrated that morning on the shore of the lake by Bishop Thomas F. Hickey, of Rochester. Cardinal Gibbons will preach the sermon, and Bishop Hickey will be assisted by Bishop Burke, of Albany; Bishop Ludden, of Syracuse; Bishop Colton, of Buffalo, and Mgr. Denis J. McMahon, of this city, who is president of the Summer School. President Taft will be the guest of honor at a reception to be given by the faculty of the Summer School on the morning of July 7. Thursday, July 8, the play of "Hiawatha" will be given by 175 Algonquin Indians from Quebec. The stage for this play will be a floating island. There will be a pageant of historical floats along shore. A reception is being arranged in honor of Vice-President Sherman which will be attended by several hundred prominent Catholic laymen of the State. On Thursday and Friday the Rev. M. C. Gleeson, chaplain in the U. S. Navy, will lecture on the round-the-world trip of the American fleet in which he participated.

In its issue of June 3 the Manufacturers' Record, a southern industrial weekly published in Baltimore, makes the following vigorous plea for denominational or religious schools. "Denominational schools are essential to the best development of the educational interests of the country, and, from the primary department to the university, they should be supported with liberal contributions by the members of the several religious bodies of the country. Once established by the voluntary action of members of the respective denominations, they ought to be sustained in recognition of something more than nominal adherence to denominational tenets and as evidence of conviction that religion is an essential part of education. The province of the State as to education would then be properly bounded, and the effects of its dominant imperfection, the absence of religion from its scheme, would be kept at a minimum.

"Denominational schools properly accredited by responsible agencies within the denominations have a right to demand that the members of the denominations give them adequate support in the shape of students or by funds. That demand should be limited to no section of the country, and to no individual member, but all members should be imbued with a deep sense of obligation to give to their schools as liberally and as unostentatiously as possible. Such giving is one of the best evidences of an active faith, and is just as essential to the development of religious work as any other form of giving."

On July 31 the University of Leipzig will celebrate the five hundredth anniversary of its foundation. Very Reverend Doctor Henry Hyvernath, Professor of Oriental Languages at the Catholic University has been appointed by His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons to represent the University at the Leipzig festivities. Doctor Hyvernath is a distinguished Egyptologist, and his exhaustive article on Egypt in the fifth volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" is attracting universal attention. Doctor Hyvernath is in point of time the oldest professor at the Catholic University, and has in all parts of the United States a good number of scholarly disciples among our Catholic clergy.

A number of papers have printed a statement that there was an intention of changing the name of the popularly-styled American College in Rome. It does not seem to be known that the legal title of the institution, as enacted by a bill passed, March 18, 1886, in the General Assembly of Maryland, is "The American College of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

—The Apostolic Mission Union completed its three days' conference at the Catholic University on June 11, which resulted in steps being taken to secure practical working unity between all the forces now in process of development which aim at the conservation, extension and upbuilding of the Catholic Church in America. It was a realization of the solidarity of the missions bands which brought forth cheers when members of bands in northern States pledged themselves on the floor of the congress to put in all their spare time with the bands at work in the poor and needy South. The Rev. A. P. Doyle, rector of the Apostolic Mission House, was elected to cooperate with Rev. Dr. Francis C. Kelly, president of the Church Extension Society, in promotion of a congress of Catholic missions in Boston next year. A report on work done with the chapel car by Rev. John Handly, C.S.P., of Winchester, Tenn., was followed by appointment of a committee to secure other chapel cars. A paper on mission work among the Indians by Rev. William Ketcham, superintendent of the Bureau, resulted in a vote to place a missionary at once in the field with a tent and traveling outfit. Church Extension, through Dr. Kelly, pledged the outfit. The Apostolic Mission House pledged the missionary, and Rev. J. F. Busch, of St. Paul, subscribed $100 for the first year's salary. A masterly paper by Rev. O. A. Shyne, S.J., of Marquette University, Milwaukee, on methods of giving missions to children was followed by a resolution to incorporate his teaching in the education of all missionaries under the influence of the conference.

Warmest sympathy was extended to the Italian immigrant in appreciation of a paper by Monsignor A. Pozzi, of Trenton, N. J., who enlightened his hearers with accounts of twelve years' successful work in his diocese. Similarly the conference greeted with cordial enthusiasm a manly appeal for the negro by Rev. J. Plantvigne, of Baltimore, a gifted member of that race. Native Southerners seconded his words with fervent eloquence; and the Provincial of the Order of the Holy Spirit, Very Rev. J. T. Murphy, supported his plea with the testimony of an order which has lost five hundred priests in martyrdom on negro missions throughout the world. Rev. Martin Callahan, of Montreal, who has almost five thousand conversions to his credit, reported marvelous results among the Chinese, who are in Montreal rapidly assimilating the spirit of Catholicity. The claims of little children were further presented by Very Rev. C. A. Williams, of the Confraternity of the Holy Child, and by Very Rev. Joseph Himmel, S.J., of Georgetown University, and Father Boarman, S.J., of Chicago. Rev. L. J. Evers, of St. Andrew's, New York City, related his work among the night workers of newspaper row, outcasts of the Bowery and the prisoners of the Tombs.

Catholic affairs in the Philippines were analyzed in a sympathetic and authoritative fashion by President Taft, who addressed the conference on Wednesday evening.

Father Doyle introduced the President as "the great harmonizer," a quotation from Mrs. Stonewall Jackson. The President took for his text the words of the Holy Father, Pius X, in his conversation with Father Doyle about the work of the Missionary Union: "Non possumus edificare Ecclesiam super ruinas charitatis." The President recited the history of his mission to the Vatican and the subsequent adjustment of the friars' claims in the Philippines as an illustration of the growth of charity among separated Christians in the United States. "There were few, if any, extremists in this country," he said, "who took exception to our method of reaching a solution. I venture to say, my dear friends, that if this visit to Rome had occurred forty or fifty years before, it would have sunk any administration responsible for it." The President's tribute to Leo XIII was particularly hearty. He drew a picture of the venerable pontiff which must remain a notable appreciation of his marvelous mental and executive ability at the age of ninety-two.

Greetings were sent to the Holy Father by the conference and letters and telegrams of encouragement and approbation were sent to the conference by the Cardinal and most of the archbishops and bishops of America.

—Though on the face of the returns given in the report of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith for 1908 the Archdiocese of Boston shows a falling off of about $13,000 as compared with the preceding year, this decrease is only apparent. Formerly the Archdiocese of Boston sent, through the Lyons Society, not only the dues accruing from various forms of membership (ordinary, special and perpetual), but all gifts for foreign missions, specified and unspecified. According to The Field Afar, nearly $52,000 passed through the diocesan office for 1908, $22,000 being made up of designated gifts and other donations.

—On Sunday the Pope received in audience Mgr. Falconio, Apostolic Delegate of Washington; Archbishop Farley, of New York; Archbishop O'Connell, of Boston; Archbishop Blenk, of New Orleans, and Archbishop Seton, Titular of Heliopolis, as well as the various American bishops who have been in Rome for the golden jubilee of the American College. Mgr. Kennedy, Rector of the college, introduced the president of the Alumni Association, Dr. Wall, of New York, who delivered an address to which His Holiness responded. The Pope gave high praise to the seminary, saying that if out of 70,000,000 Americans one quarter are of the Catholic faith, it is due especially to the first missionaries of the Propaganda and to others, of whom more than 600 have been provided by the American College.

—The recent successful pilgrimage from England to the Shrine of St. James of Compostela has called attention to the pious custom that draws pilgrims every May to the Chapelle Saint Laurent, at Eu, about an hour's journey from Dieppe, France, in honor of the great Archbishop of Dublin, St. Lawrence O'Toole. The chapel is built over the spot where the saint breathed his last; his remains lie in the crypt of the old church of Notre Dame in the same town. During the time of pilgrimage the relics of St. Lawrence are exposed for nine days, and large numbers of the faithful visit the chapel to honor the illustrious bishop who died there in 1181. It is hoped now to interest Irish Catholics in this pilgrimage.

—Archbishop Bourne, of Westminster, celebrated the silver jubilee of his priesthood on June 11.

—From July 9 to July 25 there will be a pilgrimage to the great relics at Aix-la-Chapelle, which are exposed only every seventh year.

—The Archbishop of Toulouse, France, in a recent pastoral severely censures the growing abuse that has made the day of First Communion a fashionable social function rather than a solemn religious event. "First Communion day at the present time," he says, "is a half-religious, half-pagan festival by which we recognize a new phase in the life of a child—a festival to which parents and friends are invited for the purpose of rejoicing with the family, and in which, outside of a pious ceremony in the morning, there is no question of religion or of God."

Continuing, the Archbishop cites the gifts of modest rosaries formerly given, or the silver or brass crucifixes long afterward retained as souvenirs, and pertinently asks: "What do we see to-day? Between families and friends there is a vulgar display in the exchange of jewels, of objects of art destined to create a love of luxury and a taste for frivolity rather than piety and a love for God. There is a profane display of dress, moreover—costly gowns, costly jewelry, costly hats or bonnets, until the sacredness of the occasion is lost in tawdry show."

—The new chapel of St. Ignatius' College, Riverview, Sydney, Australia, admired as one of the architectural masterpieces of the Island Continent, was solemnly opened by His Eminence, Cardinal Moran, on the 23d ult.

—Through the generosity of the Rev. Thomas P. McLaughlin, of New Rochelle, N. Y., who contributed to the building fund the purse of $3,500 given on the occasion of his recent silver jubilee, a chapel is to be built for the use of the soldiers stationed at Fort Slocum. The cornerstone was laid last Sunday.

—Cardinal Logue, assisted by six bishops and seventy priests, dedicated, May 30, the historic Long Tower Church, Derry, Ireland, built on the spot where St. Columba offered his first Mass in 546 and where he erected his Black Abbey Church. Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., preached on "Columba and the Secret of Sanctity." The new church, which is one of the largest and most elegant in Ireland, is Celtic in design and workmanship, and built by Irish moneys, one gentleman, Mr. Hannigan, of Derry, having contributed $45,000. The stained-glass windows were made by a Dublin firm.

—In the monastery at Niagara Falls, Ont., on June 8, the triennial election of the Carmelite Order of America was held, the General Very Rev. Pius Mayer presiding. The following were chosen: Provincial, Father Dion S. Best, Englewood, N. J.; assistant provincial, Father Bernard Fink, Niagara Falls; consultors, Father Berthold Lauzun, Pittsburg; Father Basil Kahler, Pittsburg; Father Hilary, Chicago; Father Otto, Englewood. There are about sixty members in America and monasteries are established at Niagara Falls, Ont.; Pittsburg and New Baltimore, Pa.; Leavenworth and Seapo, Kansas; Englewood, N. J., and Chicago.

—In blessing a new cemetery at Milwaukee, on last Sunday, Archbishop Messmer expressed his disapproval of the crossless monument by saying: "It is an evil sign to find in a Catholic cemetery a grave with no Christian sign upon it. Such a one might as well be in a pagan cemetery."

—Preparations have begun for the details of the regular annual convention of the National Council of the Knights of Columbus which will be held in Mobile, Ala., August 3, 4 and 5.

—A cable despatch from Béziers, France, states that a Cingalese prince, Fernando Primier, died on a railroad train there, on June 10, while on his way to Lourdes, in the hope of gaining relief at the shrine from the suffering caused by an incurable malady.

—Apropos of the troubles of the color line on the Pacific and in the South, it is remarked as an incident of the Catholicity of the Church that most of the martyrs recently beatified are representatives of the yellow race.

—Old St. Mary's Cathedral, San Francisco, which was destroyed by the earthquake of 1906, has been rebuilt and will be dedicated on Sunday, June 20.

—The cornerstone of the new St. Joseph's Church at Sterling, Conn., was laid on June 6 by Mgr. John Synnott, Administrator of the Diocese of Hartford. The polyglot character of the population is evident from the fact that there were sermons in English, French and Polish at the ceremonies.

—On the 1st inst., at the installation of the new Provost of the Metropolitan Chapter of Westminster, and of the Very Rev. Francis Wyndham to the canonry vacant by the death of the late Mgr. Cook, an ancient Catholic rite which, with the express sanction of the Holy See, had been used in England before the Reformation, was revived for the first time.

—His Grace, the Archbishop of Westminster, celebrated very quietly on the 11th inst. the silver jubilee of his priesthood.

—The new Bishop of Cleveland, the Right Rev. John P. Farrelly, was formally installed in his Cathedral last Sunday. Archbishop Moeller presided and there was a large and distinguished congregation, clerical and lay, present. A parade of Catholic societies and parish representatives and a dinner given by the diocesan clergy in honor of the bishop followed. On Monday evening a reception by the laity was given to the bishop and his guests at the Colonial Club.

—The cornerstone of what will be the most imposing monastery of the Passionist Congregation in the United States was laid by Bishop Rhode in Chicago, on June 6.

OBITUARY

Judge Myles P. O'Connor died recently in San José, California, and in his death State and Church alike mourn the loss of a loyal and devoted son. The Judge was born in Abbeyview, Queen's County, Ireland, on May 8, 1823, but his boyhood years were spent in Manchester, England. At the age of fifteen he migrated to the States with his parents, and after a brief stay in New York he went on to St. Louis. Entering upon his law studies in the strong law department of the St. Louis University, he graduated with distinction in 1846. The call of the West led him across the plains in 1849, and like many another pioneer he speedily accumulated a fortune in the noted mining district of Nevada County, California.

Judge O'Connor's admirable qualities of heart and mind made him a marked character among his associates from the beginning. A man of splendid physique, of keen intelligence and ripe mental gifts, an eloquent speaker and of excellent repute as a lawyer he was honored by his fellow-citizens by repeated election to high political office in his adopted State.

In 1862 he married a Miss Butler, of a prominent Protestant family in Grass Valley, who shortly after her marriage became a fervent convert to the Church. Six years ago Judge O'Connor's health began to fail, loss of sight, too, came to burden him, but in these years of forced seclusion and almost constant pain his patient submission to God's will was an object lesson of Christian fortitude. Death found him ready, and he died as he had lived, an edifying and devoted son of the Church.

Mr. O'Connor's practical life shone out especially in his munificent charity. Favored by fortune in a marked degree, he held himself to be but a trustee to whom Providence had given lavishly for the welfare of his fellows. Hospitals, schools, and religious institutions alike were the recipients of his bounty and when he had disposed of most of his fortune in charity, he gave over his palatial home in San José to the Sisters of Notre Dame to be used as a Catholic orphanage, adding $100,000 as an endowment for the support of fifty orphans. Nor was his charity restricted as to locality; the Catholic University in Washington, Trinity College, the Ecclesiastical Seminary in Menlo Park, the Jesuit Novitiate at Los Gatos, St. Joseph's Church in San José, and the Sisters of Notre Dame as well as the Sisters of Charity in California, all received bountiful evidence of his purpose to use God's gifts in the spread of God's service.

Honored for his civic virtues and esteemed for his devoted Catholic example, his memory will live long among the thousands who mourn his loss.

Mother Mary Joseph (Mary Dallmer) assistant general of the English-speaking Ursulines, since May, 1907, died in Rome, on May 25. She was born in Germany, March 19, 1852, and came here when five years old. She entered the Ursulines in Galveston, Texas, in 1870, and many cultured women claim Mother Joseph as their friend, teacher and guide. In 1891 she was made superior of the Ursuline Convent and remained in office for fifteen years. In September, 1900, she went to Rome for the unification of the congregations of the Ursuline order, and was selected to be Mother Provincial of the Southern United States provinces. Mother Joseph was called to Rome in May, 1907, and while there was selected to fill the office of assistant general, the office she held at the time of her death.

Advices from Rome chronicle the deaths there of two well-known priests, the first, on May 25, of Monsignor Wenzel, Canon of St. Peter's and keeper of the Vatican Archives, who was sixty-eight years of age. Though known in several spheres as a learned prelate and generous benefactor, Monsignor Wenzel was chiefly remarkable for the zeal displayed in his care for the vast range of priceless documents contained in the archives of the Apostolic Palace, where, it may be said, he almost lived for several years. Among the wreaths at his funeral were several from some of the principal Universities in Europe.

The other loss to the Church was that of Father Palmieri, who for over sixty years has been a member of the Society of Jesus, during which time he enjoyed the esteem of Pius IX, Leo XIII, and Pius X. A fuller notice will appear in a forthcoming number.

Timothy E. Tarsney, a well-known Catholic lawyer of Michigan, who served two terms in Congress and was for eight years Corporation Counsel of Detroit, died in that city June 8, aged sixty years. After his service in Congress his repute as a wit and orator was national.

The death is announced in Dublin, on May 31, of P. A. McHugh, editor and founder of the Sligo Champion, and for twenty years parliamentary representative of North Sligo. Mr. McHugh was a scholarly gentleman, and in press and Parliament an able and dignified exponent of Irish and Catholic interests. The frequent imprisonments he suffered for his aggressive advocacy of the rights of his people never soured his disposition and in the midst of political passions he incurred no personal enmities.

A despatch from Honolulu announces the death of Father Clement, who went to Hawaii from France with Father Damien in 1863, to devote himself to work among the lepers in the Molokai colony.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

That France is "decadent" at this moment no one who really loves her and her great past can doubt. Her government is drifting towards anarchy; her pictorial art and literature have become so indecent that pictures in the Paris salons, the plays and the novels of to-day are as a rule flippantly vicious.

The Catholic Church alone maintains religion and morality, and the Catholic Church is slowly having all her power for social order and moral education choked by a government bent upon killing her influence over the coming generation. Every religious order that teaches has been banished. It is getting to be a very difficult thing to give religious instruction to those who ardently desire to have it, and the millions outside who have been perverted are taught to show active hostility to every devout Catholic. Last year a young man was killed and many persons injured at Orleans in a procession in honor of Joan of Arc. Priests have been stabbed and stoned in the streets of Paris. There are precincts where no priest can walk in the streets without having the insulting cry: "A bas la calotte!"

Few people here can realize the condition of things. I have been amused as well as irritated at the comments upon President Jordan's assertion that France is decadent because of the extremes which meet. I have heard a non-Catholic say that the present condition (which if continued will surely lead to anarchy) is the most hopeful and enlightened advance towards a glorious future without organized religion and therefore France is not "decadent." In your editorial last Saturday you quote a speech from M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador, in which he says that no nation which "leads the world in sciences" can be "decadent." No Catholic can look upon this as a logical conclusion, for we know well that the utmost perfection of human intelligence may be utterly godless. What you say in the same editorial is of course the only ground for hope that France may recover.

The devotion of Catholics and their loyalty to the Pope, the renewed zeal which has come to the lukewarm and the indifferent—all these most inspiring signs of vitality in the Church of France prove to us why an omnipotent God allows evil and cruelty to exist, but that the evil and cruelty are rampant and have the upperhand in France to-day is an indisputable proof to my mind of decadence and anyone familiar with the Republic of thirty years ago can measure the height of her fall. I do not think she can be lifted up unless we admit this fact which every devout Catholic in France knows to be the truth.

A CATHOLIC WHO LOVES FRANCE.

Boston, June 13, 1909.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On the 24th of May, 1908, Rev. Mother Barat, the Foundress of the Congregation of the Sacred Heart, was declared by the Church Blessed. Within a year of the Beatification, her daughters, with the assistance of a few pupils, have given £500 ($2,500) to provide a beautiful marble statue of the Sacred Heart for the Metropolitan Cathedral of Westminster. The small chapel in which the statue is to be placed adjoins that of the Blessed Sacrament, and is one of the quietest and most secluded little nooks in the vast church. To decorate in a suitable manner this chapel, £550 ($2,750) is needed, a large sum it may appear at first sight, but not when divided among the countless pupils of the Order, who in their generosity will surely delight to share in the scheme. A short note was published in the Tablet of May 8th, suggesting that this should be undertaken. A week later the writer received £5 ($25) as a first donation from an English lady living in Florence.

Contributions, large or small, of all pupils throughout the world, will be earnestly looked for, and especially from those in the English-speaking countries. The colonies will hasten to share in this, we may be sure, the pupils in the various convents in Canada and Australia, and also may we not include those of the numberless houses in the United States? The writer, whose own school was in Providence, Rhode Island, U. S. A., beautiful "Elmhurst" where she spent fully five years, has every confidence that the old girls in that country will not be behind others in generosity. All donations can be sent direct either to The Hon. Muriel Fitzalan Howard, Glossop Hall, Glossop, Derbyshire, or to Miss Cecil Kerr, 76 Eccleston Square, London, S. W., who are both old pupils of Roehampton, or to the writer of these lines. A complete list of all the convents or private individuals who have contributed, with the sums given, will be presented to the Archbishop of Westminster.

PAULINE WILLIS.

3 Kensington Gate, London, W.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have had a desire for quite a while to let you know how I enjoy and appreciate AMERICA. A week seems long to wait its arrival; one of my countrymen, a laboring man, is credited with saying: "If Saturday would come in the middle of the week, it would be easier for the working man." A short editorial in the issue of June 5, on "Frauds and the Carlyles," brings to my mind an article in the June Munsey. The title is "Famous Affinities of History. VI—Mary Queen of Scots and Lord Bothwell." By Lyndon Orr.

Mr. Orr seems to have taken Froude for his model, if not as a "word painter," at least, to put it mildly, as an untruthful historian. It has been truthfully said that some modern historians are conspirators against the truth. Of course, you know that Mary Queen of Scots has been ably vindicated by courageous, truthful Protestant writers. There is a famous vindication of her in three volumes by Rev. John Whitaker, D.D., Rector of Ruan-Langhorne, Cornwall, published in London in 1788. Mr. Orr's knowledge must have been limited to the writings of the Queen's enemies, else he could not have the audacity to write the article credited to him in Munsey's.

In the third volume of Whitaker, page 2, he says: "The human heart indeed appears to have particularly rankled, at this season, into sins of malignity. Papists and Protestants shared equally in the baleful spirit. But Forgery. I blush for the honor of Protestantism while I write it, seems to have been peculiar to the Reformed. I shall recite some strong facts of this nature. They are dreadful proofs of the profligacy of the times. But I shall confine myself to the period and the actors in them, with which we are already conversant. And I look in vain for one of these accursed outrages of imposition, among the disciples of Popery."

I am tempted to give another extract from the same volume (third) page 49. "But Forgery appears to have been the peculiar disease of Protestantism, originally coming forth as a kind of leprosy, upon the brow of Presbyterianism in Scotland; it was conveyed by the intercourses of vice to the profligate head of the Church of England. In both, it concurred with the rebellious turbulence and the sacrilegious violence of the Reformed, to stop the nations of Europe, that were springing forward from the idolatries of Popery into the pure worship of Protestantism; to make them run back, with a too hasty horror, at the frightful face of Reformation before them; and to prefer even Popery with all its idolatries, to Protestantism with those enormities accompanying it. And the crimes of such wretches as Lethington, Morton, Murray, and Elizabeth, served unhappily to check the progress of that greatest of all illuminations to man, next to the first propagation of the Gospel."

You can enlighten, AMERICA, the readers of Munsey's in regard to the true history of Mary Queen of Scots, and Mr. Lyndon Orr will have reason to thank you for your generosity in giving him a lesson on how history ought to be written, if you will kindly do so.

P. H. SPELLISSY.

Philadelphia, June 10.

Writing from Mersina, Asia Minor, a correspondent of AMERICA gives thirty-two reasons why American Catholics should take more interest in missionary work there. He regrets that in the mind of the Oriental, American and Protestant have come to be synonymous, owing to the resources at the disposal of the various American Protestant mission societies; and he asks why should not American Catholic mission societies be founded? "A Protestant missionary here does not cost less than 12,000 francs a year, and that for himself and his wife and family without the work profiting in the least. Well, this amount would suffice to keep at least twelve Catholic missionaries with their chapel and schools."

His appeal is not made to Catholics only: but to America as a nation. "Owing to the influence of French Catholic missionaries in the Orient, France has an unparalleled prestige there. To-day with her own hands she is endeavoring to destroy her own influence. Italy and Germany are eager to transplant her as protector of Catholics and Protestants in the East. Protestant England cannot logically do so. Why should not America step in and reap whatever commercial advantage such a position entails?"

The letter of our correspondent is curiously illustrated by a speech delivered on June 1, at the Sorbonne, Paris, before a meeting of the "Alliance Française," by M. Paul Deschanel, former Vice-President of the French Chamber, and President of the Committee for Foreign and Colonial Affairs.

"Our protectorate in the East shelters a forest of schools spreading our speech and our influence. Some races there prefer religious schools; others—the Jews, for instance—favor lay teaching. There is room for all. . . . Amid the barren waste of Islam the Christian churches of the East have been centres of life and independence; so much so that where certain minds see nothing but relics of the past, and medieval legend, these peoples behold champions of law in the face of Mussulman fatalism and upholders of the liberty of the human conscience. Never can I forget the thrill I experienced on entering one day one of our colleges in the East, when I heard one thousand young folks acclaim the flag of the Republic.

"I felt I stood on French soil . . . and I saw once more France of the Crusades out to conquer the Orient in the name of civilization."

Coming from the lips of an official of the French Government these words are significant, and may mark the dawn of an era of wisdom on the part of its masonic government in its treatment of the Religious schools.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS

Much as we shall miss the well-written essays, editorials and stories of the Messenger, we rejoice at the change to AMERICA. A weekly is more needed and will do more good. AMERICA is bound to have a wider circulation and greater influence. It is in close touch with the events of the day, gives systematic information about them and represents them in the light of Christian Faith and morals. May AMERICA be the forerunner of the Catholic English daily, which we need even more.—Paradisefrüchte, St. Meinrad, Ind.

We waited anxiously for the first number of AMERICA. It did not disappoint us, nor did any of the succeeding numbers. We recommend AMERICA most heartily to our readers.—St. Josephsblatt, Mt. Angel, Oregon.

We extend a hearty welcome to AMERICA, a Catholic review of the week, the latest periodical to emanate from the enterprise of our fellow-Catholics in the States. The well-known American Messenger has been discontinued in favor of the new venture, which on the merits of the specimen number we have seen, should enjoy a long and prosperous life. . . . Its outlook is a wide one and the Chronicle of the week, Questions of the Day, Editorials and other features are full of interest for Catholics on both sides of the Atlantic.—Universe, London.

The current number of AMERICA fully maintains its high standard as a weekly review and Catholic news-journal, reflecting the best Catholic thought and activity of the Church all over the world. It is representative of higher Catholic journalism.—The Record, Louisville, Ky.

WHAT IS SAID OF AMERICA

. . . A subscription is probably better than a commendation. It helps to pay bills.—Rev. A. P. Doyle, Apostolic Mission Home, Washington, D. C.

. . . AMERICA is not only good, but excellent. It is a feast for anyone with an appetite for good reading matter.—Jas. J. Flannery, Jersey City, N. J.

. . . I have the six numbers already published, and must say they are fine. I assure you of my hearty support in your enterprise, and I have recommended AMERICA to my parishioners, and will continue to do so. Vive AMERICA!—Rev. J. M. Drevelle, Russelville, Ky.

. . . May God's blessing be upon your work, and bring AMERICA to every nook and corner of the continent!—Rev. J. Althoff, Nelson, B. C.

. . . It is indeed a red-letter day for Catholics to have a paper such as AMERICA. We American Catholics are sorely in need of a good organ to defend our cause.—Laure Broussard, San Antonio, Texas.

. . . AMERICA is fully up to the promises which were set forth in the last number of the Messenger. It fills a field of immense opportunity for truth and knowledge.—Judge Michael F. Girten, The Municipal Court of Chicago.

WELCOME FROM THE PRESS.308

CHRONICLE

Home Review of the Week.—Wilbur and Orville Wright, America's distinguished aviators, went through scenes of adulation and hero-worship such as few living men have known. Dayton, their home town, had 100,000 visitors to witness the triumph of the brothers. A representative of Secretary of War Dickinson presented to them the gold medals authorized by Congress. Governor Harmon presented a diamond studded medal bearing the official seal of the State of Ohio, and Mayor Burkhardt an equally handsome one from their home city. —Investigation of the Sugar Trust, just begun in New York by United States District Attorney Wise, has for its object the dissolution of the corporation. —President Taft seeks aid of governors of the States in the projected conference to be held January, 1910, to frame laws beneficial to the nation as well as models for the States.—In his editorial in the week's Outlook, former President Roosevelt pleads for a sound system of national ethics and wants laws strong enough to rule the criminal rich.—Interviews with New York clergymen make clear that representative opinion among them is outspoken in opposition to individual mission work by young women among the Chinese.—The secretary of the Carnegie Foundation has written Governor Harmon, of Ohio, that Ohio State University, Miami University and Ohio University do not, in the judgment of that body, fulfil the requirements of colleges whose professors are pensioned out of the fund.—The massive new North German Lloyd floating hotel, the George Washington, the greatest ship under Germany's flag, steamed up New York Bay on Sunday and was given hearty welcome.—The balancing of the books at Washington for the fiscal year ending June 30 will show a real revival in business in all departments of American industrial life; railways show increased earnings and will resume rehabilitation plans.—A night conference was held at the White House on Sunday at which all the Republican members of the Finance Committee of the Senate were present to discuss the proposed tariff bill amendment to tax the earnings of corporations. An elaborate dinner party preceded the conference.—The Senate agrees to delay consideration of the income and corporation tax until the tariff debate shall have ended.—Early in the week the Senate Finance Committee had printed a list of subjects to be acted upon in connection with the tariff measure. The list shows that thirty-nine imported items in the impending bill await final determination by the Senate. These have been passed over to permit investigation by interested Senators, but each and every one must be fought out before the administrative features or the income and corporation taxes can be taken up.—Nikolas Kaumanns, German Imperial Commissioner at Washington has been quietly investigating the East St. Louis packing plants, with a view to making a report to his home Government. It is feared that the result will be a further ban on American meats in German markets. An official investigation of the East St. Louis plants is now in progress, based on charges made by a former meat inspector.—Three arbitrators have been appointed in the Georgia Railroad dispute.

Commercial Growth in the South.—There have been recent indications that the commercial growth of the South is recognized by the business men of other sections. A large number of merchants and shippers of Philadelphia have entered into an agreement with the New Orleans Board of Trade and business leagues to establish the Philadelphia and Gulf Steamship Line between that city and New Orleans. A few days later it was announced that the Illinois Central had purchased the Georgia Central Railroad, Mr. Hanrahan giving as the reason, that the progress of the Southeast and the certainly of continued development necessitated increased facility of communication between Chicago and Southeastern ports. Meanwhile, the Southern Building Corporation is erecting a $1,500,000 building in Washington, D. C., as a home for the Southern Commercial Congress, whose object is to establish or strengthen commercial organizations and advertise the varied resources and advantages of Southern territory. Their motto is: "A greater nation through a greater South."

A Quiet Fourth.—Cleveland, Ohio, has undertaken a very summary and practical reform of the manner in which Independence Day is to be celebrated. A recent municipal regulation forbids the explosion of any fireworks or firearms on July 4 and it has been determined to rigidly enforce it this year as an experiment. A record kept by the Chicago Tribune of the Fourth of July casualties for the period extending from 1899 to 1908, inclusive, gives the number of deaths as 508 and the wounded as 29,085. A table kept by the Journal of the American Medical Association for the six years, 1903-08, totals 1,316 dead and 27,980 wounded, with 776 of these deaths due to tetanus. The Chicago Tribune's figures are for the day itself; the medical paper carries the incidental results into the month of August.

Canadian News.—The trade returns for the month of May, just issued by the Dominion Government, show increases, both in exports and imports, which indicate some acceleration of the revival of business. A comparison between the imports of May, 1908, and May, 1909, give an improvement of about 11% this year, while a similar comparison of exports for the same months reveals an increase this year of more than 14%. The exports of May, 1909, almost reach those of May, 1907, before the panic; but a gain of 20% is still needed before the imports of last May can equal those of May, 1907. However, there has undoubtedly been a substantial recovery. Imports at Winnipeg are showing a larger proportionate increase than at Eastern points in Canada; and at other Western points there is a like showing.—Mr. G. R. Coldwell, the Minister of Education in Manitoba, has publicly announced that compulsory education was no longer a live issue in that province. For the past two or three years Protestant bodies, such as the Manitoba Methodist Conference, have been carrying on a strenuous agitation in favor of compulsory education. Mr. Coldwell's speech on this subject at the last session of the Manitoba Legislature set forth the principal reasons why the Government supporters would not vote for the Compulsory Education Bill introduced by Mr. D. A. Ross. These were: First, that in the Canadian provinces where there is a compulsory education law the percentage of school attendance to enrolment is no larger than it is in Manitoba; and, secondly, that the passage of a compulsory education act might reopen the Manitoba School Question, since the Government would have in some way to recognize Catholic schools.

New Ship Line to Norway.—The establishment of a direct line of mail and passenger steamers between New York and Bergen, Norway, is announced. The new project, in which only Norwegian capital will be used, calls for a sum of $10,000,000, of which half has already been subscribed in Norway. The Norwegian Government has pledged a subsidy of $500,000, and the prospects for a profitable operation of the line are claimed to be excellent. The proposed line will make possible travel between New York and Norway in less than nine days instead of eleven as at present.

The Strike in Honolulu.—The efforts of certain Japanese to give the Hawaiian situation an international aspect are apparent from an appeal published in the Nippu Jiji, the Honolulu organ of the leaders of the strike. It calls upon the Japanese Government to intervene, alleging that the Japanese have been unfairly treated by the courts and by federal and territorial officers. The Jiji has supported the leaders of the higher wage movement ever since the Japanese sugar plantation hands struck. Its office was searched June 11 and numerous papers containing, it is alleged, evidence of widespread conspiracy among the Japanese in the islands, were seized. Its editor is under bail following two indictments issued against him by the Territorial Grand Jury—one on a charge of conspiracy to incite riot, and one on a charge of conspiracy to commit murder.

Spanish Notes.—The Government approved, on May 22, a subsidy to the only Trans-Atlantic steamship company Spain has. In this it follows the example of Germany and England. Belgium, too, is talking of building up a merchant marine subsidized by the State.—The Cortes has voted for obligatory attendance at school. It is to be hoped the teachers trained in the Normal Schools will not turn out forces for dechristianization as in France. By the law of nature to parents belongs the duty of teaching their children; moreover the Church has received from her Founder the duty of teaching all nations. The function of the State should be to co-operate with the Church and the parents.—Protestant propaganda is gaining ground in Spain. It is due in a measure to the energy of Princess Beatrice of Battenburg, mother of Queen Victoria. It is hard to explain how she could allow her daughter to change her religion to marry the King of a Catholic nation if she is so attached to Protestantism.

Cuba Refuses to Pay Spain's Colonial Debts.—After negotiations which Secretary of State Velez says "were most amicable," Cuba has declined to consider Spain's proposition that she assume that portion of the Spanish national debt contracted by Spain on account of Cuba when the latter was her colony. In his note to the Spanish Ministers, after fully setting forth the views of the Cuban Government and the historical, political and judicial aspects of the question, Señor Velez declared that the acceptance of the Spanish view was incompatible with the provisions of the Cuban Constitution, to which Spain assented in recognizing the republic. His Government, therefore, was unable to enter into negotiations on the question of the Spanish colonial debt.

Notes From England.—A marine disaster was narrowly averted Saturday night, when in a dense fog the liner Sappho came in collision off Dungeness with the British third-class protected cruiser also named Sappho. The cruiser, which had just been commissioned for manœuvres, was seriously damaged. Two hundred of her crew of two hundred and seventy officers and men, were landed in life-boats, the others remaining on board till tugs towed the cruiser into the naval harbor of Dover and beached her.—The King has announced that he will review the fleet at Cowes at the close of the naval manœuvres. His Majesty has expressed his desire, too, that the members of both Houses of Parliament be present at the review, which is to be the most imposing naval pageant ever seen in British waters.

The Anglican Church Pageant.—The London correspondent to the Manchester Guardian, June 9, writes: "The Church Pageant looks as if it attempts no more unity than is implied in the fact that an organization called the Church existed from A. D. 313 to 1688 and that its dignitaries were present on certain occasions. An intelligent savage might come and see it without gathering from it the least idea that there is a Church to-day which holds itself to be the same Church.

"We leave off at the acquittal of the seven Bishops, and must make what we can of the gulf between then and now, after a series of jumps across gulfs from episode to episode. Moreover, this style of merely presenting scenes has this great drawback, that you must entirely leave out some periods, some great events or facts, because you are afraid of bringing them in in a method which does not allow a comment or explanation. The old connection of England with the Papal See must be kept severely in the background—indeed, right out of the picture as far as possible. The Friars must not be seen—they were great Papalists. Celtic Christianity must be misrepresented. St. Aidan, Columba, Oswald, and Dunstan may be put on the stage to show that our national Church did not entirely emanate from Rome."

Finance Reform in Germany.—The day after the Reichstag reconvened an important speech by Bülow was expected. The House was filled, the lobbies and the gallery of the Foreign Embassies were taxed to the utmost capacity. The Chancellor spoke first to his former allies, the Conservatives, but made no impression on them. Then he turned with great bitterness to the Centre, denying even the well-known fact that he had tried to "switch off" that party. He was not, as formerly, listened to with reverential silence, but frequently interrupted and even laughed at. On June 22, a law providing a tax on stocks and bonds came up for discussion. It is expected to bring in about twenty million dollars a year. The money magnates had presented an immense number of petitions against the law, though it is difficult to see how it can, as the Chancellor fears, injure commerce, exchange and industry. The law was adopted contrary to Bülow's wishes by a majority of 203 against 155.

Socialist Propaganda in Florence.—The recent attacks of Deputy Chiesa in the Italian Parliament indicate the programme of the Socialists drawn up against religion wherever they can obtain power. In Florence, so famous for its religious monuments, its religious glories, its poets, painters, architects and its attachment to religion, the municipality has fallen into the hands of the Socialists. They have practically abolished religious instruction in the schools. As this could not be done directly, being in violation of the law, it has been brought about by indirect means. Religious instruction is granted only to the children of parents who personally present their petition to the municipality. This in most cases parents cannot do, and in other cases they forego doing it, knowing that the officials will only be revenged by appointing teachers who instead of teaching catechism will only ridicule it.

They have laicized the great hospital of St. John of God, removing every symbol of religion, forbidding the celebration of Mass, disallowing the visits of chaplains and permitting the priests to approach the sick only on application to the physician made by the sick or by the sick person's family. As a matter of fact even when the family insists, the priest is generally debarred.

This war of the Socialists is now directed against the Oblate Sisters of Santa Maria Nuova who have charge of the largest hospital of the city. The municipal authorities have already formed the project of expelling them, though its accomplishment will not be easy, as the medical staff with one exception is solidly opposed to it. Their hostility towards the Pia Casa di Lavoro, a religious home for children, exceeds belief. Their agents suddenly burst into the home and removed the crucifixes; they interdicted the celebration of the Mass, and ordered that the children should not be taught catechism and should not observe the least practice of religion without the express command of the parents. Meanwhile no notice of this new departure was communicated to the parents. This year in the Pia Casa there was no administration of Confirmation nor of First Communion. All these arbitrary rulings have provoked the greatest indignation among the citizens.

Pope Pius Justified.—The parish of Sains-les-Fressin and Toky is in the Pas-de-Calais. Some time ago the Bishop had to remove the curé in charge and send another to take his place. The curé demurred, and as sometimes happens a section of the congregation supported the action of their priest. Disobedience went further, and despite the Pope's prohibition they formed an "Association Cultuelle" with the unruly priest at its head. To this clique the Government has handed over, as the Separation Law allowed, all the Church property, charitable institutions and funds of the parish, thereby justifying the Pope's rejection of the law as inimical to the rights of the Church. Commenting on the Government's action Le Temps, of June 12, says: "The opportuneness of this action is doubtful. . . . The Government, which formerly boasted of the honesty of its intentions towards Catholics, is throwing off the mask. This action on its part is but a thinly disguised call to schism. . . . Many people will see in it a step towards a new and extremely regrettable policy."

Turkey and Crete.—The Cretan question arises from two factors. When the Balkan question was blazing last autumn the Christian population of the island declared for annexation to Greece. Prior to this the European Powers had fixed July 1st next as the date for withdrawing the international troops from the island. Turkey is unwilling to add Crete to the number of her losses, but more unwilling to see it in the hands of Greece.

Turkey has no intention of interfering with the privileges granted the Cretans by the Powers. The moment Greece interferes Turkey will declare war. It is thought likely that the troops will not be withdrawn from Crete for the present. The new Sultan is experiencing many difficulties in restoring order in his territory. There is revolt in the Yeman, disturbances among the Kurds in Asia Minor, and Montenegro is said to be furnishing munitions of war to the rebellious Albanians.

The Adana Massacre.—M. Constans, the French Ambassador, has just returned from Constantinople. Several interviews have been reported by the papers. Le Temps, June 10, gives one in which he pays high tribute to the schools under the direction of French priests and religious communities. Over one hundred thousand children in Turkey are educated in these French schools and nearly all by Catholic teachers. Apropos of the recent massacres in Adana, M. Constans said: "All along the coast of this unfortunate Armenia, on an appointed day at a given signal, fanaticism burst out and Christian blood flowed in torrents. The gruesome days of 1895 were seen again. There were the same atrocities and the same acts of heroism. The example of the French priests and the French Sisters of Adana are beyond eulogy. They saved thousands of lives. They threw open the doors of their religious houses and hoisted the tricolor above the buildings. They dressed the wounds of the injured and soothed the bed of the dying. Two fathers went to Constantinople for medicines, and after telling in simple language the story of the tragedy they returned to resume their care of the wounded victims."

Taxing Mass Bequests.—By a number of decisions the Courts here and in other States have held that bequests for Masses are valid. A new point in the issue, however, was decided on June 19, in Brooklyn, when Surrogate Ketcham ruled that the State Comptroller could collect a transfer tax of five per cent. on sums of money set aside by a will for the saying of Masses. The case before the Surrogate was an appeal by the State Comptroller from the adjustment of a transfer tax of one per cent. on $2,500 left by Margaret Eppig. The testatrix directed the executors of her will to devote $2,000 of this money to Masses for the repose of her own soul and $500 to Masses for the repose of the souls of her parents. The Comptroller contended that the money was a gift in trust for religious use, which may be effectuated under a certain law, in spite of the indefiniteness and uncertainty as to the beneficiaries. The Surrogate upheld this view, ruling that a transfer tax at the rate of five per cent. may be collected, as the duty of the executors in controlling the rate and progress of the payment was an active and continuing responsibility which could not be effectually discharged without possession of the gift.

The Entente Cordiale Develops.—The most peculiar phase in the relations between England and Germany is revealed in Le Temps, June 11, on "England and War." Taking as its text Captain Battine's article, "Our Duty Towards France," in the Fortnightly Review, the organ of the French Foreign Office points out that the English army is at present unequal to the task of upholding English prestige. All England can put in the field just now would be three or four divisions. Then follows the startling but illuminating sentence. "The slight support the English could give us to-day would have no weight in turning the issue of battle. . . . Great Britain ought to have an army worthy of her allies and of her eventual enemies." The position taken up by Le Temps, as well as its open reference to England's preparations to send troops to support France during the Casablanca affair point to the fact that the entente cordiale involves military co-operation with France under circumstances interesting to Germany.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

An "Insubstantial Pageant"

. . . . These, our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air:
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind.

—The Tempest, IV.

Although the English Church Pageant which is being held in the grounds of the Palace of the Bishop of London at Fulham, has attracted much attention and has created a great demand for seats, it may be doubted whether it is not curiosity rather than loyalty to official Anglicanism which is responsible for a large proportion of the expected attendance. A desire to see how the committee have dealt with the extremely delicate situation created by the attacks of the Evangelical party on the one hand and the High Church claims to "Continuity" on the other, has probably gone for much in the interest taken in the proceedings; whilst the resignation at the eleventh hour of Mr. Frank Lascelles, the Master of the Pageant, whose ritualistic sympathies were well known and who had so successfully organized the pageant at Quebec, together with other rumored defections, unmistakably hinted to the outside public that all was not peace within the ranks of the promoters themselves. And there have been other causes at work of a different order. It is not every day that the Ritualist of the extreme type gets a chance of singing the Dies Iræ, the Iste Confessor, the Te Deum, etc., in the original Latin, though he is for the most part itching to do so. Moreover, for this occasion only, the archbishop and bishops instead of uneasily shutting their eyes to the incense and the chasubles, the palliums, archiepiscopal croziers and acolytes' candles, to the Roman chants and the Latin hymns, may be expected to beam approval from the front row of the auditorium, if they do not themselves join the chorus. No doubt historical perplexities were not existing in this same matter of historical hymnody. For example, seeing that the Te Deum was composed, according to the most approved modern view (that of Dom G. Morin and A. E. Burn), by Nicetas of Treves about the year 375 at earliest, one does not quite understand how the Christians of Britain could sing it, as they do in the Pageant, in thanksgiving for the publication of the Edict of Constantine in 313.

However, it is not the early scenes of the Church Pageant which constitute the main difficulty of the situation. St. Alban the Martyr under Diocletian, St. Germanus of Auxerre the hero of the "Alleluia" victory, St. Augustine the Apostle of England and even St. Aidan and St. Oswald in the days of the Heptarchy are all too remote from our own day to enter into practical Church politics. It is when we come to the later Middle Ages, and when we recall the attitude adopted towards the English Church of that period by Archbishop Cranmer and his congeners that the hollowness of the pretence of Continuity becomes apparent. Do what they will the High Churchmen cannot get away from Cranmer. It is through him that they have to trace their claim to Apostolic Succession, though it can hardly be disputed that he obtained his own consecration as Archbishop by an act of perjury. Again it was Cranmer who not only pronounced Henry's divorce, but who was mainly responsible for the Forty-two Articles (afterwards reduced to Thirty-nine), for the revised edition of the "Book of Common Prayer" and in particular for the "Ordination Service." The Committee of the Pageant have consequently not been able to get rid of Cranmer, though they have successfully eliminated both Henry VIII, the original Defender of the Faith, and his daughter. Neither Henry nor Elizabeth have any sort of look in in the Pageant, not even in the Epilogue. Perhaps the presence of Mrs. Parker, the wife of the Archbishop, in the only Elizabethan scene included in the programme, may have frightened the sovereign away, but one certainly would have thought that both the Virgin Queen and her worthy sire held a position in English Church History which would have entitled them to some recognition. Cranmer, however, is there, and besides appearing as the officiating prelate in the scene of the coronation of Edward VI, his portrait is reproduced as a full page illustration in both the official publications issued by the committee. Now, Cranmer was not only the editor of the first "Book of Homilies," but was himself the author of the one, "Good Works," which is an unqualified condemnation of monasticism in all its various rules and "sects." For example, after condemning the superstition of these "sects" in "the many hypocritical and figured works of their State of religion, as they arrogantly named it," their "superstitiousness in strange apparel, in silence, in dormitory, in cloister, in chapter, in choice of meats and drinks and such like things," he turns to consider in detail "what enormities and abuses have been in the three chief principal points, which they called the three essentials (or three chief foundations) of religion, that is to say, obedience, chastity and wilful poverty."

And yet in the very scene of the pageant which precedes this, the scene of the suppression of the monasteries, we have a sympathetic presentment of the life of the cloister, the significance of which is emphasized by the language of the "Pageant Hand-book," while there is hardly an episode in all that has gone before, from the coming of Augustine the Monk to bring the message of the Gospel to our Angle forefathers, to the brave interposition of Grim, the wounded cross-bearer of St. Thomas, in which the monastic habit does not appear and demand the respect of every spectator. This is but an external matter, but it is one that strikes the eye and brings home the sham of this presented Continuity to every one who knows a little history. Moreover, if this matter seem only one of discipline, nothing could be easier than to quote a hundred instances of Cranmer's rejection of the dogmas which all Christendom deemed vital and which St. Augustine and St. Dunstan would have upheld as firmly as the theologians of Queen Mary's day.

Or to take another point, in Part II, Scene 3, we have a representation of the founding of King's College Cambridge in which special attention is directed to the laying the foundation stone of the chapel. Every one knows that a chapel in the days of King Henry VI was erected primarily that Mass might be said therein, and if only the committee had chosen the rite of consecration instead of the rite of the laying the foundation stone, the fact would be plain enough to every reader. But what says that official collection of Homilies which every English clergyman declares himself to approve in substance when he says the Thirty-nine Articles?

"What dens of thieves the Churches of England have been made by the blasphemous buying and selling the most precious Body and Blood of Christ in the Mass, as the world was made to believe, at diriges, at month's minds, in trentals, in abbeys and chantries, besides other horrible abuses, God's holy name be blessed for ever, we can see and understand. All these abominations they that supply the room of Christ [i.e. Henry VIII and Elizabeth], have cleansed and purified the Churches of England of, taking away all such fulsomeness and filthiness as through blind devotion and ignorance hath crept into the Church this many hundred years."

Who can believe that Cranmer, or Parker, Sancroft or those "Immortal Churchmen" of the fifteenth century who appear in a later scene, would have had the slightest sympathy with such a pageant as that now being represented at Fulham. They might have preferred to hold aloof from association with either extreme party, but if they were compelled to choose, it would, we believe, be Mr. Kensit, with his Foxe's "Book of Martyrs" and his show of Inquisition tortures, with whom they would prefer to throw in their lot. HERBERT THURSTON.

The Novels of René Bazin

France owes a debt of gratitude to the novels of René Bazin. They do much to redeem the honor of her literature, for many of her modern writers could be justly impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. During the last twenty-five years, the traditions of her great masters have been brushed aside. The lights marking the deep, roomy channels over which they steered their majestic craft have been hooded, the buoys unmoored and set adrift. The taste of a refined people, in many instances, seems to have become hopelessly corrupt. Clear thinking has, too often, given place to shallow sophistry, faith and enthusiasm to sarcasm and sneer; delicacy and simplicity of expression to the coarse word, the tortured phrase; the idealism of a chivalrous race has been succeeded by realism and sensualism, and one school of writers headed by Anatole France, aims its envenomed shafts at two principal enemies: Christianity and Chastity.

Darkness and despair seem to have settled down upon the heights of French romance and song. The very titles of novel or play have an ill-omened sound. "The Human Brute," "The Uprooted," "Lies," are characteristic of Zola and his kind. But a few brave hands lift a blazing torch amid the gloom. Among these René Bazin holds an honored place. He has seen the battle raging, but he does not haul down his flag. He has witnessed crimes and shames, but writes of "Redemption"; he has traced the path of the storm, but hopefully tells of "The Coming Harvest."

There has been a steady advance in the work of M. Bazin since he wrote "Stéphanette," a quarter of a century ago. Time has matured him. He has studied men, life and its problems at close range. His ready pen, equally at ease in a solid piece of history like his "Duc de Nemours," a book of travels like "Sicily," or a story of the soil like "Les Noëlets," has garnered wellnigh all the technique and art, all the legitimate knacks and tricks of a consummate literary craftsman. We see in "The Nun," "The Coming Harvest," the same freshness and grace of style, the same truth and sincerity of emotion of the earlier days of "Une Tache d'Encre," or "Ma Tante Giron." But there is more virility; his horizon has become larger; his stride steadier; it is leading him to the heights. His deepening faith is giving wings to his genius. His two last books, "The Nun," "The Coming Harvest," have turned the eyes of thousands in many lands upon him. He is the interpreter of a new thought in the literature of France.

A writer's steady growth in power implies the presence of a certain moral unity in his work, the dominance of a few master-chords. Can we detect in Bazin's books this moral unity, and putting our finger on the master-chords find out from what angle he observes life and what is his message?

Life for Bazin is a sacred trust. He has always looked at it from a serious point of view; now he is studying it from a truly Christian and Catholic standpoint. All that is good and true and fair strikes a sympathetic chord in his heart. He is not of the school of Donndy which remains perfectly neutral in front of life's problems, without dogma, convictions, or the concept of personal responsibility; without the idea of sin, remorse or hope of a future; bounded by time, and prizing nothing but earth. René Doumic has called this the "Deliquescent School," whose literature of dissolution and decay, by its very effeminacy and softness a potent factor for corruption, eats like a corrosive acid into the soul.

But truth and honor are not empty words for Julien Noellet in "This My Son." Justice, in "The Coming Harvest," speaks to Gilbert Cloquet, as he swings his axe in the forests of la Nièvre; it speaks to chivalrous Michel de Meximien valiantly trying to right the wrongs of years. Sacrifice flashes its message to the four heroic religious of "The Nun," and they heed it for their loved Pascale's sake, winning for her at last the grace of baptizing into a new life her withered lily.

Bazin is not, like De Lisle, a mere literary chemist working out the barren facts of life on a dry formula. A deep sympathy for his characters beats in every page. The artist who paints the silk-weaver in "The Nun" and Toussaint Lumineau in "La Terre qui meurt," ennobling the humblest toil with a halo of dignity and supernatural beauty, is far surely from the odious realism of Zola who degrades almost every character he touches, soldier, peasant, or priest, and befouls with slime the most hallowed names; far surely from Anatole France, who, aping Voltaire, tries with jibe and sneer and shallow criticism, wanton wit and soulless laughter, to puff away the very names of goodness, enthusiasm and virtue.

Yet the writer of "The Coming Harvest" is no idle dreamer. If there be one note characteristic of his work, it is its sobriety, its fidelity to nature. Our academician is not a dexterous scene-shifter with startling electrical effects, a red-and-blue-light-artist, a great contriver of plots. We might admit that in one or two stories, the structure is weak, that perhaps he has created no character likely to dominate French literature for all time. But his is the clear vision which sees things as they are, the equilibrium of intellect and imagination, of emotion and self-restraint which enables him to give to fiction the sober reality of fact. He sees and paints true, and is everywhere normal.

He taught law for many years in his native town of Angers, and he retains something of the jurist's calm and poise. He selects ordinary, not exceptional types, and surrounds them with ordinary circumstances, temptations and trials. The abnormal, the startling, the exaggerated in theme and plot, in tone and character and style, he almost invariably avoids. This is so true that the untrained reader may be deceived and think him tame, perhaps commonplace. But if we look beneath the surface of that quiet stream, we shall see at times the dark tide of tragedy. "This My Son," one of the author's strong books, tingles with a hidden electric power. Father and son front each other like angry wave and beetling rock. The book slightly resembles David Graham Phillips' "The Second Generation," but far surpasses it in its spiritual lesson. This story of sire and son with different ideas, a gap between them in their outlook on life; of the mother and sisters working at the priest's alb which will never be worn by the prodigal; of the death and funeral of Jacques Noellet and the prodigal's return and death, his lips pressed against the cross of his father's rosary, is a masterpiece of pathos, radiated with the light of immortal hope.

Bazin can paint villains successfully. The devilry of the Prayous in "The Nun" is powerfully outlined. But he will not believe with Flaubert or Schopenhauer that man is doomed to failure, that evil must ever be the victorious athlete in the arena of life, that "the mocking hand of fate seems to have written a negative sign before the colossal sum of human efforts and that the total always shows a loss." Clear-headed and generous, he inclines to a well-balanced optimism. Hate of class against class, poverty, suffering, temptation surround the millinery girl in "Redemption" or "With All Her Soul," the author's title, which gives the keynote of the story. All that can embitter the heart or fan the fires of revolt in her breast lurk at her door. She draws from it all a lesson of self-sacrifice. A priest tells her: "There is no need to go searching for a remedy for the evils of the time. The remedy already exists; it is the gift of oneself to those who have fallen so low that even hope fails them. Open wide your heart. Love them whatever their sins, forgive them however ignorant they may be." Henriette understands, and when the book closes, we know that she will soon knock at the convent gate to serve God and His poor in solitude and obscurity "with all her soul."

English Pilgrimage to Compostela

For the first time in nearly four hundred years a band of English pilgrims have visited the far-famed shrine of St. James at Compostela in the Northwest angle of Spain. The Archbishop of Westminster with fifty Catholics from England embarked, May 19, at Liverpool. With Catholics as captain, chief engineer, second officer and several of the stewards and stokers, the pilgrims felt that they were on a Catholic ship. The Spainward voyage lasted five days, Mass being said every morning. On the twenty-first they arrived at Havre, whence some of the party paid a visit to Rouen, the scene of the martyrdom of the Blessed Jeanne d'Arc. On Sunday, May 23, Archbishop Bourne celebrated Mass, at which many received Holy Communion. Next day the pilgrims arrived at Vigo, where they were saluted with a salvo of fifty guns and the ringing of bells in all the churches. The Governor of the Province, Señor Beranger, who was educated at St. Edmund's, Ware, England, and who spoke in excellent English, welcomed the Archbishop and the pilgrims in the name of the Spanish Government. The whole body of pilgrims then embarked in launches for the shore, where the alcalde, or mayor, welcomed them to the town of Vigo. During the afternoon Archbishop Bourne received several deputations from the Vigo Catholic associations and also from the Ladies' League, which presented an address, saying, among other things, that "the Spanish Catholic community delights in seeing the throne of the Ferdinands and Isabellas filled by one of your eminent countrywomen." On Tuesday morning, May 25, Mass was said by Archbishop Bourne in the Church of St. James, and was the occasion of a remarkable manifestation of piety on the part of the people of Vigo, the celebrant administering Holy Communion to eight hundred persons, the largest number ever communicating in this church at one Mass. The Archbishop then addressed the congregation, thanking all the city for its magnificent reception, and expressing his edification at the concourse of communicants. He reminded them of their generosity and that of the Spaniards of South America in erecting the beautiful chapel of the Blessed Sacrament in the new Cathedral of Westminster. He wished to make the pilgrimage to Santiago an act of gratitude to Spain for their sympathy and help in past years in according hospitality to English students during the dark penal times in England, when seminaries were built to educate Catholic youths for the priesthood to keep the faith alive in England.

Six o'clock on Wednesday morning, May 26, saw the pilgrims entraining for Santiago, and the entire journey from Vigo to Santiago was one triumphal progress. Every station was crowded with people; bells were rung, bombs exploded and houses decorated, while the "vivas" were deafening. On arrival at Santiago the train was met by the auxiliary bishop, the mayor, and the religious, civil and military authorities, and a band played "God Save the King" as the pilgrims left the train. They were at once driven to the Cathedral, the streets being lined by thousands of people. In the immense Cathedral itself, which was packed, the Archbishop of Santiago, Cardinal Herrera, received the Archbishop of Westminster who, followed immediately by the secretary of the pilgrimage bearing the Pilgrimage Flag and by the other pilgrims, proceeded in procession to the high altar. The "Te Deum" was sung, and then came an unexpected feature which was the subject of much gratified comment in the Santiago newspapers. The pilgrims, who had diligently practised their Santiago pilgrimage hymn during their five days on board ship, now sang it in quite intelligible Spanish. Afterwards a reception was held in the archiepiscopal palace by the Cardinal, who expressed his pleasure at seeing them, and hoped that the pilgrimage would bind still stronger the ties which united Spain and England.

The following telegram was received at Santiago by Archbishop Bourne: "Rector, professors and students. English College, Valladolid, salute and welcome English primate and first English pilgrimage to visit Spain since foundation of college."

On Wednesday afternoon the English Archbishop addressed the pilgrims on the purpose of the visit to Com-postella, after which the whole company was shown around the Cathedral. After this the priests were given permission by the Archbishop to use their faculties for preaching and hearing confessions. In the evening a band played outside the palace and there was a display of fireworks in honor of the pilgrims.

On Thursday morning, May 27, the Archbishop of Westminster said the pilgrimage Mass at 7:30 and gave Communion. Two hours later there was a procession and High Mass in the Cathedral, at which the Cardinal and his auxiliary assisted. After this the pilgrims were present at the reception of a large pilgrimage of four thousand people from the neighboring towns, who had walked about thirty miles to Santiago. At the reception on this last morning of the English pilgrimage, the Cardinal once more expressed his delight with the coming of the English, which, he said, was a real mission to his people.

Article twenty-five says in part: "There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord. Those five commonly called Sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony and Extreme Unction, are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, etc." That this teaching on the Sacraments is of extreme importance we gather from Bishop Grafton. He says: ("Pro Rom." p. 35). "The Anglican Church, our wise and considerate mother; . . . gives us in the Creeds and Sacraments all that is necessary for us to know and to do for our salvation." Now how does Bishop Grafton follow the above teaching of his wise mother? He contradicts it explicitly by adding two Sacraments to those mentioned, and implicitly, as we shall see further on, by explaining the nature of the Sacrament of the Supper of the Lord in a sense contrary to the twenty-eighth article. The two Sacraments which he adds are Matrimony and Penance. He writes (a correspondence, pp. 6, 76): "The Church of England . . . restored the Sacrament of Marriage to the clergy of which they had been deprived." Again he tells us that those who leave the Church of England for Rome by so doing deny that they have received sacramental absolution in their own church. From this denial he draws a conclusion which is strong against his own mother seeing that she denies Sacramental absolution. These are his words: ("Pro Rom." p. 41). "Awful, also, is the denial of the reception of Sacramental absolution, which if not real in their case, proves the whole Sacramental system of the Gospel to be false."

We gather from Father Van Rensselaer that Drs. Pusey and King also held, in opposition to this article, confession to be a Sacrament, Dr. King going so far as to prove this clearly out of the Bible and prayer-book ("Life and Letters," pp. 72, 87). To these we wish to add the following startling testimony of Canon Bright. We quote Father Rensselaer's own words ("Life and Letters," p. 134). "Now it happened that just at that time a controversy was being waged over a book called 'The Priest and Absolution.' It was in reality an English translation of a Latin manual of Moral Theology and intended by the translators for the use of Anglo-Catholic clergymen. A low-church peer, Earl Redesdale, had produced this book in the House of Lords and treated his confrères to choice selections from the chapters concerning the commandment which is the Catholic sixth, but the Protestant seventh. 'Such are the matters,' quoth the Earl, 'which the parsons, now dubbed priests, discuss with your wives and daughters.' Of course, the insinuation was manifestly unfair. . . . Nevertheless, the shot hit the mark, and when the question of confession and absolution was put to the vote of the bishops in England, they promptly disclaimed the doctrine and the practice. At this juncture I called on Canon Bright and asked how he accounted for the action of the bishops." (It might be well to recall here that Bishop Grafton tells us that Canon Bright is "noted for his learning and scrupulous honesty and fairness.") "He answered that if he wanted to know anything about the sea, he would not apply for information to a landsman. I admitted his wisdom in this but failed to see the application. He then explained that the bishops knew nothing about confession. 'That's strange,' I said. 'If the so-called priests of the Church of England have any power to forgive sins, it must come from the bishops. How, then, can it be that the bishops do not recognize any such power resident in them?' 'Oh,' said the Canon, 'the Church of England is in a topsy-turvy condition.' 'Do you admit that?' I asked. 'Of course I do,' he replied. 'Then she cannot be the Church of God,' I answered. 'For though the Church may contain disorderly persons in her borders, she cannot herself be in a state of disorder, especially in essential teachings, such as the forgiveness of sins.' So, far from holding me back, the Canon only helped to drive me out of the fold, which was becoming more and more evidently that of the hireling and not of the Good Shepherd."

The twenty-eighth article "of the Lord's Supper" will give us food for reflection. In this article it is clearly asserted that the substance of the wine and the substance of the bread remain after consecration, so that what is then present is consecrated bread and consecrated wine. Are the Body and Blood of Christ really present? We read "The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the Body of Christ is received in the Supper is Faith. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshiped." It appears that the real presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in this Sacrament is here denied. It was to be received only spiritually and by means of Faith. Moreover, the Sacrament "was not by Christ's ordinance . . . worshiped." If this be true Christ's Body cannot be really present. For where Christ's Body is, there also is the Divinity, and by God's ordinance the Divinity is to be worshiped.

To make sure of this interpretation we quote Thomas Rogers, A.M., Chaplain to Archbishop Bancroft ("An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles," p. 286). Among other things he says on this article: "Abominable, therefore, be the popish errors, viz., that substantially and really the Body and Blood, together with the Soul and Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore whole Christ, is contained in the Sacrament Eucharistical." In "Tracts for the Times," Vol. IV, may be found many more Anglican bishops and ministers who give like testimony. We shall quote only one, Bishop Hicks, who is styled also Confessor of the Faith. He says, p. 262, that before the consecration bread and wine are offered to God "as the first fruits of His creatures"; at the consecration they were offered "as the mystical Body and Blood of Christ." These men then clearly deny the Real Presence. Can it be that Christ left His Church in confusion on this point of His own presence in the Sacrament of the Eucharist? It must be so for Bishop Grafton asserts positively what the others positively deny, when he claims ("Rejoinder," p. 48), "that the Anglican Reformers did not deny the Catholic Doctrine of the Real Presence of Christ's Body and Blood in the Eucharist."

Closely connected with the question of the Eucharist is the equally important and fundamental one of the Sacrifice and the Priesthood. In the thirty-first and thirty-sixth Articles of Religion we find what is supposed to be the doctrine of the Church of England on these points. What it really is will be found in the following pandemonium of heavenly authorized confession. The Articles of Religion, as far as we can gather, and many Anglican divines hold this opinion, absolutely deny the existence of a sacrifice and as a consequence the existence of a true priesthood, for a priest without the power of offering sacrifice is a contradiction. Many others assert that the Articles do not deny absolutely the existence of a sacrifice, but only the existence of a sacrifice which would involve the destruction of the bread and wine, and would be a prolongation of the great Sacrifice of the Cross. Some admit the sacrifice to be beneficial for the Souls in Purgatory, others deny this as a "blasphemous fable." Some say that in the sacrifice Christ is offered mystically, others say Christ is offered really. And as for the priesthood! Many claim with Earl Redesdale that they have no priests, but only "parsons, dubbed priests." The Ordinal says they are priests; "yes," say many. "and the Ordinal robbed them of the power to sacrifice." Bishop Grafton says they are priests who sacrifice the real Body and Blood of Christ, and this statement is denied by others just as strongly as it is asserted by Bishop Grafton, one of his opponents being Hicks, Bishop and Confessor. And so the work of "rending the immovable rock" goes on.

Some quotations from competent sources will bear out our assertions. The thirty-first article says in part: "The Sacrifices of Masses, in the which it was commonly said that the Priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt were blasphemous fables, and dangerous deceits." Bishop Grafton claims that in this article was denied only the existence of a sacrifice which was a continuation of the Sacrifice of Calvary. Dr. Rogers ("Exposition of the thirty-nine Articles," p. 299), with "heaven sent authority," says the contrary. "The Papists deliver how the Mass is a sacrifice, a sacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead, the same propitiatory sacrifice that was offered by Christ himself on the cross." After dividing the propositions thus singly, he claims that the article denies each one of them and so denies altogether and absolutely the notion of sacrifice. He concludes in no measured terms: "Accursed, then, stand these Papists before God which take the Mass to be the sacrifice of Christ His Body and Blood." Bishop Grafton defends in many places this doctrine of the "accursed Papists" while straddling on the question of transubstantiation. Another and more difficult case of straddling, was that of Dr. King. In the early morning he was priest and at noon, parson. Father Van Rensselaer describes it as follows ("Life and Letters," p. 34): "We were great friends and I used to go early mornings to assist him in a sort of Mass . . . he would array himself in colored vestments and at a very Catholic-looking altar, with my assistance, perform what was called a celebration of the Eucharist. In the early morning he was very 'high,' but at noon in the Cathedral he was quite 'low,' wore the old-fashioned surplice down to the heels, took the northward position at the communion table, of which the two chief ornaments were two huge brass alms-basins stood upon edge. I never could exactly account for this Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde conduct of the Canon."

What the ordinary Episcopalian thinks of it all, Father Angus tells us (The Tablet, Feb. 27, 1909), "I fancy that they do not trouble themselves about Orders, because they do not believe in them (in the Catholic sense), at all. Do the great majority of Anglican Church people believe that their clergy are 'massing priests,' that they forgive sins in the Sacrament of Penance, that they themselves hear, or should hear, Mass on Sundays or go periodically to confession? Nay, do the Bishops of Durham, or Newcastle, or Hereford, believe that they ordain priests who are to say Mass and forgive sins? Do any of the Church of England Bishops believe this? It would clear the air if the archbishops and bishops would tell us plainly if they ordain, or intend to ordain, clergymen who, in virtue of such ordination, possess, and may practise, the same powers as do Catholic priests. Are Anglican clergymen Catholic priests in the same sense, as are the clergy who are subjects of Pius X? Many, no doubt, sincerely believe that they are. Why, then, do they remain in communion with the vast majority of bishops, clergy and lay people who say they are not." An emphatic answer to the above questions is given by the Erastian branch of the Anglican Church in its review of the decision of Leo XIII's that Anglican Orders "have been and are absolutely null and utterly void" ("The Rock," Sept. 25, 1906—cited in "A Last Word on Anglican Orders," Brandi, p. 40). "The Pope has spoken on the question of the Anglican ordinations with a promptness and determination which many did not expect. . . . We are fully in accord with the Pope in this matter, and we can subscribe to almost all his arguments. It is precisely what we have always held, namely, that by the Reformation the heads of the Church of England deliberately and effectively separated from the Church of Rome, repudiated her teaching on the Priesthood and on the Episcopacy, and therefore in the Ordination they never had any intention of conferring the Priesthood, since they considered Sacerdotalism an injury to the priesthood of Christ, without foundation in the Scriptures, and repugnant to all the cardinal doctrines of the Gospel." In the same spirit Dr. Ryle, Anglican Bishop of Liverpool continues (cf. Brandi, op. cit., p. 104): "Our manner of conceiving the office of a minister of Christ is very different from that of the Pope. On the one hand, the ecclesiastic of Rome is a true Priest, whose principal duty is to offer the sacrifice of the Mass. On the other hand, the ecclesiastic of the Anglican Church is in no wise a Priest, although we call him such; he is only an Elder, whose principal office is not to offer a sacrifice, but rather to preach the word of God and to administer the Sacraments." This is the teaching of the Anglican Church through one branch of its divinely authorized ministers; through another, Bishop Grafton ("Pro. Romanism," p. 5), it tells us "If there is one thing as clear and certain as that there is a God, it is that we are possessed of valid orders and a true priesthood." The ridiculous part of it all is that this assertion and denial of the same essential point of doctrine may go on indefinitely and there is no one to put a stop to it. Would an ordinary level-headed merchant establish a business on such a basis, that disputed questions of vital interest could never be brought to a final settlement? And yet we are asked to believe that on such a basis Christ founded His Church.

If more be needed to show the normal state of the Anglican Church we may turn to two articles in the Nineteenth Century and After for May, 1809, viz.: "The Lambeth Ideal of Reunion" by the Rev. Canon Henley Henson, D.D., and "Prayer Book Revision and the Ornaments" by D. C. Lathburz. The second of these articles reads like "Alice in Wonderland."

The Late Augustus Langcake

Augustus Langcake was born in London, England, August 25, 1832. From 1838 to 1847 he went to school at Chesterfield, Derbyshire, and in the latter year emigrated to New York. Here he came under the notice of Father John Larkin, S.J., who had recently begun the school of the Holy Name of Jesus in Elizabeth street, destined afterwards to develop into the College of St. Francis Xavier. The boy, who was an Episcopalian, asked to become a Catholic, and was received into the Church by Father Larkin.

Having been well grounded in the grammar course in England, he was able to complete his classical studies in two years and a half spent in the Holy Name School, from January, 1848, to July, 1850. At the end of his course he joined the Society of Jesus on August 7, 1850, entering the novitiate then in Montreal. After the two regular years of noviceship he taught classics in Fordham College from 1852 to 1854, and the following year in St. Francis Xavier's College. In 1855-6 he resumed teaching at St. John's College, Fordham, and in 1856-7 he taught the Junior Scholastics at Sault-au-Récollet, near Montreal. From 1857 to 1859 we find him again teaching in St. Francis Xavier's. After completing his course in philosophy and two years of theology he was ordained priest in New York, September 24, 1864, and then resumed teaching for three years in St. Francis Xavier's. His old pupils will remember how entertaining Father Langcake was with his vast accumulation of accurate general knowledge, his easy flow of faultless English, his dry humor, and his musical voice. Everything about him was clear, straightforward and manly.

In 1867-8 he made his tertianship as Socius to Father Saché, the Master of Novices at Sault-au-Récollet, near Montreal. On one occasion, during the latter's temporary absence, Father Langcake had to give an exhortation to the novices and in doing so he showed his scholarly knowledge of French: for he read in perfect, fluent English, translating as he read, without any notes, one of Veuillot's brilliant chapters in "Les Parfums de Rome." Those who know how despairingly idiomatic Veuillot's French is will appreciate this linguistic feat. In after years Father Langcake met with real success and high appreciation from his fastidious hearers when he preached retreats in French to religious communities in Canada.

At that time and until 1879 the Jesuits of New York State and Canada were united under the title of the New York-Canada Mission, and most of Father Langcake's early years as a priest were spent in preaching and giving missions in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in the maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and in the northernmost districts of the States South of the Canadian boundary line. From August, 1868, to August, 1875, he was stationed at the Church of the Gesù, in Montreal. In that beautiful church it was that he won his first laurels as a preacher. As an expounder of Catholic doctrine, a narrator of Biblical and ecclesiastical facts, and a teacher of sound Catholic spirituality, he was well-nigh peerless. His course of dogmatic sermons in the Montreal Gesù is vividly remembered to this day. He made everything so clear and reasonable to his hearers that they found their faith strengthened and their lives bettered with an abiding influence for good.

In 1875-6 Father Langcake made his headquarters at Sault-au-Récollet, whence he traveled all over the country, preaching missions and retreats. In 1876 he was transferred to New York and carried on the same work, with headquarters, first at St. Francis Xavier's, from 1876 to 1878, and then at West Park, from 1878 to 1880. In this year he became Minister at Loyola College, Baltimore and afterwards Prefect of the church there till 1882, when he resumed his missionary work from St. Mary's, Boston. There he remained four years, after which he spent two years in the same work, radiating from St. Joseph's Church, Philadelphia. In 1888-9 his headquarters were again at St. Francis Xavier's, New York, and the next year, with a large missionary band, at Keyser Island, Conn. The following ten years, from 1891 to 1901, were spent at St. Mary's, Boston, in active parish work. The variety of his occupations seemed to grow with the lapse of years: for he was first merely an assistant priest, then he became Spiritual Father to the community, then director of the parish schools, then instructor of converts, a duty which he fulfilled with remarkable efficiency.

But the unremitting labor and tireless zeal of more than half a century were beginning to tell on his strong constitution, and he was removed to a quieter sphere as Spiritual Father, confessor and preacher at St. Francis Xavier's, where he remained till his death. Many secular priests, who confessed to him, and all the members of his community will miss the sound yet broad-minded spiritual teaching of his public exhortations and private talks. His words carried all the more weight because everybody knew that he practised what he preached. Throughout his whole life he was a deeply conscientious man, walking habitually in the presence of God, a faithful observer of his rules, not demonstrative in piety or affection, but a true religious and a faithful friend whom one might "grapple to his soul with hoops of steel." The end was peaceful. On Monday night, June 14, he was found lying on the floor of his room, unable to move but not unconscious. He was immediately taken to St. Vincent's Hospital, where he received the last Sacraments with a lively faith and full conformity to God's will. He expired in the morning of June 16, the feast of St. Francis Regis. The obsequies were conducted by the Very Rev. Joseph Hanselman, Provincial of the Maryland-New York province, on June 17, and the remains were interred at St. Andrew-on-Hudson the same evening.

CORRESPONDENCE

Social Progress in Great Britain

LONDON, JUNE 5, 1909.

Great play has been made with statistics by the Socialists, who are telling us that the condition of the people is getting worse and worse, and that there is ruin staring us in the face unless we make England a ready-made Paradise by adopting a wholesale scheme of confiscation. It is with these Jeremiads of the Socialist party that I am just now concerned. In meeting their propaganda there is no need of denying that much they say as to the extent of pauperism and misery actually existing in England is perfectly well founded. The true line of reply to their arguments is to deny that in order to remedy existing evils there is the least need of plunging into a social revolution on the mere promise that their patent medicines will at once cure all social diseases, and to point out that the sounder policy is that of patient work on the lines of social reform that have already given splendidly encouraging results.

Mr. John Burns, the present head of the Local Government Board, began his political career as a Socialist under the red flag. The first time I ever saw him he was the centre of a meeting of the "unemployed" in Trafalgar Square. He mounted the balustrade and had just got as far as "Fellow workmen—" when he was seized from behind by two policemen and rushed off to Bow Street Station amid a shouting crowd, who threatened, but never actually attempted a rescue. To the disgust of his old comrades, but to the satisfaction of every good citizen, John Burns has learned in the course of years that there is a better way—the way of steady-going administrative reform, and his department has just done an excellent work in issuing as a "Blue Book" a series of carefully compiled statistics on the past and present condition of the people.

This survey of something like half a century brings things into their proper perspective, and suggests that there is no ground for the pessimism on which the Socialists trade in their attempts to discredit existing methods. It is a commonplace of the Socialist propaganda to insist that "the rich are becoming richer and the poor poorer." So far as England is concerned there never was a wilder misrepresentation of fact. It is quite true that ours is a time of colossal fortunes. But turning to the pages of John Burns's "Blue Book" we find that in the last fifty years the condition of the millions of humble workers in England has been steadily improving.

There has been an all round improvement, not confined to any one class. One has a clue to the increase of the wealth of the income taxpayers, the upper and middle classes, in the fact that whilst, in 1871, every penny per pound in the rate of the income tax produced £1,592,000, in 1908 it produced £2,666,000. In other words, the aggregate taxable income has increased over forty per cent. The workers do not pay income tax, so one must get at the figures showing the improvement in their condition in another way.

First we find that there has been a steady increase in wages. They have nearly doubled. The average increase between 1850 and 1907 is 81 per cent. But it will be said prices have also risen, so the workman is really no better off. This is not so. There has been a slight increase in the aggregate cost of the necessities of life, chiefly the result of the rise in house rent, but this rise is partly compensated by the decrease in the cost of clothing and many articles of food, with the result that the net increase in the cost of living for the worker is only three per cent. He is thus 81 per cent. better off in wages, and has to pay three per cent. more for his living, so that he is 78 per cent. to the good on balance.

The two curses of the British workingman are drink and betting. He bets more and drinks less than he used to do. The reform in the matter of drink has gone through all classes, with the result that the British Chancellor of the Exchequer can no longer rely on beer and spirit duties to balance his budget. With less drinking, lower prices and better wages, the British worker has a more comfortable and healthier life. The improvement in his fare, housing and clothing is not represented only by the rise in wages and the fall in prices.

He gets better value for his money. Adulteration of food and drink has been effectively put down. Housing has everywhere been improved. Sanitary laws and improvements, largely carried out at the cost of the tax-paying upper and middle classes, have made the pestilence-breeding slum a thing of the past. Epidemics are no longer a permanent danger in England. Typhus has disappeared. Smallpox has been nearly stamped out. Consumption (tuberculosis and phthisis) is rapidly decreasing. The worker has free education, free hospital treatment when ill, cheap tram and railway traveling, and a host of other advantages, largely paid for by the more monied classes, who cheerfully accept this burden, besides finding endless voluntary help for those who fail in the struggle of life. Let me note here that the workers are saving money. Much of the growing wealth of England is in their hands. They are not becoming poorer. Quite the contrary. Most of them are "capitalists." Let us take a few figures.

The trades unions, thirty years ago, in 1877, had invested funds to the amount of £405,755. In 1905 the amount had risen to nearly six millions sterling (£5,864,342). The workers' friendly societies, organizations for providing co-operative insurance against sickness and death, and under State inspection, had investments, in 1877, to the amount of £14,303,668. In 1905 the figure was £52,619,392, an increase of over thirty-eight millions sterling, or of more than 190 millions of dollars.

The able-bodied pauper has all but disappeared, and the great bulk of the so-called paupers are children in poor law schools and refugees and patients in hospitals. Even under the best of imagined Socialist systems they would still be charged to public funds. Of the unemployed a very large proportion are, to use a slang phrase, "cadgers in search of a soft job." Until human nature is different it will be so. But leaving aside this relatively small class it may be said that in these Government reports we have absolute proof that without invoking Socialist dreams of a revolution, warranted to produce Utopia in six months, we need only persevere in the plodding business-like methods of social reform to produce not only a change for the better in social conditions, but a very rapid change. The results of fifty years are there to encourage us to further efforts on the same lines.

The New Biblical Institute

ROME, JUNE 5, 1909.

It is not yet quite two years since Pope Pius X, in his Encyclical "Pascendi," forecast the foundation of an institution for the harmonizing of Faith and Science, and the upholding of Faith against the errors of Modernism.

Last year an experiment was made by giving special courses in exegesis at the Gregorian University, under the direction of Fathers Fonck and Méchineau. The experiment was in every way successful, and has been crowned by the Bull of May 7, which establishes a real Higher Institute of Biblical Study. The demand for such an institute to meet the needs of the times is self-obvious. The names of Fathers Knabenbauer, Méchineau, Prat, Fonck, Delattre, Schiffini are representative of an exegetical school that needs no advertisement, and that justifies the Holy Father's choice in entrusting the new work to the Jesuit Fathers.

The personnel of the institute will not be made known until autumn, and it is thought that temporarily, at least, the lectures will be given in the Gregorian University. Many are asking if this Biblical Institute is to eclipse the plan for a great Pontifical School of Ecclesiastical Studies formerly referred to; but it may be safely stated that this is but a first step towards the carrying out of that plan. Slow but sure is Rome's motto.

The suppression of the Society of Lawyers of St. Peter, last week, has no very great importance. It was never a pontifical knighthood in any sense of the word. It was founded in 1870, by Agnelli dei Malerbi, to furnish a supply of lawyers to defend the rights of the Holy See, and it had the approval of Pope Leo XIII. In France it took on a color all its own, and now Pope Pius X has suppressed it.

News concerning the health of Cardinal Kopp, Prince-Bishop of Breslau, is far from reassuring; and the Vatican has recently sustained a serious loss by the death of Mgr. Wenzel. Since 1879 he had labored towards the opening up of the treasures of the Vatican library, and more especially did he devote himself to systematizing the Garampi Catalogue, giving an alphabetical, chronological, topographical index of everything in the library referring to Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Churches, Benefices and notables throughout the world. It comprises 126 folio volumes. Mgr. Wenzel's encyclopedic knowledge was at the disposal of all comers in the library. Since 1905 he had been a Canon of St. Peter's; and his work now falls to the hands of Mgr. Ungherini.

In Montecitorio they have been discussing the Home Budget of which President Giolitti himself has charge; it was the occasion for a fresh display of his parliamentary cleverness and debating ability. He came in for some severe criticism, but in the end his balance-sheet was adopted by a majority of 169 votes.

The railway question cropped up when the Public Works Budget was under discussion. About two years ago the State took over control of the railways, and so far without great success or profit. However, the House voted for the Budget as it stood, though criticisms among railway men, outside the House, who are mostly Socialists, are noisy and frequent.

The next subject for discussion is the Education Grant, and the teaching of religion in the schools is sure to be made a vital issue. As political parties stand the loudly-heralded reorganization of the historic Left, formerly led by Zanardelli and afterwards by Gallo until his death, two years ago, and in Italian politics noted like the historic Right for its anti-ministerial and anti-clerical tendencies, has no importance worthy of mention. It consists of about thirty deputies looking for notoriety or hoping for a sop in the shape of some under-secretaryship.

There is continued tension between Italy and Austria. It is by no means certain that Austria has refused to take part in the 1911 Exposition at Rome. But the opponents of the Triplice are making the most of the rumor, and some anti-clerical papers in Austria are trying to drag in the Vatican. If Austria does not take part in the Exposition it will not be out of deference to the Pope's wishes, but to gain its own political ends. In the matter of Catholic sovereigns visiting Rome, a recent semi-official note in the Osservatore Romano points out that the Vatican maintains its position as hitherto. It is curious to note that the majority of Italian Catholics are trying to ignore the political side of the Exposition, and to look upon it as a patriotic national event. The minority, however, sternly refuse to make such a distinction, and are keeping aloof from all participation in it.

Socialist Outbreak in the Argentine

BUENOS AIRES, MAY 18, 1909.

The frequently recurring revolutionary outbreaks in this country afford a theme of no small importance to the statesman and the Sociologist. It is not the central Government that is now so much in danger of being overthrown, but the various provincial governments that are continually liable to political disturbances originating within their own domains, chiefly through the instrumentality of local agitators (here called caudillos).

Scarcely three months pass without the National Government having to interpose its authority in order to settle the disputes that so frequently crop up in the various provinces of the republic. This is called national intervention, and an interventor is named by the National Government to set things right, or wrong, as the case may turn out. Just now the province of Corrientes is the one requiring intervention, whilst various others are either demanding the same panacea, or are visibly in a state of ferment clearly presaging an outbreak which shall, ere long, render such intervention necessary. The usual cause of these troubles is that the legislature is set at naught by the executive, as in the case just mentioned, or that the unsuccessful candidates for political preferment do not submit to their fate as resignedly as the public weak demands, or both these causes of disagreement operate simultaneously.

Like the prolonged period of inaction which at times precedes violent volcanic eruptions, the country has been rather free from Socialistic agitation for a considerable period, until on the first of the current month, a meeting having been called in the capital, a scene of violence and bloodshed over the arrest of one of the crowd was the immediate result. Forty persons were killed and wounded, of whom four died on the spot. This happened in one of the most central and important thoroughfares of Buenos Aires. There is another of the apparent enigmas of Argentine social phenomena. It happens after an abundant harvest in a country where there is no lack of work for the honest and willing laborer, where his share of life's enjoyments are greater than in many other lands. A Catholic daily, El Pueblo, published in Buenos Aires, commenting on these atrocities, calls attention very opportunely to the fact that whilst Socialist organizations can scarcely hold a meeting without creating most serious disorder, the Catholic societies, known as Círculos de Obreros, hold theirs regularly without giving occasion for the slightest police interference, unless in the case of their being openly attacked by the Socialists, or Anarchists, as happened once at least.

But the riotous proceedings mentioned were not the only, or the most serious outcome of the Socialist gathering. A general strike, following immediately after, brought all business to a standstill for over a week. During this time a bomb, concealed in a fruit basket which had been placed in a tram car by some one unknown, exploded, wounding twenty-three persons, some dangerously, one of whom has since expired. Apart from the immediate consequences of a general commercial paralysis and the loss of life and limb, it is easy to see that the more remote and general effect will be a still further widening of the gulf which separates laborer and employer owing to the bitter resentment stirred by such doings together with the inflammatory speeches and writings which represent the capitalist as a robber and the workingman his victim, deprived by an unjust system of laws of most or all of what is his by right.

This Socialist outbreak in Buenos Aires is all the more reprehensible, too, and destitute of any reasonable motive since the Italian Socialist leader, Cuvier Ferri, who was here giving lectures on his favorite theme and on others, some time ago, expressed the opinion that this is not a country in which Socialism is needed nor are economic and other conditions adapted for the establishment of that system.

As some set-off against such happenings, it is pleasing to have to chronicle the holding of a meeting which took place some days ago for the purpose of establishing here a branch of the Knights of Columbus. Dr. Kelley, of Chicago and Buenos Aires, having been delegated by the society in the United States, was the speaker who delivered the introductory address. His address was explained in Spanish by Dr. Lamarea, a well known Catholic leader and orator. Amongst those who signed the invitation to the preliminary meeting were the national deputy, Dr. J. G. O'Farrell, Dr. Cullen, and others no less noteworthy. Much good is hoped to result from the establishment amongst us of this society.

Mr. Wm. Bulfin, editor of The Southern Cross, who is about to visit Ireland, was given a picnic at San Isidro, a pretty suburban town near here, recently, in compliment to his services to his countrymen and the Church.

Military Service and the Harvest

INNSBRUCK, JUNE 5, 1909.

In the Vienna Reichspost, for May 29, was published a letter about the Servian question, which is at least of interest as indicative of the reserve in Austria's attitude towards Servia since the conclusion of peace. The writer says that the friends of European peace are uneasy over the discovery, that the Servian affair is by no means at an end, and believes it to be a duty to civilization to make known a movement towards a new and more powerful attack against Austria on the part of Servia, an attack not indeed planned for any definite date, but none the less certain for all that, and which Servia does not reckon she will have to make at her own cost and risk. He claims he has his proofs of these assertions from official sources. The principal points of Servia's programme are as follows: Servia has not foregone her aspirations to Bosnia-Herzegovina and the other Servian districts incorporated into Austrian-Hungarian territory; she aims to be the rallying point of the Slavs in the Balkans, and to prepare herself for the hour when Russia shall have reattained a more powerful development, and shall again take an active part in the politics of Eastern Europe.

The Russian Pan-Slavism organization has already poured large subsidies into Belgrade, and will also supply the financial backing for the enterprises that are to follow. The writer asserts further that there are in existence two secret agreements between Servia and another European power other than Russia, whose design it is to make Servia act as a buffer-state in the resistance of other Powers to the increase of the strength of the Triple Alliance in the Balkan region.

Whatever the truth of these assumptions may be, they seem to indicate that the "Balkan question" has by no means been definitely settled. Events alone can determine whether they have any foundation in fact.

One of the evil effects of the maintenance of immense armies, which the present-day relations of European powers has made necessary, has been the neglect of agriculture consequent on the absence of thousands of field-workers on military service. The question of granting furloughs during the harvest periods to soldiers on active service has been long and earnestly discussed in Austria. As one result of this discussion, in 1901, it was decreed to hold the yearly manœuvres of the reserve at a time when they could be most easily spared from field-work. The extension of this permission was more difficult in the case of soldiers in service. First of all, the harvest did not occur at the same time all over Austria, and again the strength of the various army corps must not be too much reduced. A trial was made in 1907, however, of a "harvest-furlough" of three weeks, which was so successful as to cause its extension to the whole army during the past year. The details are left to the territorial commandants, and the system introduced, while elaborate, will, it is hoped, satisfy the needs of both the army and the various agricultural classes.

One of the projected methods for raising the national revenue has been the increase of railroad fares on the Government railways. The plan as it stands calls for an increase of five per cent. to twelve per cent. on first-class tickets; nine per cent. to twenty-four per cent. on second, and eighteen per cent. to forty-seven per cent. on third-class tickets, which would make the proportion of increase among the three classes of fares about one to two to four. This would mean that the users of first and second class tickets would, in comparison with present rates, travel cheaper under the projected tariff than the users of third-class tickets. The Government hopes thus to obtain a much higher revenue, because eighty-five per cent of travelers go third-class. It hopes, also, thus to direct a larger number of travelers into the second-class travel. But the increase will fall hardest on the laboring classes, who in spite of the continuance of the fifty per cent. reduction allowed them, will be forced to pay nearly one and a half crowns more in a month for a journey from four to six miles. This, it is firmly believed, will have an evil effect upon labor, in that it will reduce the radius of activity of the working classes. A further effect will inevitably be a reduction in tourist tariff, with a resulting loss of profit in the many lines of business which depend wholly or partially on the tourist, such as hotels, health-resorts, etc. There is a general demand, therefore, that if there must be an increase in railroad fares, it shall at least not oppress the poorer classes in favor of the well-to-do.

Austria has been celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the death of composer Haydn (born in Rohrau, April 1, 1732, died in Vienna, May 31, 1809). A great congress of musicians was held in Vienna towards the end of May. On the 28th there was a memorial service in Eisenstadt in Hungary where, in the castle of Count Nicholas Esterhazy, Haydn lived and worked for a decade or more.

The Jubilee of the Bengal Mission

Fifty years ago the traveler in North Eastern Hindustan would have smiled incredulously if he had been told that to-day that pagan stronghold would count over 100,000 disciples of Christ. Judging by appearances our traveler would have had reason on his side, did not the presence of the seven new missionaries argue that at last West Bengal was to be evangelized more systematically than during the three preceding centuries. Intermittent efforts had been made to establish the Faith since 1571, but first one event then another had succeeded in paralyzing humble beginnings and nothing great had ever been accomplished. At the end of the eighteenth century there were Augustinians in Calcutta and Bandel, while the Catholics elsewhere were served from Goa. The condition of the 25,000 Catholics then living in the eleven parishes of Bengal may be summed up in two words: ignorance and corruption. Protestant missions and schools were doing great harm. In 1834 the Pope created the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal and entrusted it to the Jesuit Fathers of England. A college was founded and the work was progressing when difficulties arose with the new Vicar Apostolic, Dr. Carew, appointed November 20, 1840. The Fathers were recalled by their superior and their college of St. Francis Xavier was closed in 1846.

In November, 1859, the Jesuit Fathers returned to Bengal whither they had been sent by the Propaganda. Four from Belgium and two from England, with one lay brother comprised the mission band. In 1864 Father Augustus Van Heule, S.J., was named Vicar Apostolic, but died four months after his arrival in Calcutta. The Rev. Walter Steins, S.J., was then transferred from the Vicariate Apostolic of Bombay to that of Bengal. Pope Leo XIII, by his Bull "Humanæ Salutis Auctor" of September 7, 1886, erected the Catholic Hierarchy in India, and Calcutta became an archiepiscopal see with Archbishop Goethals as Metropolitan, having the two suffragan dioceses, Dacca and Khrishnagar and the Prefecture Apostolic of Assam, in its ecclesiastical province. Archbishop Goethals died in July, 1901, at the age of sixty. Father Brice Meuleman, S.J., Superior of the Bengal Mission, was nominated Archbishop of Calcutta March 21, 1902, and consecrated in the Cathedral the following June.

The Mission of West Bengal, sometimes called the Calcutta Mission, covers a territory seven times the size of the State of Maryland, inhabited by a population of about twenty-seven millions. Of these, according to the latest statistics August, 1908, 92,491 are baptized Catholics and 86,951 are catechumens. Two hundred and eighteen Jesuits, most of whom are priests, are working in the mission, assisted by about forty Irish Christian Brothers and about 165 Sisters. In Calcutta there are 14,000 Catholics, eight parishes, a college with about 900 boys, an orphanage with 300 boys and St. Joseph's High School with 800 boys, besides four school and a girls' orphanage with about 1,500 pupils, under the care of the Loreto nuns from Ireland, and St. Vincent Home with 252. If we go out into the interior we find a theological seminary at Kurseong and a house of probation in Ranchi where there is also an Apostolic school with 23 boys, and a High School, affiliated to the University of Calcutta in 1908, having 276 pupils. At Darjeeling there is a college for boys, counting in all 200, and a boarding school for girls with 160. At Kurseong there is also a High School for girls with 220 pupils, in charge of the Daughters of the Cross. The latest statistics give the mission 184 schools with an attendance of 9,762 children, thirty-three Churches and 416 Chapels. The number of communions in four years has increased by 194,637, making the total for last year 419,616.

In 1860 St. Francis Xavier's College was opened in the very centre of the European quarter of Calcutta with 100 boys. Two years later it was affiliated to the University of Calcutta, accepting the official program of studies drawn up by the government and receiving in return the right of presenting its boys for the examinations for the B.A. degree. The brilliant career the college has had and the reputation for scientific ability of some of its professors have been the cause of bringing great prestige to Catholicism in Bengal. We mention among the eminent scientists Father Eugene Lafont, professor in Calcutta for thirty years, twice rector of the college, founder of the Observatory, Fellow of the Calcutta University and officer of the French Academy.

One of the great difficulties met with in the conversion of the natives is the thirty-five languages spoken in the Archdiocese. The Mohammedans seem to give no hope of conversion, the Hindus little more. But the Faith has made great progress among the aborigines during the last twenty-five years. The mission is divided into seven or eight districts, the largest of which is the Chotanagpore. This district was opened in 1885 by Father Lievens and from its opening dated the real progress of the Bengal Mission. In October, 1887, it already counted 400 villages with 15,000 Christians and sixty schools. Father Lievens was everything to the natives. They called him the "great Sahib." In one of his missionary towns in Barway, whither he had sent his catechists before him, he baptized 13,000 natives in one month. What de Nobili was to Madura, Ricci to China and De Smet to the Rocky Mountains, Father Lievens was to Chotanagpore. He never spared himself and after a short but laborious apostolate of six fruitful years broke down completely. He returned to Louvain in September, 1892, and died there November 7, 1893. One of his former converts preached his panegyric when he said: "Do not tell us that our priest is dead. He was not a priest; he was the king of priests."

His aim had been to help the natives in every way, to protect them against the tyranny of their landlords and the native police and to feed them in time of scarcity. The better to fit himself to protect them against avaricious landlords he studied the complicated system of the laws and became such an authority on the subject that the judges themselves appealed to him in difficult cases. It was a new and unheard of thing that a Catholic missionary should defend the material interests of his people. It was the beginning of that wonderful movement in Chotanagpore.

Father Lievens had started the work on permanent lines and it did not die with him. The work is being carried on to-day as fruitfully and zealously as in the beginning. Within twenty-four years a Christian community of 67,187 baptized and 85,734 Catechumens has sprung up in a pagan country. There are eighteen stations with about thirty-five priests. In these stations there are central schools; and in the more important villages there is a catechist and a school. In all there are 136 schools with an attendance of 5,180 children, not counting the Apostolic School and the High School at Ranchi. The four convents built by the Ursulines in Ranchi, Khunti, Tongo and Rengarih exercise a great influence for good in the family life of these neophytes.

The Church and the Churches

If we select for comment the following extract from a letter which bears the note of good faith and good will, it is not because the sentiment it contains is exceptional, but rather because it is becoming all too common, and because it is accepted without challenge as natural in the course of events. After praising this publication our correspondent adds: "Let me say also that I am not of your Church. My name is on the roll of the Presbyterian church of this little city, but I am not a bright and shining light in my denomination. The truth is I regard our Protestantism as having seen its best days, and wholly unable to grapple with the problems of the day, religious, ethical and social. The Catholic Church, I am convinced, is the only reliable barrier against the fearful tide of infidelity, immorality and general cussedness which threatens our civilization." The sadness of this admission is pathetic. It is the cry of a heart which has lost a fond ideal, or, more correctly, the disappointment of one whose hope has failed him. As faith in creed wanes, hope in the church disappears. Those who appreciate the deep attachment of the Presbyterian to the religion of his birth can estimate in some measure the bitterness of the realization that it is no longer the saving influence he was taught in youth to consider it. To feel that one's best resource is not adequate in the struggle with evil, is a first step towards pessimism; and pessimism is a veiled form of despair. Meanwhile one asks, why is it that a church loses its ability to grapple with the problems of the day, religious as well as ethical and social? Why cannot its representatives answer the questions which its members propound about the application of the Divine law to actual circumstances? Why cannot its doctrines meet the difficulties which arise from science, history, sociology? As the custodian and propagator of religious truth, a church should have doctors and doctrines which shed light on the problems of the moment as well as upon the problems of all time. To satisfy immortal souls should be their guide here as well as their salvation hereafter. This is particularly true of a church which impresses upon its members the fact that they are destined to be a saving element in society. The representatives of this very church are actually engaged in holding conventions North, South, East and West, lauding their founder to the skies, and framing programmes of world-reform. Nowhere in these conventions is the admission made that Protestantism has seen its best days; on the contrary, one might gather from the reports of these ministerial revivals that we are to witness soon its renaissance. Apparently the ministers are not at one with their people. The story told by Stannard Baker in The American Magazine confirms the words of our correspondent, and his story is one of facts throughout.

Meanwhile, to follow this subject from another point of view, how comes it that the Catholic Church should be regarded, even by Protestants and men of no church, as a barrier against infidelity, immorality, and contempt for law, whether human or Divine, which, we take it, is meant by the word "cussedness"? Is it not a paradox that the Church of the poor, and, as it is so often represented, of the ignorant, the foreigner, the criminal classes, the foe of science, freedom of thought, of civil allegiance, of religious toleration, should suddenly be regarded as the hope of the nations? Or, since the paradox is so unreasonable if the Catholic Church, besides being so bereft of natural resources, is so hampered, as its enemies believe, by its antagonism to science, liberty and loyalty, are we not reasonable in concluding that it has some other power and resources, far transcending those which other religious bodies claim in abundance? This is precisely the solution of this chief problem of the day. Waiving the question about the natural, human or worldly advantages which the various religious bodies possess, these avail but little in the struggle with vice and corruption no matter how powerful they may be. No human agency, itself subject to evil, can reform and save men, without Divine aid. When, therefore, men look to the Catholic Church to save them from the evils of the day, they unwittingly attribute to it some unknown, mysterious, or supernatural power, in virtue of which alone it can meet the problems of the day and stem the tide of infidelity and immorality.

Marriage à la Mode

"Marriage à la Mode," by Mrs. Humphry Ward, (Doubleday, Page & Co.), is to be classed with what are termed problem novels, which deal with a problem or condition of society and while exposing an evil offer or suggest a solution. The problem discussed by this clever writer in her latest production, is the evil of divorce, or rather the evils of the divorce laws which so readily afford an untying of the knot for disaffected or discordant couples. The discrepancy existing between the divorce laws in the United States and England is the point emphasized. It is not perfectly clear to the reader what solution the book offers. In fact there is little more than a strong presentation of the evil as it exists in America where "marriage is merely proclaimed love; and if love fails, marriage has no further meaning, or raison d'être." The heroine believes in "the great cause of woman's freedom and independence" and holds that no woman, "in the future that is coming, shall be forced either by law or opinion to continue the relations of marriage with a man she has come to despise." The consequences that will inevitably follow from a doctrine such as this, when it is not merely believed in but lived up to, form the warp and woof of the story. Severity in the framing and enforcement of laws touching the marriage bond, or reducing to uniformity the marriage enactments in force in England and the United States, does not strike at the root of the evil; unless perchance South Carolina, the only State in the Union where divorce is not permissible for any reason or pretext whatever, be chosen as the basis of agreement. For it is clear that so long as adultery be admitted as a ground of absolute separation the flood of iniquity may be stemmed but it will never be checked at its source. Designing parties will always find a loop-hole for pleading or sanctioning an infraction of the marriage vow, and the intent of such a law will be constantly thwarted and the law itself rendered inoperative. There is no remedy for the evil except the one proposed by the Church and enforced by her among her children—a law based on the teachings of the Gospel and the plain words of Christ: "What God has joined together let no man put asunder."

College Life and Character

If the thousands of young men and women who have gone forth from our universities and colleges, during the month fail to resist the world's seductions or to reform its evils, it is not because their Almae Matres dismissed them with scant invocation, exhortation or blessing. Indeed, it is doubtful if they needed half of what was bestowed upon them. What president or baccalaureate preacher failed to say, they proclaimed in no uncertain formula. They know that the times are trying men's souls, and that they have panaceas for all the ills flesh is heir to. They have all had advantages which, they believe, will never fall to the lot of the non-college-bred; and those of each college think they have had exceptional opportunities unknown to the students of any other. The world is theirs to conquer and to save. With lofty ideals and brave resolve they meet the world they are to overcome, only to find they are among its dependents, and that they must ask for favors which combatants should be in a position to command. They must serve those whom they have been inspired to reform; they must witness everywhere the evil they are expected to correct;

they must experience the encounter with what they had been taught to regard as vice, concealed or even recommended as if it were virtue, by cunning sophistry, plausible maxim, or personal charm. Two things quickly strike serious young graduates as tests of their ability to make their way in the world without yielding to its temptations, and tests, therefore, of the value of the education they have received. Truth is one, and work is the other. They will not long remember the fine phrases that were poured out on them at college, nor are they any longer the more or less passive instrument they were while there. They have now to determine values for themselves and they must depend entirely on their own efforts. If they have been trained to see things as they are, to recount events as they really happened, to present facts in their true light, to use words in their proper meaning, to judge men without rash suspicion, to speak of things of their own knowledge, to discern between hearsay and vision, between imagination and fact, they will not easily be deceived or compromised. This requires effort. Indeed, it is, or, should have been, the chief element in their training so far in life. All through life it must be their work or warfare, as they may choose to regard it. Strength of will or character, as we call it, is needed for this. Unless education has formed this, the college has bred indolent and useless dependents almost sure to become the tools or victims of designing men. This is the supreme advantage of all training whether in or out of college, and, without it, even knowledge is little worth.
